An attorney's right to fees must, in every case, rest on contract made with the party himself who is charged, or with his representative. No legal claim for compensation can be founded upon services incidentally benefiting a party, other than the employer, as against that party, because of the incidental benefit.

Where a plaintiff, claiming a half interest in land, brought action for partition, and the claim was resisted, but finally adjudicated in plaintiff's favor, and the land divided, each party getting half, the defendant cannot be charged with any part of the fee due to plaintiff's attorney.

3. This case distinguished from Nimmons v. Stewart, 13 S. C., 416.

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, June, 1885.
The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for appellant.

*February 24, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs filed the complaint below for the partition of a certain tract of land situate in Laurens County, in which they claimed that the plaintiff, Permelia, and the defendant were tenants in common, each being entitled to one-half. The defendant denied this claim. The case was referred to the master to hear and report upon the issues of law and fact involved, who sustained plaintiffs' claim. Upon exceptions to the Circuit Court, the master's report was confirmed, from which there was no appeal. Thereupon, by order, a writ in partition issued, under which the land was divided between the parties, and on motion of plaintiffs' attorney it was then referred to the master, to report a suitable fee for said attorney to be paid by the parties to the suit. The master upon testimony reported $250 as a reasonable fee. The partition was confirmed, and the fee reported was ordered to be paid, one-half each to be paid by plaintiffs and defendant, and in case that either failed, the interest of such failing party in the land to be sold for such payment. From this order the defendant has appealed, contesting the ruling of the judge as to the fee.

The appellant's counsel correctly states the general rule on this subject, to wit, that counsel fees must depend upon the contract of the parties. Under this rule attorneys must ordinarily look to their clients for compensation—to those who directly employed them. The courts, however, have sometimes decreed counsel fees to attorneys not employed by the party himself subjected to the fee, but by one whom the law regards as the representative of such party, and, consequently, authorized to contract for him. Thus, attorneys' fees must in every case rest on contract made by the party charged himself, or by his representative. We mean the right to fees, the amount, in the absence of a sum agreed upon, of course depending upon labor and services rendered. Thus it is, that the property of infants, lunatics, and others, who must appear by representatives, may be charged for the fees of attorneys employed by such representatives. And thus it is, too, that the attorney employed by one of a class, interested in a common property, to recover, protect, and defend said property for the benefit of all, may be allowed a fee out of the common fund. But we know of no law which can subject one to a charge for services which have not been authorized by him, neither directly nor through his representative. No legal claim for compensation can be founded upon services incidentally benefiting a party, other than the employer, as against that party, and because of the incidental benefit. Hend v. Railroad Co., 21 S. C., 162. In such case, there might be some moral equity underlying the claim, but this equity has never yet been brought within the jurisdiction of the courts. It has been left to the moral sense of the party benefited.

The respondent relies upon the case of Nimmons v. Stewart, 13 S. C., 446. Upon examination of that case, however, it will be found that the principle therein does not cover the question here. There, the plaintiff was suing for, and recovered as trustee, the sum of $2,000 for her cestui que trust, and a fee of $200 was allowed her attorney, which reduced the trust fund to $1,800. The parties entitled in remainder to this fund objected and made the question. This court held that the allowance of the fee was proper, in accordance with the principles herein above referred to. Nimmons was acting in a representative capacity, suing for the benefit of her cestuis que trust, and the fund which she brought into court, by her litigation for the benefit of those whom she represented, was liable for the fee of her attorney. But in the case at bar, the plaintiff does not sustain any trust relation to the defendant. She is in no sense the representative of the defendant. In fact, she and the defendant have been antagonists, fighting at arm's length from the beginning of the litigation, each having her own attorney.

We think it was error to charge the defendant with any portion of the fee of the plaintiffs' attorney, and to that extent the judgment below is modified, by reversing so much thereof as charges the defendant with one-half of the fee allowed to plaintiffs' attorney.

*GRAHAM v. JONES.

[1. Executors and Administrators ¶144.]

Where a testator gave to his executors power to sell a tract of land and eight negroes for the purpose (as implied from the terms of another clause in the will) of paying his debts, but made no disposition of this property, one of his executors could not acquire title to such tract of land by paying the debts with her own funds; she could only demand reimbursement for her expenditures, after accounting for her receipts.

This executrix having mortgaged this land for her own purposes, the mortgagee took only an equitable assignment of the mortgagor's interest after such accounting had.

[3. Mortgages ¶566.]

And this mortgage having been given to secure a note upon which there was a surety, and afterwards there was another mortgage of other property given by this mortgagor to the same person to secure this note and a subsequent note of the mortgagor, and the latter property was first sold, the proceeds of sale should be applied pro rata to both notes.

Before Pressley, J., Union, October, 1884.

The complaint and answers, as they appear in the "Brief," were as follows:

1. The complaint first sets out a note, of which the following is a copy:

"On or before twenty-fifth of December, eighteen hundred and eighty-two (1882), we, or either of us, promise to pay W. T. Graham, or bearer, the sum of nine hundred and eleven 95-100 dollars, cash loaned. Witness our hands and seals. S. Jones, [L. S.]

"February 23, 1882. Joseph Hill, [L. S.]"

2. The complaint next sets out another note, of which the following is a copy:

"$494.55. One day after date, we, or either of us, promise to pay Wm. T. Graham the sum of four hundred and ninety-four 55-100 dollars. Value received. Interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum.

"January 19, 1884. S. Jones, [Seal]"

3. The complaint sets out, also, an account against Sarah Jones for $37.57.

4. On the $494.55 note, Graham claims only $294.55 and interest.

*5. That no part of said debts have been paid, except $595, on the 11th day of April, 1884.

6. The $911.75 note was secured by a mortgage on a tract of land containing 102 acres, known as the "mill tract," said mortgage having been executed by said Jones on the 15th March, 1882.

7. That the defendant, Mary A. E. Gist, claims an interest in said land.

8. That at the time the mortgage above referred to was executed, plaintiff was informed by the defendant, Sarah Jones, and also by her co-defendant, Joseph Hill, the brother of the defendant, Sarah Jones, who signed the note first above set forth, jointly and severally with the defendant, Sarah Jones, that defendant, Sarah Jones, had a title in severalty and in fee to the whole of above described tract of land: that the said defendants repeated this to the plaintiff until he believed it to be true.

9. That under that belief, and by virtue of a power to the plaintiff contained in the mortgage above described, plaintiff, on the 7th day of April, 1884, offered said land for sale at Union Court House, after due notice of time and place of sale; and at the sale thereof, still believing from the statements of the said defendants that the defendant, Sarah Jones, owned the whole of said tract in severalty and in fee, and without notice, either express or implied, from any source whatever, that her title to the same was imperfect, plaintiff bid off said land at and for the sum of seven hundred and five dollars, which plaintiff alleges is a full and fair price for the whole of said land in entirety and in fee.

10. That since said sale, plaintiff has discovered that he was deceived in believing that the defendant, Sarah Jones, had the entire title to said land: he is now informed that the defendant, Mary A. E. Gist, is a joint tenant or tenant in common with the defendant, Sarah Jones, and owns an undivided half interest in the same, and claims and asserts title thereto under and by virtue of the last will and testament of one Jesse Jones: a copy of which is annexed to this complaint as exhibit A.

11. Sarah Jones and Joseph Hill, although they deceived the plaintiff as to Sarah Jones's title to said land, and he was thereby led to foreclose it at a price far beyond its real value, insist that said purchase is valid, and that the plaintiff should comply with *his bid, and credit the note secured by said mortgage with the amount thereof, which plaintiff has refused to do.

The plaintiff prays that said sale be set aside; that said mortgage be foreclosed, and the interest of Sarah Jones in said land be sold under order of court and the proceeds applied to the payment of the costs and expenses of this action, and the amount due on said notes, account, and mortgage and interest thereon; that the defendants be adjudged to pay any deficiency, and for further proper relief.

Exhibit A.

In the name of God. Amen.

I, Jesse Jones, of Union District, South Carolina, being of sound mind and but feeble in health, and mindful of the uncertainty of my life, do make and ordain this to be my last will and testament, to wit:

First. I want all my just debts paid.

Item, I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Sarah Jones, my home tract of land, containing five hundred and sixty-five acres, during her natural life; at her death, my will is that it shall be my daughters', Mary

A. E. Jones and Laura L. Jones, and the heirs of their bodies.

Item, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah Jones, the following negroes: Peter, Fannie, Elija, Squire, Clarke, Cornelia, Isaac, Thomas, Peter, Richard, Patience, Lizzie, Wesley.

I give and bequeath to my beloved wife the following negroes: Harriet and child, to and her heirs forever.

Item, I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary the negro girl Hannah, and to the heirs of her body.

Item, I bequeath to my daughter, Laura L. Jones, the negro girl Caroline, and the heirs of her body.

Item, My desire is, that the balance of negroes be sold—Henry, Steven, Louisa, Elija, John, Moses, Peggy, Antony—and also my remainder of land.

Item, My desire is, that all my stock be kept on the place, unless my executor may think proper to sell a portion of them, to do so.

*Item, My desire is, that my daughters shall be educated from the crops on the place.

Item, After the death of my wife, my desire is that my negroes shall be equally divided between them—Mary and Laura.

Item, From item second, the property willed in that item is to go to my daughters, Mary A. E. Jones and Laura L. Jones, to them and the heirs of their bodies (after the death of my wife, Sarah Jones).

Item, If the property willed to be sold is not sufficient to pay the just debts, I will that Lyge and Wesley, if both be required, be sold for that purpose.

Item, I do appoint my beloved wife, Sarah Jones, Jos. Hill, Holly Hill, and Perry Fant my executrix and executors.

Item, I will that the increase of negroes go to daughters Mary and Laura.

Jesse Jones.

I have set my hand in the presence of

D. S. Lee,

T. P. Jones,

Samuel F. Fant.

September 30, 1856.

The answer of Dr. Hill alleges that under the will of Jesse Jones, the mill tract was ordered to be sold to pay debts, and that his co-defendant, Mrs. Jones, having paid the debts of her testator without a sale of the mill tract, he supposed the same became hers in severalty: that if he had not so believed, he would not have become surety upon the note. That so believing, he did, at the time of mortgage given, represent to the plaintiff that Mrs. Jones was the owner of the mill tract, and that she had derived her title from the will of her husband.

2. That the note set forth in the paragraph 1st of the complaint is entitled to a credit of four hundred and dollars from proceeds of sale of home tract mortgaged by the defendant, Mrs. Jones, to the plaintiff, and by said plaintiff sold on April 7, 1884.

3. That the defendant is released, because time was given.

4. Denies that $705 is a full and fair price for the whole of the mill tract, and insists that the sale, so far as this defendant is concerned, should be held good and valid.

5. Denies all allegations of the complaint inconsistent with the truth of these defences.

The defendant, Mrs. Jones, in her answer, alleges:

1. That Jesse Jones, her husband, died in the year 1856, seized and possessed of the two parcels of land mentioned in his will. That she paid and discharged all his debts, and thereupon and thereafter believed that she became entitled to the mill tract in severalty and in fee.

2. That she did state to the plaintiff that the mill tract belonged to her, and she also stated to him, before the execution of the mortgage of said mill tract, the source of her title thereto, and, independently of any statement of herself or her co-defendants, the plaintiff well knew whence and in what manner her title was derived. That before the execution of the mortgage upon the homestead, she stated to the plaintiff that she only had a life estate therein, and she then supposed that to be her only interest therein.

The defendant, Mary A. E. Gist, by her attorneys, Munro & Munro, answering the complaint herein, alleges:

That her father, Jesse Jones, at the time of his death in 1856, was seized and possessed of the lands described in the mortgage deed set forth in the complaint, and upon his death said land descended to his heirs at law, to wit, his widow, the defendant Sarah, and his two daughters, Laura and this defendant.

That after the death of her said father, and before the commencement of this action, and about twenty-five years since, the said Laura died intestate, leaving as her heirs at law the defendant Sarah and this defendant.

That upon the death of said Jesse Jones, this defendant became seized of an undivided one-third part of said land, and ever since the death of said Laura, this defendant has been seized of an undivided moiety thereof.

That for more than eighteen years last past, the defendant Sarah has been in the exclusive receipt of the rents and profits of said land; has never accounted to this defendant for the same, and is largely indebted to this defendant therefor.

Further answering, this defendant denies that she is, or should be, held liable to the plaintiff for any deficiency or any moneys whatever, as prayed in the complaint.

Further answering, this defendant has not sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief respecting the allegations of the complaint not herein specifically admitted, and, therefore, requires strict proof thereof.

Wherefore this defendant demands judgment that an account be taken of the rents and profits of said land, and that this defendant have judgment therefor, and for costs.

The mortgages are in the usual form, with power of sale. Upon default of payment of the first note, the mortgagee is empowered to sell the mill tract and apply the proceeds of sale to that note; and on default in the payment of the two notes secured by the second mortgage, the mortgagee is empowered to sell the home place and apply the proceeds to the payment of these two notes. On April 7, 1884, after due advertisement under said mortgages, the plaintiff sold both places—the home place for $595 to Mrs. Mary A. E. Gist, who received a deed therefor; and the mill tract to the plaintiff for $705, who took no deed.

The testimony was taken in open court before Judge Pressley, who afterwards filed the following decree, omitting some matters elsewhere stated:

Plaintiff also seeks judgment against Sarah Jones for $37.57 due to him on open account, to which she makes no objections, but claims a large amount for damages by plaintiff in selling her land at an unreasonable time, after agreeing in the second mortgage for time to be given to her on said debts. It was then supposed that Mrs. Gist would sign the said mortgage with her mother. She refused to do that, and as it was then thought that she had an estate in remainder, in all the "home place" after the life estate of her mother, and as plaintiff regarded the life estate not sufficient security, his selling the same under the mortgage was no breach of his contract.

surety on the first note, because he alleges that plaintiff gave time to principal debtor without the assent of the surety. The testimony on that point shows that he was not present when the second mortgage was executed, but it also shows that he had been previously consulted in the matter, and gave his active aid to procure to it the signature of Mrs. Gist. His claim of discharge is, therefore, not sustained by the testimony.

The remaining question is, whether Sarah Jones was sole owner of the mill place. It belonged to her husband, Jesse Jones, who, on the 30th September, 1856, three days before his death, by will directed that it be sold for payment of his debts. He also set aside eight slaves to be sold for that purpose, and directed that if said slaves and lands were not sufficient to pay his debts, then two other slaves, bequeathed to his wife, should be sold to pay them. Sarah Jones, his widow, and Joseph Hill, her brother, qualified on said will as executrix and executor. They sold one of the slaves for $1,000, and the widow, without further sale, paid the rest of said debts. The amount of them is not satisfactorily proved. Her returns to the ordinary show more than $3,300, but her daughter Laura died in or about the year 1859, and the widow made no returns after that. Jesse Jones was administrator of his father's estate, and had an interest in it, but was indebted to it so that there was a considerable balance against him paid by his widow and not included in the said $3,300. She testifies that because she paid the debts which the "mill place" was to be sold to pay, she always considered that it thereby became her property, and as such she has ever since claimed and held it.

Defendant, Mrs. Gist, claims that a portion of said debts were paid by the crops on hand when her father died, and by the stock on the home place and the annual proceeds of the "mill place." But it is not satisfactorily proved that said proceeds of the mill place were ever sufficient to pay the taxes and repairs, and to keep down the interest on the debts paid for the estate. As to the crops on hand, they are expressly appropriated by the will to the education of testator's daughters, and the stock is directed to be kept on the place in the discretion of the executrix and the executor, and there is no proof that any of it was sold. Mary Gist was married in 1806, and is now 36 or 37 years old. She testifies that she did not know until lately why her mother held the mill place; that she lately knew the whole of it was mortgaged to plaintiff, and made no objection, either before or at the sale under foreclosure. Her husband testifies that he knew long ago, does not remember how long, that Mrs. Jones claimed the mill place as her own, and so held it.

At the time Mrs. Jones mortgaged the "home place," she had not only a life estate therein, but also a share in remainder, by reason of the previous death of her daughter Laura. Plaintiff was ignorant of that fact, not only when he sold the home place under the mortgage, but also up to and after the time of filing his complaint in this case. The true interest of Mrs. Jones in the home place was of sufficient value to pay both debts due to plaintiff with interest, but there are no proper allegations in the complaint to authorize me to make any decree concerning that sale.

Though I cannot fix the amount of the debts of Jesse Jones paid by Mrs. Jones, yet I have no hesitation in finding, and do find, that after applying the $1,000, proceeds of the sale of the slaves, there remains a balance due to her for debts of Jesse Jones, paid by her out of proceeds of her crops, exceeding considerably the sum of $2,300, and that the mill place could not then, or since, have been sold for that sum. Jesse Jones gave only $1,700 for it a year or two before his death, and his will, made three days before his death, plainly indicates his doubt whether the mill place and the eight slaves would suffice to pay his debts.

I therefore adjudge and decree, that Mrs. Jones had a lien on the mill place for the money advanced by her to more than its value, and that her holding the same for so long a time has perfected her title. And further, that her right is vested in plaintiff to the extent of his note, with interest.

I further adjudge, that plaintiff have judgment and execution against Sarah Jones for the sum of $37.57.

The question of usurious interest need not be decided, because it is raised only by Mrs. Gist, and she has no interest in the property mortgaged to secure plaintiff's debt.

The question of the final liability of Joseph Hill, for any balance which may remain unpaid on the notes to which he is surety, after exhausting the property mortgaged, must remain undecided *until the end of the litigation, if any, concerning the sale of the home place. If there should be no such litigation, then the $595 for which it sold must be applied pro rata to the second note and the balance which may remain unpaid on the first note after applying to it the proceeds of the mill place.

It is ordered and adjudged, that James Munro, clerk of the court, after due advertisement, do sell the mill place at public auction at Union Court House, on salesday in next February, for one-half cash, remainder payable in one year with interest from day of sale, secured by bond of the purchaser with mortgage of the land, the purchaser to have the right to pay all cash. The proceeds of said sale are to be applied to the payment of the costs of this case, the remainder to be paid to the plaintiff, not exceeding the sum of $911.95, with interest from the 25th of December, 1882.

The plaintiff has leave, as he may be advised, to amend his complaint by adding such allegations as deemed necessary for the proper sale of the home place, and the defendants, Sarah Jones and Joseph Hill, or either of them, has leave to offer testimony as to the rents of the mill place for the year 1884, and to have the amount applied to the mortgage debt.

The exceptions to this decree are fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. D. A. Townsend, for plaintiff.

Mr. William Munro, for Joseph Hill.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. It will be necessary, for a proper understanding of this case, that the complaint and answers should be set out in full, and also the decree of the Circuit Judge, his honor, Judge Pressley. These papers, therefore, will be appended to this opinion, so that they may be incorporated by the reporter as a heading hereto. A short synopsis of the case, however, will be given here.

*The plaintiff held two mortgages of the defendant, Sarah Jones. One covered a tract of land known as the "mill place," and was given to secure the payment of a sealed note for $911.15, to which the defendant, Jos. Hill, was surety; the other to secure this first note and another for $494.55 (reduced by a credit to $294.55), bearing 10 per cent. interest. This covered a tract of land known as the "home place." This note was dated in January, 1884, the first in February, 1882. At the time of the mortgage of the mill place, it was represented to the plaintiff that Mrs. Jones was the sole owner thereof, and the plaintiff accepted the mortgage with that understanding. The mortgages contained a power of sale, and under this power the said lands were sold by the plaintiff, the defendant, Mrs. Gist, purchasing the home place at $595, and the plaintiff the mill place at $705.

After this sale, the plaintiff became satisfied that he had been misled as to the ownership of the mill place by Mrs. Jones, the mortgagor, and the action below was instituted for relief from his purchase, seeking to set aside the sale of the mill place to himself on account of misrepresentations by Mrs. Jones, and also a decree ordering a resale of said place, the proceeds to be applied to the notes, and a judgment for any deficiency against the defendants—Mrs. Jones and the surety, Jos. Hill, we suppose. The defendants answered separately. Hill claimed that he had been released from his suretyship, because time had been given his principal, and insisted that the sale of the mill tract should be declared good and valid, and that the plaintiff should be held to his purchase, admitting that he had represented to the plaintiff that Mrs. Jones had title to said place, which he believed to be true. Mrs. Jones admitted that she had made the representations mentioned as to the mill place, believing at the time that she had titles thereto, because she had paid certain debts of her deceased husband, by whose will this place was directed to be sold to pay his debts. Mrs. Gist claimed that she was the owner of one undivided half of the land embraced in the mortgage, as heir at law of her deceased father, Jesse Jones, and as heir at law of a deceased sister, Laura, who had died since the death of her father, and she prayed an accounting from her mother Sarah for *the rents and profits while she had been in possession, some eighteen years.

Judge Pressley, who heard the case, held, first, that Hill could not be released from his suretyship, as the testimony negatived his ground for discharge. He held, second, that Mrs. Jones had paid debts of her husband more than the value of the land, sufficient to give her a lien on the mill place for reimbursement, said place having been directed in the will of her husband, Jesse Jones, to be sold to pay his debts, of which will she and her brother, the said Jos. Hill, were executors; and that her long possession, with this lien, had perfected her title, which had vested in the plaintiff to the extent of his note and interest. He further adjudged "that Mrs. Gist had no interest in the property mortgaged to pay plaintiff's debt," and, further he decreed "that the question of the final liability of Joseph Hill, for any balance which may remain unpaid on the notes to which he is surety, after exhausting the mortgaged property, must remain undecided until the end of the litigation, if any, concerning the sale of the home place. If there should be no such litigation, then the $595, for which it sold, must be applied pro rata to the second note, and the balance which may remain unpaid on the first note, after applying to it the proceeds of the mill place"; finally ordering James Munro, clerk of the court, to sell the mill place on certain terms, the proceeds when collected to be applied to the costs of this case, the remainder to be paid to the plaintiff, not exceeding the sum of $911.95, with interest from December 25, 1882, giving leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint, by adding other allegations, as deemed necessary, for the proper sale of the home place, and also leave to the defendants, Sarah Jones and Joseph Hill, to offer testimony as to the rent of the mill place for the year 1884, and to have the amount applied to the mortgage debt.

From this decree, or at least from portions of it, each of the defendants, except Mrs. Jones, appealed upon separate exceptions. Mrs. Gist, because his honor held that the defendant, Mrs. Jones, had a lien on the mill place for the money advanced to more than its value, and that her holding had perfected her title; and, further, that her right had vested in the plaintiff to the extent of *his note: and, further, because he held that she, Mrs. Gist, had no interest in the property mortgaged. Joseph Hill, because his honor held that the proceeds of the home place should be applied ratably to the two notes after applying the proceeds of the mill place to the note secured thereby, and also because he held that the plaintiff should be relieved from the purchase of the mill place when the complaint should have been dismissed. And the plaintiff appealed, because his honor should have decreed that the proceeds of the sale of the home place should have been applied first to the payment of the second note and not applied pro rata to both notes.

The other portions of the decree stood unappealed, to wit: the refusal to discharge Joseph Hill from the note on which he was surety, his final liability thereon for any balance, and the sale of the mill place ordered, which, in effect, set aside the previous sale made by the defendant under the mortgage, except that Joseph Hill urged that the plaintiff should be held to his purchase.

We will take up Mrs. Gist's exceptions first. She claims that his honor erred in holding that Mrs. Jones had a lien on the mill place for moneys advanced for the estate, and that her long holding of the mill place had vested in her title therein, which had vested in the plaintiff to the extent of his note and interest, and also in holding that she, Mrs. Gist, had no interest in this property.

Upon an examination of the will of the testator, Jesse Jones, it will be found that he made no disposition of the proceeds of this tract of land nor of the eight negroes embraced in the same clause of the will with this land except impliedly, the implication arising from a subsequent clause in which he stated, "if the property willed to be sold is not sufficient to pay my just debts, I will that Lyge and Wesley, if both be required, be sold for that purpose." There is no residuary clause in the will. Nor does he dispose of his personal assets, if any, except the negroes. He first directed that all of his just debts be paid, and after giving his home place to his wife for life, then to his two daughters, and also disposing of certain of his negroes, he directed eight negroes and the remainder of his land (mill place), to be sold as above, with the two negroes, Lyge and Wesley, as above. He therefore *died intestate as to the eight negroes and the mill place, except that they should be sold, and impliedly that the proceeds thereof should be applied to his debts—nothing said as to the excess, if any.

The defendants, Sarah Jones and her brother, Joseph Hill, qualified as executor and executrix, and thereby they became invested with the power to sell the property mentioned. In the meantime the title to the mill place descended to the heirs at law, to wit, the widow and the two daughters; and one of the daughters having since died (Laura), leaving her mother, Sarah, and her sister, Mary, her heirs at law, her share descended to them, in whom the title has been ever since in equal moieties unless the title of Mrs. Gist has been divested and obtained by Mrs. Jones by her long possession. As to this we find no such onus in the case as would entitle Mrs. Jones to claim the land by possession. She took and held possession under the will of her husband for a certain purpose, and there does not seem to have been any act of hers "until the execution of the mortgage" showing any claim against the will.

Now, the question arises, had she, by virtue of paying the debts of the estate from her own means, such a lien on the mill place, as held by the Circuit Judge, which she could transfer to the plaintiff to secure a private debt of her own? No doubt Mrs. Jones, upon final settlement of the estate of her husband, would be entitled to reimbursement for all sums she may have paid from her own funds, and no doubt she could transfer this right to another, but before obtaining such reimbursement she would be required to account for all of the assets of the estate which she had held as executrix. In other words, before she could claim reimbursement she should show that she had made payments over and above the assets for which she was legitimately accountable. But we know of no authority by which she could in advance of settlement lay claim to any specific property of the deceased and deal with it as her own; for instance, mortgaging it for her private debts, as was done here of the mill place. The executors under the will had power to sell the mill place, the proceeds to be accounted for to the estate and the distributees thereof. This was the extent of their power and their duty.

*Have they made such sale? Not so, unless the mortgage to the plaintiff can be regarded as a sale, and therefore an execution of the power. The mortgage was not a sale; certainly not such as the will directed. It was not in execution of the power with which the will invested the executors. It was therefore void as a legal paper, and the sale by the plaintiff under it was equally void. The land then stands as if no such sale had been made with the title thereto in Mrs. Jones and the defendant, Mrs. Gist, and it has been subject to be sold under the will by the executors during all the time since the death of the testator. It has not been sold, and now the decree of his honor below has ordered a sale. From this portion of the decree there is no appeal, either from Mrs. Jones or Mrs. Gist, and we are not warranted therefore in disturbing it. Besides, doubtless, if there was an appeal this is the best course to be taken under all the circumstances.

But then comes the application of the proceeds which presents a difficult question. The decree directs that these shall be applied after the costs to the payment of the plaintiff's note for $911.95. This was directed on the theory of the lien of the plaintiff through the mortgage. According to our view above the plaintiff has no lien, therefore he is not entitled in the first instance to the proceeds of the sale. On the contrary, we think that these proceeds must be the subject of administration by the executors or under the direction of the court, as the other assets of the estate may be, Mrs. Gist being entitled as one of the distributees of her father's estate to one-half of such portion of said proceeds as may remain after payment of the debts of the estate, Mrs. Jones first accounting for the other personal assets previously disposed of (in so far as she may be accountable), before subjecting these proceeds to her reimbursement, and the plaintiff being entitled to set up his mortgage against the share of Mrs. Jones therein, should there be any remaining after Mrs. Gist has been paid not only her half of these proceeds but also such other portion as she may be entitled to from the balance of the personal estate, if any, after paying of debts and reimbursing Mrs. Jones for such amounts as she may have paid on the debts from her own funds. This is a complicated matter and it is not free from difficulties in any view which may be taken, but we think the course indicated above is the best that can be done in view of both the legal and equitable rights of the parties.

The Circuit Judge made no decree as to the sale of the home place. In fact, that matter was not embraced in the complaint, and no prayer therein in reference to said sale. He did, however, decree that, in the event there was no subsequent litigation about the home place, that the proceeds thereof should be applied pro rata upon both notes after applying to the first note for $911.95, the proceeds of the mill place. There was no error in this, supposing that there were proceeds of the mill place now to be applied; but there being none as yet, the proceeds of the home place should be applied pro rata to both notes secured by it, in case there is no further litigation as to the home place. The Circuit Judge also left the final liability of Joseph Hill, as surety, open: as also whether the defendants should pay such deficiency of the notes as might remain after the application of the proceeds of the sales. As we have said, there has been no appeal from these matters. They are, therefore, not before us. The exceptions of the defendant, Joseph Hill, and of the plaintiff, Graham, are disposed of above.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified as herein, and that the case be remanded for further proceedings as the parties may be advised.

JOHNSON v. PELOT.

In an action for partition, an order referring the case to the master "to state the account of the defendant for the receipts of rents and profits of said lot of land for a period commencing six years prior to the commencement of this suit and extending up to the date of his report, together with all improvements thereon," was an order of inquiry only, and did not fix any liability upon defendant for the rent of houses on the premises.

6. Petition for rehearing refused.

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, July, 1885.

This was an appeal from the following Circuit decree:

The report makes no recommendations, but simply stated the accounts, the master therein obeying the order of reference, and supplying the facts necessary to a decree by the court.

As to the exceptions, I think they are not well taken. The decree did not commit the valuation of the improvements to the commissioners, but distinctly referred it to the master. The valuation made by the commissioners was no more than an expression of opinion on their part by individuals, and in no way binding upon any one. The master proceeded properly to take the testimony of witnesses, and to decide upon such testimony.

The second exception is not well taken, because the decree directed the accounts to be taken of "the receipt of rents and profits," and not for the use and occupation of the premises, the presiding judge no doubt holding that the defendant was not actually in possession of more than her share of the premises, and that she ought not to be charged for the use of a house erected at her own cost.

The exceptions must therefore be overruled, and the report confirmed.

It remains to consider and determine the rights of the parties in relation to the improvements, and the rents and profits. And first the question arises whether the decree has already determined that the defendant is chargeable with her receipts of rents and profits, and to be allowed for her improvements. The decree has determined nothing upon those questions, but very properly referred the subject to the master to state the accounts, in order that when the question came before the court for determination, a full and complete decision might be made. The partition of the land alone was committed to the commissioners, and these questions were reserved for consideration at a future period.

I will therefore proceed to determine these questions, and first as to the plaintiff's right to the rents and profits claimed. Defendant held the premises as her own, believing herself entitled to the same as her own and exclusive property, without any knowledge or notice of the plaintiff's rights therein, and under such circumstances as were well calculated to induce such belief, she was entirely innocent, and held bona fide. When the possession of the defendant commenced, there was no building upon the lot but the "old kitchen." All other improvements thereon were made by the defendant. All the rents received, except from the old kitchen, were due to those improvements.

A tenant in common is not chargeable for rents and profits derived from improvements made by himself, "when he had reason to believe, and did honestly believe, that he had fee simple title in severalty to the land so improved." "In such cases the tenant will be allowed compensation; and if practicable, in partition, the part of the land so improved will be assigned to the tenant who made the improvements, without charging him with the value of said improvements; that is to say, the partition will be made without reference to the improvements." This is the language of the court in the latest case on the subject; Buck v. Martin, 21 S. C., 592 [53 Am. Rep. 702]; citing Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 476; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C., 337; Annely v. DeSaussure, 17 Id., 391; Johnson v. Harrelson, 18 Id., 604. In the case cited, it was ordered that the commissioners should assign, if practicable, to the improving tenant the portion improved without charging her for the value of the improvements, or if the land be sold, that the amount added to the value of the land by the improvements be allowed her out of the proceeds of sale before an equal division of the same. In that case the co-tenants had concurred, some being minors, in permitting the improvements, but the court applied to the case the same principle applicable to the cases of tenants who bona fide believe themselves the sole owners of the land; that principle is stated as follows in 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 655: "When improvements have been erected by a co-tenant, which add value to the common estate, and erected under circumstances which would make it a great and obvious hardship upon the improving tenant to deprive him entirely of the benefit of such improvements, throwing their whole value into the common estate for partition, the disposition of the Court of Equity has always been to give the improving tenant the benefit of them, so far as consistent with the equity of the co-tenants."

If this manifest equity of an improving tenant is so strong as to entitle him to the whole value of his improvements, surely it will protect him from accountability for the rents and profits received by him, due wholly to such improvements. But we are not left to this analogy, but have authority on the very point in Lewis v. Price (3 Rich. Eq., 198), where it was said by the court, "Rent is not allowable for premises which the tenant has rendered capable of yielding rent, which they could not before; and that by parity of reasoning the tenant is not chargeable for so much of the rent of the premises as his improvements have contributed to produce."

It follows, from these authorities, that the defendant is accountable for neither the value of the improvements made by herself, nor for rents received by her, which were due to the improvements made by herself. The kitchen was on the premises when the tenant went into possession. She must account for the rent received on it, but such accounting ought not to extend further than to the receipts on that account, accruing since the demand of the plaintiff to be admitted to her share of the common estate. Until that time there was no ouster, and therefore no right to share in the rents received.

The commissioners appear to have considered the parcels of land divided to be of equal value without the improvements, which they value separately. They allotted to the defendant that portion upon which the kitchen was situated, and to the *plaintiff that portion upon which was the work-shop erected by the defendant. The former (the kitchen) is valued by the master at one hundred dollars, and the work-shop at two hundred dollars. The defendant must pay to the plaintiff the half of the value of the kitchen, while she is entitled to the whole value of the work-shop. Setting off the one against the other, the plaintiff must pay one hundred and fifty dollars to the defendant for equality in respect of the improvements. But the defendant must account to the plaintiff for the one-half of the rent of the kitchen from the time of the commencement of this action, and will be allowed credit for so much of the taxes as she has paid since the same date, as is chargeable, to wit, one-half of the tax upon the land and the kitchen, without regard to the other improvements.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that it be referred to the master to adjust the accounts between the parties upon the principles and in the manner herein set forth and determined, and to report the same to this court; and that in all other respects the report of the master, hereinbefore made, be confirmed, and the exceptions thereto be overruled; that the return of the commissioners in partition, in so far as concerns the allotment made by them of their respective moieties of the said lot of land to the parties, be confirmed, and that they be vested respectively in the said parties in severalty, and that they be let into possession of the same accordingly; subject, however, to the result of the accounting herein provided for, and the payment of any assessment that may be made thereon by the court in pursuance thereof; that each party pay one-half of the costs of this action.

Messrs. Lyles & Haynsworth, for plaintiff.
Mr. S. W. Melton, contra.

February 24, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The purpose of the action below was to partition certain real estate situate in the City of Columbia, and in possession of the defendant, in which plaintiff claimed a moiety. The plaintiff's title being disputed, this question was submitted to a jury, who found for the plaintiff one-half of the land. Thereupon the Circuit Judge, Hon. W. H. Wallace, after stating certain facts found by himself, ordered a writ in partition, awarding one-half in fee to the plaintiff and the remaining half in fee to the defendant. "At the same time he referred the case to the master to state the account of the defendant, Octavia Pelot, for the receipts of rents and profits of said lot of land for a period commencing six years prior to the commencement of this suit and extending up to the date of his report, together with all improvements thereon."

The commissioners in charge of the writ made their return in January, 1885, in which they stated that they had divided the land into two equal portions as to area, each fronting on Gervais street, and had allotted to the defendant the western half, and to the plaintiff the eastern. On the western half was a dwelling, or store, which had been erected thereon by the defendant during her possession, and a kitchen which was there when she took possession. The dwelling, or store, they valued at $300, the kitchen at $100. On the eastern half was a store, or work-shop, erected by the defendant; this they valued at $150.

The master made his report, valuing the dwelling at $400, the kitchen at $100, and the work-house, or store, at $200. He also reported upon the rents and profits received by the defendant for six years, amounting to $313—$183.75 of which was derived from the kitchen, the balance from the other houses, principally the work-shop; upon which aggregate, after crediting taxes, $166.50, a balance was left of $146.50. The master made no recommendation, but simply reported the facts. He also reported the rental value of these houses. To this report the plaintiff excepted: 1. Because the master did not adopt the valuation fixed by the commissioners in partition, as the true value of the improvements. 2. Because the master did not find that the defendant had occupied the dwelling from December 15, 1877, and did not charge her with the rental value thereof.

The case then came up before his honor, Judge Kershaw, who overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report, and, holding that the case had been referred to the master for no other purpose but to collect the facts in reference to receipt of rents and *profits by the defendant and the value of the improvements, so that the rights of the parties might be properly adjudicated, proceeded to such adjudication, holding that the defendant was not accountable for either the value of the improvements made by herself or the rents received from such improvements, but that she was accountable for the rent received from the kitchen, such accounting, however, not to extend beyond the time of demand by the plaintiff to be admitted to her share of the common estate; and, adopting the value of the improvements as estimated by the master instead of the commissioners, he held that the defendant was responsible to the plaintiff for half of the kitchen, $50, and that plaintiff was responsible for the whole value of the store or work-shop on her lot, it having been erected thereon by the defendant, to wit, $200; resulting to the defendant from plaintiff $150 out of the improvements, the defendant to account for one-half of the rents received from the kitchen from the commencement of the action, first deducting therefrom one-half taxes paid on said kitchen from same date. He ordered and adjudged, that it be referred to the master to adjust the accounts between the parties according to the principles set forth, and that in all other respects the report of the master under consideration be confirmed and the exceptions thereto be overruled, each party to pay one-half of the costs.

Both parties appealed, the plaintiff alleging: I. That his honor should have held the decree of Judge Wallace as fixing the liability of defendant for rents and profits for a period of six years before the action, and that he should, therefore, have decreed such liability as to the kitchen. II. That he should have held defendant to accountability for the ground rent of that portion of the premises improved by the defendant. III. Because he erred in holding the plaintiff accountable for the value of the store or shop erected by the defendant upon that portion of the lot assigned to the plaintiff. IV. Because the costs had been fixed in the decree of Judge Wallace upon the defendant, and Judge Kershaw should have so held. The defendant's appeal raises but one question, to wit, that his honor erred in decreeing that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the half value of the kitchen as ascertained by the master.

*We think the construction put by Judge Kershaw upon the decree of Judge Wallace, in referring the case to the master, was correct. At the time that Judge Wallace ordered this reference, the case was not ripe for settling the rights of the parties. The facts were not before him; they had not been fully developed, especially as to the very matters involved, and upon which a final decree was to be made. Judge Wallace did not in his decree lay down any principle to which the report should conform; he simply required the master to ascertain certain facts, to wit, the receipts by the defendant of the rents and profits of the whole lot for six years, together with the improvements. It does not seem to be contended that this decree fixed accountability upon the defendant for the whole lot. Why not, if it fixed accountability as to the kitchen for the six years? The order of Judge Wallace, in our opinion, was no more than an intermediate order, searching for information, preparatory to a final decree, upon which information Judge Kershaw properly proceeded to adjudicate the rights of the parties, untrammelled.

As already stated, we do not understand that plaintiff contends that the decree of Judge Wallace fixed any liability on the defendant for rents and profits received from improvements erected by her on the lot, but she contends that the accountability of defendant as to the rent of the kitchen was fixed, and this for six years, and she now raises the question that whether this was fixed or not, yet that his honor erred in not requiring the defendant thus to account, and also in not requiring an accounting for the ground rent of so much of the lot upon which the new buildings stood, this much at least being, as alleged, common property, made use of by the defendant. It appears among the findings of fact by the master that the defendant went into possession of the lot in question upon the death of her grandmother, Suckey McGru, "under the belief that she was the sole owner," and she no doubt so held it until the demand by action was made upon her, erecting improvements thereon without question. Under these circumstances, the law permits her to be exempt from liability for the rents and profits anterior to a demand by action. See the case of Woodward v. Clarke, 4 Strob. Eq., 170, and especially our recent case of *Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C., 368; Freeman on Co-ten., § 258, and Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq., 381. We do not find that his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in applying the principle of these cases to the facts here.

As to the ground rent of the precise locus upon which the improvements were erected, or of the unimproved portion, the master does not seem to have estimated this, nor did the Circuit Judge rule upon that point. There was no exception to the master's report involving this point, nor any claim made for it before the Circuit Judge; but even if this question was properly before us, we have been referred to no case, nor have we found any, where, in estimating rents and profits against a co-tenant for improvements, a distinction has been drawn between said improvements and the ground upon which they stood, the improving tenant being exempt for the one and held liable for the other. It is manifest here that the unimproved ground was worthless except for the improvements, and also that that portion on which the improvements were erected was made rentable only on account of the improvements, so that its rentable value, if any, was due to the improvements, and might well be classed as an improvement made by the tenant's own labor, and therefore exempt, as the houses have been exempt. Lewis v. Price, 3 Rich. Eq., 198.

The equity of the defendant in this case to be reimbursed for her improvements on the portion of the lot assigned to the plaintiff is supported by the following authorities: Scaife v. Thomson, supra; Woodward v. Clarke, 4 Strob. Eq. 167; Rowland v. Bess, 2 McCord Eq., 317. Judge Kershaw says that the commissioners seem to have considered the parcels of land allotted to each of the parties to be of equal value without the improvements. These improvements, then, were left open as a matter for adjudication in the final determination of the rights and equities of the parties, and we do not think that Judge Kershaw erred in requiring the plaintiff to account for the value of the store or shop erected on her lot at the expense of the defendant under the circumstances of the case.

There is no ground for defendant's exception claiming exemption from the half value of the old kitchen, as decreed by the judge.

*The only thing remaining is the matter of costs. This is an equity case, and the costs are under the control of the judge, if he sees proper to decree on that question; otherwise costs follow the event of the suit, as in cases at law. Judge Wallace's order of reference was not such a final decree as would carry costs, in the absence of an order otherwise. It was competent, therefore, for Judge Kershaw to decree on this matter.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

In this case a petition was filed by the plaintiff asking a rehearing of so much of her appeal as was embraced in her third exception, upon the ground that a tenant in common, to whom has been assigned in severalty a portion of the land, cannot be required to pay for improvements put, without his consent, upon such portion by a co-tenant; citing and quoting from Dellet v. Whitner, Chev. Eq., 229; Martin v. Evans, 1 Strob. Eq., 355; Thurston v. Dickinson, 2 Rich. Eq., 317 [46 Am. Dec. 56]; Lewis v. Price, 3 Rich. Eq., 198; Thompson v. Bostick, McMull. Eq., 79; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 476; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 337; Annely v. De Saussure, 17 Id., 391; Buck v. Martin, 21 Id., 599 [53 Am. Rep. 702].

May 24, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. As a general rule, and in ordinary cases, where co-tenants are well known and easy of access, and improvements are made by one without consultation with the others, they are made at the risk of the improving tenant, and will not, as matter of right, be allowed him in the partition of the premises. 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 655; Thurston v. Dickinson, 2 Rich. Eq., 317 [46 Am. Dec. 56]; Dellet v. Whitner, Chev. Eq., 223; Hancock v. Day, McMull. Eq., 69 [36 Am. Dec. 293]; Thompson v. Bostick, McMull. Eq., 79. Where, however, improvements are made by one co-tenant under the belief that he has in severalty a fee simple title to the premises, or where said improvements have been erected under circumstances which would make it a great and obvious hardship upon the improving tenant to deprive him entirely of their benefit, the disposition of the Court of Equity *has always been to give him the benefit thereof if practicable, and as far as consistent with the equity of the co-tenants, especially as against the claim of one who subsequently thereto establishes his right as co-tenant. 1 Story Eq., § 655.

Under this principle, the cases of Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq., 476; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C., 368; Annely v. De Saussure, 17 S. C., 391; Johnson v. Harrelson, 18 S. C., 604; Buck v. Martin, 21 S. C., 592 [53 Am. Rep. 702], were decided, modifying the general rule above by allowing the improving tenant not the original cost of his improvements, but the increased value of the premises imparted in consequence of said improvements, this benefit being secured to him either by assigning the improved portion of the premises to him without charging the improvements, or by sale of the premises, the increased purchase money in consequence of the improvements being allowed him in the distribution of the proceeds of said sale. The equity, however, of the improving tenant to this added value does not depend upon the mode which was adopted in these cases to enforce it, but it rests upon the facts of each case, and is applicable to every case where the facts are of such a character as to demand it, and where, at the same time, it can be enforced without injustice to others, as where the improving tenant has reason to believe that he is the exclusive owner, or where it would be a great and obvious hardship to deprive him of it, and at the same time accompanied with the further fact that the allowance can be made consistently with the equity of the co-tenants. Story Eq., supra.

Now, in the case at bar the improvements were made while the improving tenant was in the exclusive possession of the premises, holding as sole owner, and before even any claim or notice of opposing title had been made upon her. There was no doubt, therefore, as to the equity of her claim to the value of the improvements erected by her, and inasmuch as the added value of these improvements, independent of the land, was fully ascertained by testimony taken before the master at the time and with the view to the partition sought, the enforcement of this equity here, and under the facts of the case, was not only proper, but was in full accord with the cases, supra, sustaining the modification of the general rule. It will be seen at once, therefore, that *there is no conflict between the case at bar and the cases referred to in the petition and cited to the general rule. Nor were said cases overlooked by us in rendering our judgment.

We have been more elaborate in giving the reasons for dismissing this petition than usual, for the reason that there is a manifest misapprehension on the part of counsel as to the decisions of this court on the subject of improvements by co-tenants. The petition is dismissed.

ROBERTSON v. LYON.

[1. Insane Persons ⇨ 2.]

In an action to vacate a finding of lunacy under proper proceedings had in the Court of Probate the question of plaintiff's sanity was submitted to a jury, who found against the plaintiff, and the Circuit Judge approved their verdict. On appeal to this court the evidence was carefully examined and the same conclusion reached.

[2. Insane Persons ☞1.]

Per Hudson, J. What is a condition of lunacy, stated.

[A verdict or finding will not be set aside on appeal, as against the weight of evidence, if the lower court has refused to set it aside, unless the preponderance is very decided.]

Before Hudson, J., Abbeville, February, 1884.

The opinion sufficiently states the case. The Circuit Judge was requested by plaintiff to charge as follows:

1. Persons non compos mentis are those who have not the regular use of the understanding sufficient to deal with discretion in the common affairs of life.

2. The term non compos mentis and of unsound mind mean the same thing, and have a determinate legal signification, importing not weakness of understanding, but a total deprivation of sense. The fact of soundness or unsoundness of mind does not depend on nor can it be collected from particular actions, but upon the general frame and habit of the mind.

3. Where it is seen that the prevailing characteristic of the mind is the absence of reasoning faculties, accompanied with only occasional manifestations of them, or where only in rare instances the reasoning powers can be detected at all, or where all the evidence tends to the conclusion that the individual is incapable of *transacting the ordinary affairs of life, then it is unsoundness of mind.

The judge responded to these requests as follows: These propositions are correct and charged, but with such modifications as render them applicable to the case at bar.

His general charge was as follows: This is a grave issue to the plaintiff. If he is not a lunatic, he should be allowed the free use and enjoyment of his property during his life, and the unrestrained right of disposing thereof after death. On the other hand, if he is a lunatic, it is equally important to him that some prudent person should be appointed to manage and care for that property in the interest of the lunatic. The law, in a spirit of humanity, requires that such should be done and provides the mode of proceeding. In an issue of this grave character you are not to be influenced by feelings of prejudice arising from a supposition that the relatives of the alleged lunatic may desire to place his property beyond his temporary control so that the remainder of it over and above his support may descend to them. You have nothing to consider in regard to their supposed cupidity, but must look with an eye single to the issue of fact here presented.

Now, what is lunacy? Much learning has been displayed upon the subject, much of it of a technical and abstruse character, but you must solve the question with the aid of common sense. In this present inquiry lunacy is a term of general import, embracing every kind of insanity or unsoundness of mind that incapacitates a person to attend to the ordinary business of life. It is not a mere weakness of mind nor a want of good business talent, nor is it thoughtlessness and improvidence in business. Men of sound minds are frequently spendthrifts. Such have the full right to use, enjoy, waste, and destroy their property, and it is nobody's business nor right to interfere. Some men waste their all in gambling and dissipation, but cannot be pronounced insane in the proper sense of the word. That unsoundness of mind, that lunacy which we are inquiring after in this issue, is such an unsoundness of mind as is evidenced by a total absence of sufficient capacity (mentally) to attend to the ordinary business of life. When one is entirely incapable of caring *for, controlling, and managing his own person and property, he is in the eye of the law a lunatic, requiring a guardian.

This may arise from various causes, and among them from old age, when it is termed senilis dementia. It happens when the body outlives the mind. Some men live to be very aged and very feeble in mind and in body, and yet it would be an act of inhumanity to have them declared lunatics and deprived of the free use and enjoyment of their property; whilst there are still others who, in their old age, become utterly incapable, mentally, to manage themselves and property, and in absence of relatives to take charge and manage for them the law and humanity require guardians to be appointed.

The language used in Foster v. Meaus, Speers Eq., 569 [42 Am. Dec. 332], and cited by Mr. Noble, is not exactly the language I would use. It is there said that the term "non compos mentis" means a total deprivation of sense. Now, if by this is meant that the mind is a blank, having not a spark of intelligence or sense, such language would be too strong and sweeping in the issue now before us. I take it that one may have a spark of intelligence, a scintilla of sense, and yet be a lunatic over whose property a guardian should be appointed. With this explanation or interpretation the law of that case is applicable to this, and I adopt and charge all the propositions of Mr. Noble with this modification of the term "total deprivation of sense." A non compos mentis, a lunatic, is a person who is so far deprived (from any cause) of intelligence and sense as to be incapable of caring for and managing his person and property, and who for that purpose absolutely requires a guardian. You must gather from the testimony the general frame and state of the mind, the general habit of the man in connection with his business in daily life, in order to measure the mental capacity. It is not enough to justify you in pronouncing one a lunatic that he has been known now and then to do very foolish and silly things.

Now, in this case Mr. Robertson has been adjudged a lunatic by an inquisition duly appointed. That judgment is prima facie evidence of his lunacy and casts upon him the burden of traversing the same successfully. But you must remember that it was an ex parte proceeding, and by the evidence heard upon the stand *in this trial and that alone are you to be governed. In weighing this testimony you should attach more weight to the testimony of witnesses who give you facts than to that of those who are unable to state facts which shed light upon the condition and state of his mind. Ask yourselves the question, What has the man done and what is he still doing from which can be drawn the inference of sanity or insanity? That he bought goods, paid for them, walks the streets, recognizes acquaintances, these are tangible facts from which inferences can be drawn, and are better than a meaningless "because" in response to questions.

The testimony of experts is of much importance in issues of this kind, and is to have more or less weight according as the witness may or may not have had the advantage of experience and practice in such matters. But such testimony, like all others, is to be weighed by you and subjected to the test of the common sense method of scrutiny. That is, you must look to and examine the foundations upon which the expert bases his belief.

Weigh well all the testimony adduced and be governed by the preponderance of the evidence. If it be true that at the time of the inquisition Mr. Robertson was only mentally enfeebled from a "spree," and that though of weak mind he has capacity to manage his business, even though badly, the verdict of the inquisition was wrong and you should correct it. If, on the contrary, you find from the whole testimony that he was then and now is non compos mentis—a lunatic—in the sense in which I have explained the term, your verdict should so speak.

The jury having rendered a verdict in the negative on both questions submitted, the matter was further argued before the Circuit Judge, who rendered the following decree:

This case having come on for trial at the present term of said court, and after hearing the pleadings herein, the following issues of fact were submitted to a jury, to wit: 1st. Was John Robertson, the plaintiff, at the time of the inquisition of lunacy mentioned in the pleadings sane, that is, compos mentis? 2d. Is the said John Robertson now sane, that is, compos mentis? After a full hearing the jury rendered a verdict in the negative as to both said issues of fact.

*Upon further argument of counsel, and after due consideration of all the facts in said case, I do not feel that there are such facts in the case as would warrant me in reversing said findings of fact. I feel constrained to concur in the findings of the jury under all the circumstances. The evidence is not such as will justify the court in overruling the verdicts of the inquisition and of the jury in this case and in restoring to the plaintiff, John Robertson, control of his property.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the proceedings of the Probate Court be confirmed and that the complaint herein be dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, for appellant.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. On November 28, 1882, the appellant was adjudged a lunatic on inquisition in Probate Court for Abbeville County, the county in which he resided, the probate judge having first issued a writ de lunatico inquirendo to certain physicians of said county, who, after examination, reported that the intellect of appellant was impaired to such extent as to unfit him for the management of his business, which opinion was confirmed by the verdict of a jury organized according to law in such cases. The jury rendered the following finding: "At the time of the taking of this inquisition the said plaintiff is a lunatic. That his unsoundness of mind is such that he is not sufficient for the government of himself and property. That he is very old and feeble and his habits of late have been very intemperate, and that it would be best to appoint a suitable person to take charge of the person and property of the said plaintiff," which was confirmed by the probate judge. On the next day his honor, Judge Cothran, appointed the defendant, judge of Probate Court, guardian of the person and estate of said plaintiff, &c.

proceeding below by *summons and complaint denying that he was a lunatic and unable to manage his own affairs, and praying that the whole proceeding before the Probate Court be set aside as untrue, unfair, irregular, and illegal, &c. The defendant answered and the matter coming up before his honor, Judge Hudson, he, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, submitted the following questions to a jury for determination, viz.: "1st. Was John Robertson, the plaintiff, at the time of the inquisition of lunacy mentioned in the pleadings, sane, that is, compos mentis? 2d. Is the said John Robertson now sane, that is, compos mentis?" He further ordered that "in this issue the plaintiff shall hold the affirmative, and that the issues heretofore ordered be modified to harmonize herewith." The jury, after full testimony and a charge from the judge, rendered a verdict in the negative as to both said issues of fact, which verdict, after further argument was confirmed by his honor.

The plaintiff has appealed upon three exceptions, two of them alleging not only insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict but a preponderance against it, and therefore the Circuit Judge should have set it aside; and the other, that the verdict was contrary to the charge and for that reason it should have been set aside.

The two first, it will be observed, ask a review of the facts, which can only be had in this court in a case in chancery. Assuming this to be a case of that character, we have taken cognizance of the questions submitted and have given them a careful consideration. We recognize this to be our duty in all cases, but especially have we felt it here when we remembered the grave consequences involved to the plaintiff, accompanied as the case is with the startling proposition that the entire property of the plaintiff, which he has accumulated it may be by his own toil and labor during a long life, should be taken from him against his protest and handed over to another, and also that his person should be under the control and direction of that other, thus depriving him of many of his rights as a man and citizen. In an ordinary case in chancery the rule which obtains in this court as to the facts is well understood to be that we do not feel ourselves at liberty to reverse the findings below unless they are *entirely without testimony, or manifestly against its weight and preponderance, and our inquiry in such cases is ordinarily confined to those points. But in view of the important considerations suggested above and involved here, and the earnest appeal of plaintiff, we have to some extent relaxed this rule, and in our examination of the testimony have directed our attention not simply to the absence of all evidence, or the alleged manifest repugnance of the verdict against it, but we have gone further and inquired as to the affirmative support of said verdict, and our conclusion is the same as that reached by the Circuit Judge.

We feel constrained to confirm the finding of the jury. Whatever may have been his capacity in former years, we think the weight of the evidence sustains the proposition that now the plaintiff is incapable of managing his business, and that this results not from negligence, carelessness, or indifference, but from unsoundness of mind, which may be the result of old age, or excessive drink, intemperate habits, but nevertheless amounting to an unsoundness. Two of the physicians, experts Drs. Parker and Gary, gave this as their opinion; the first saying "that he was a man of weak mind, amounting to unsoundness," and the latter that he did not think him a man of sound mind, and that his infirmity unfitted him to attend to business; that long and excessive drink would impair the mind and produce senile dementia, and that he thought that Mr. R. was then suffering from the impairment of mind. Dr. Mabry said that he could not say that he was insane or of unsound mind, but said that he testified at the former examination that, in his opinion, his intellect was impaired by infirmities and that he was incapable of attending to business. These opinions of the experts were supported by the testimony of several of the neighbors of the plaintiff. The testimony on the other side was negative, while all this was affirmative.

Besides this, it is a matter to be considered that the first proceeding was a writ de lunatico inquirendo, directed to three physicians to report his condition. Their report is found above. The next was a submission to a jury of the vicinage under the sanction and solemnity of legal proceedings. This jury found as the physicians had found, which was confirmed by the probate *judge, and the last was the submission of the questions to a second jury below who found with the previous findings, which was sustained and confirmed by an eminent and most careful Circuit Judge. Certainly under these circumstances, sustained as we think these different findings are by the testimony, it is our duty to confirm them.

We do not see in what particular the jury disregarded the charge of the judge.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

and tangible form, so that it may be reviewed by this court.

3. Husband and Wife [49½.]

A gift from wife to husband may be inferred from circumstances, such as the use and appropriation by him for a series of years, the wife having knowledge and not objecting; the presumption in such a case being stronger between husband and wife than between strangers. Thus, where a wife permitted her husband to manage her property, receive the profits and issues, and expend the surplus without question for ten years, the judge properly left to the jury the question of gift of these profits and issues.

If there had been no such gift, the recovery of rents was limited, under the plea of the statute, to the six years next before action brought, measured by the condition of the property at the time the husband assumed the charge.

Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, March, 1885.

The charge of the judge to the jury in this case was as follows:

There is no doubt, under the constitution of 1868 and the acts of the legislature passed in pursuance of it, that a husband and wife may deal with each other in business relations as any other two persons. "The wife," says the constitution, "with reference to any property that she may acquire by gift, grant, devise, inheritance, or otherwise, shall be, with regard to that property, as if she were an unmarried woman." That admits of transactions between husband and wife in a business way, which did not obtain in this State before the adoption of the constitution. Before the constitution was adopted, the law regarded a man and his wife as one; but since 1868, the law has been changed or made different.

The plaintiff here is not entitled to recover for more than six years' rent of the place; for the statute of limitations has been pleaded, and that cuts off her right of recovery to everything beyond six years before the time of commencing her suit.

An important inquiry in the case, and the one which is more particularly for you, may be stated in the form of questions to you, which you must answer and not the court; because these questions of fact are only to be determined by the jury. Did McLure appropriate the proceeds of that place as he pleased, and was such appropriation made with the full knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of his wife, Mrs. McLure, during the ten years of the marriage? Was he the sole manager of the property, claiming and using the profits of the place as his own for the joint support of himself and wife, and spending the overplus as he pleased? Was the plaintiff, Mrs. McLure, cognizant of this? Did she know this? Did she permit it? Or did she at any time object to it? Can the claim which the plaintiff presents here be reconciled with her course in regard to the property for ten years, or during the marriage? If it can be done, it is for you to do it, and not for the court.

I charge you as matter of law, that under the terms of this deed, Mrs. McLure had the right, if dissatisfied with her husband's manner of using the property, at any time to take charge of it and lease the land to him or to any other person. She had that right. Well, now, did she do it? Or, did she acquiesce in his use and management of the property? Did she consent to his doing it? How were the proceeds of this place disposed of? Were they carried into a common fund, the corn put into a common crib, the fodder into a common fodder-house, and all used under the direction of the husband, and was that done with her *acquiescence or consent? If it was, and you find so from the evidence, then you cannot find a verdict for the plaintiff. Because the law says that where the marriage relation exists, and the parties cohabit and live together in the same family, that the use of the property which belongs to the wife—if she permits the husband to use and control it as his own—cannot be made a charge upon his estate, nor could property which he bought with the proceeds of those farms, having the sole control, direction, and use of it, be recovered as her property.

The general law is, that where one person buys property with the money of another person and takes a deed in his own name, the law says that that creates in the person taking the deed a resulting trust for the use of the person whose money paid for it. That, now, is in the ordinary dealings of life. But where husband and wife, living together, using the proceeds of her property as a common means of support, increased, it may be, by his care and attention and activity and diligence, if she does not object to that arrangement, he has the right to appropriate it as he pleases. If she consents to that arrangement, he has the right to appropriate it to his own uses, and if he buys property with it, or pays his own debts with it, or expends it in any way that he pleases, the law does not give her after his death the right to go upon that property and affix to it the character of a resulting trust. [Here the judge read to the jury parts of the cases of Reeder & Davis v. Flinn, 6 S. C., 240, and Charles v. Coker, 2 Id., 136.]

You must give effect to the acts of the plaintiff in this case according to what you as reasonable, sensible men judge to have been her manifest intent. What did she mean? Now, that is the question for you to determine. What did she mean by this course of conduct? Did she mean to turn that property over in the condition that it was when McLure married her? Did she mean to turn it over to him as her husband to manage and control and use and dispose of as he thought proper and best? Did she have that much confidence in the head of the family, in the husband whom she had taken, to entrust him with that sole control, direction, use, and management? If she did, then his estate cannot be held responsible for it. But that is for you to say.

The courts say: "The most favorable pre-sumptions are indulged *when the husband is permitted by the wife to be concerned in the management of the income of her separate estate as it occasionally accrues"—that is, from year to year—"between strangers a more strict and severe rule would be required." That is, where the wife is allowed by law to hold a separate property and contract with regard to it and deal with her husband as she would with a stranger, the law itself imposes a stricter relation between strangers than it does between husband and wife, and a severer rule would apply. Now, it is for you to say, under the circumstances of this case, what, from the testimony as you heard it showing the relation between these parties, was her manifest intent in turning that property over to the control, direction, and management of her husband?

Now, the law further says, that where this acquiescence continues for a number of years; where no claim is set up on the part of the wife to have her rights maintained as they exist in that relation; where a series of years is marked by that acquiescence, concurrence, and allowance of control to the management, direction, and use of the husband, it strengthens as it grows. Because she has the right, at any time during the existence of the relation and during the currency of years in which this state of things exists, to assert her claim to the property. The law does not debar her from doing it any more than it debars any other person who has the right. Because it is the boast of the law that wherever there is a right, the law will furnish a remedy, and where that state of acquiescence continues, the longer it continues, the stronger the presumption of acquiescence is.

Now, when was the first complaint made in this case on the part of the wife? That is a question of fact for you. Was there any complaint made during the marriage? Any assertion of right that was inconsistent with the continued use, direction, and management by the husband? It is for you to say whether there was or not. When was the first matter of complaint made that she had been wronged by her husband's taking this property? Was it made during the marriage? If it was not made during the marriage, then the acquiescence is strengthened in the absence of anything to contradict it, and if it was made after the death of the husband, it was too late. The law does not allow any person *to make a gift and afterwards to revoke it. The law does not allow anyone to make a charge for a thing which is given, and the reason of it is this: perhaps if the person who accepts the gift knew that it was going to be charged for, he would decline to accept it. Maybe he did not want it very much. The article may have been worth all that the person giving it afterwards charged for it, but the person receiving it might have been able to have done without it, and might have preferred to do without it rather than accept it as a thing which had afterwards to be paid for.

In other words, that is the difference between gift and contract. One person may make a gift; two persons are required to make a contract. I may give you any article of personal property that I please, and you may accept it. I cannot afterwards say to you, for instance, "There is a pair of glasses that are worth $5 or $10. Won't you allow me to present them to you?" You thank me very kindly, and accept it. I cannot afterwards charge you for the glasses, because you might say, "Why, sir, I would have preferred a pair of steel glasses worth $1.50 or $2. I didn't want those. They are not suitable to my condition. I would rather have the steel, because they were cheaper." I could not recover from you the price of the glasses, although they might be worth all that I say they are worth.

A gift made cannot be afterwards converted into a charge. That is the meaning of the law, and it was illustrated to you by one of the counsel in the very familiar case of a man accepting the guardianship of an infant whom he is not bound to support. Now, if the guardianship is taken of your nephew, or your cousin, or some person not related to you, an infant, you are required by law to make annual returns of the disbursements and expenditures that are made by you on account of that ward. If you neglect to make a return of the board and clothing of that infant to the probate judge, when the child comes of age and demands a settlement, and you are called before the probate judge to have the account settled, you say, "Why, for ten years I furnished this child with board and clothing worth $100 a year. It amounts to $1,000." The courts say: "You cannot charge for that. If you had intended to make a charge for that, you ought to have had it re*turned to the probate judge and the account vouched. The law says it was a gratuity. You gave it, and having given it, you cannot revoke it."

So that, as I understand it, is the law of this case. If you conclude in the plaintiff's favor here, then she is entitled to recover six years of whatever you conceive this rent to be worth. Therefore, if you find favorably for the plaintiff here, under the proof you will give her six years' rent of these premises, whatever in your judgment she ought to recover for the rents. And in making up that estimate, you ought to take into consideration the condition into which this dead man brought the land, and you ought to average the rents. If you should find favorably to her, his estate ought to have the benefit in some measure for the improved condition, if you believe it was improved, into which he brought the land; and, therefore, the fairest standard in that matter would be to average the rents and give her six years of whatever, in your judgment, the rents are worth.

But if you should find in favor of the defendants—if you believe from the proof in the case, and from the law as you have heard it, that there was acquiescence on her part and a free, full control given, then she cannot recover at all, and your verdict ought to be for the defendants.

The jury rendered a verdict for the defendants; and from the judgment entered up thereon, the plaintiff appealed upon exceptions (a motion for new trial having been made and refused), alleging errors, to the Circuit Judge, as follows:

I. In charging that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is not entitled to recover for more than six years' rent.

II. In charging that where husband and wife live together, using the proceeds of her property as a common means of support, if she does not object to that arrangement, he can appropriate it as he please and to his own use; there is no resulting trust, and after his death the wife cannot recover it from his estate.

III. In charging that where the marriage relation exists, and parties cohabit and live together in the same family, that the use of the property which belongs to the wife, if she permits the hus*band to use it and control it as his own, cannot be made a charge upon his estate.

IV. In charging that if the relations between the parties (Mr. and Mrs. McLure), and their conduct towards each other was such as to justify the implication that there was an acquiescence on her part, then it is just the same as if the property had been given directly by gift and in the most formal manner.

V. In charging that if the wife entrusted the husband with the sole control, direction, use, and management of her property, his estate cannot be held responsible.

VI. In charging that even where the wife is allowed by law to hold a separate property, and contract with regard to it and deal with her husband as with a stranger, the law itself imposes a stricter relation between strangers than it does between husband and wife, and a severer rule would apply.

VII. In charging that where there exists a charge of acquiescence on the part of the wife in the control, management, direction, and use of her property by her husband, the longer it continues, the stronger the presumption of acquiescence.

VIII. In charging that if the plaintiff, during her married life, made no complaint that she had been wronged by her husband, her acquiescence is strengthened, in the absence of anything to contradict it, and, if made after the death of her husband, it is too late.

IX. In charging, in substance, that the case was the same as that between a guardian and ward; and if a guardian did not charge in his annual returns for maintenance of ward, the law regards such maintenance as a gratuity of the guardian.

X. In charging that if the jury believed there was an acquiescence on plaintiff's part, and a full and free control of the property given to the husband, the plaintiff cannot recover.

XI. In charging the jury, that they should average the rents and allow the same only for the last six years of testator's life; and in doing so, should take into consideration the improvements and ameliorations made upon said land by the testator.

XII. In charging the jury, in substance, that where the husband manages his wife's business, the presumption is that the *income is given to the husband, and that the burden of proof is upon the wife to show otherwise.

XIII. In charging the jury, if they believe there was an acquiescence on her part, and a free, full control given, plaintiff cannot recover.

XIV. In refusing the motion for a new trial.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In 1871 the plaintiff intermarried with David A. McLure. At her marriage she owned certain real and personal property, which she, shortly after said marriage, conveyed by separate deeds to her husband, conditioned that she should have the use and enjoyment of the rents and profits during her life, and in case of the death of her husband before her death, the property was to revert to her, &c. The husband died in 1882, having managed the farm during the marriage. After the death of the husband, the action below was brought by the plaintiff, the widow, against the executors of the deceased to recover the rents and profits of the land, accrued during the time the husband had been in possession.

The case was tried by the jury, who found for the defendants. The appeal is founded upon alleged errors in the charge of the Circuit Judge, his honor, Judge Cothran. The exceptions are numerous (fourteen in number); the most of them, however, seem to be objections to certain remarks made by the Circuit Judge in the course of his general charge, detached from the context. The object of exceptions in a case at law is to bring up some distinct principle or question of law claimed to have been violated by the Circuit Judge, and to present it in a distinct and tangible form, so that it may be reviewed by this court. Several of the exceptions here fail to conform in a strict sense to this rule. It will not be necessary, therefore, to take them up seriatim, especially as, when consolidated, they present but few legal points.

These *points involve the rights of married women under the constitution and statutes of the State, and of gifts made by them to their husbands, arising from presumption inferred from conduct, acquiescence, or otherwise. The Circuit Judge charged upon these points, illustrating his views by the incidental remarks which are the foundation of many of the exceptions. Our examination has been directed to the principles laid down in the charge thus illustrated.

As to the rights and powers of a married woman, the judge charged, that with reference to any property that she may acquire by gift, grant, devise, inheritance, or otherwise, a married woman, with regard to that property, was as if she were unmarried, and that this right admitted of business transactions between husband and wife, as if they were non-covert. There certainly can be no objection to this under our recent decisions. Witell v. Charleston, 7 S. C., 88; Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 Id., 597 [40 Am. Rep. 705]. When the judge confined such transactions to the property of the wife, it cannot be said that he went too far. He then charged, in substance, that in reference to gifts from the wife to the husband, it was not necessary to show a direct and positive transaction of that nature, or an express gift, but that it might be inferred from circumstances, such as appropriation by the husband with the knowledge and consent of the wife, her acquiescence, a long acquiescence being stronger than a short one, the husband being the sole manager, claiming and using the property as his own, and spending the overplus as he pleased, with the cognizance of the wife, and without objection.

He further charged that owing to the relation between husband and wife, the law allowed the most favorable presumption, when the wife permitted the husband to receive and enjoy the income of her property, but that the rule where strangers were concerned was more strict and severe. He, in addition, distinctly stated to the jury that while the wife might permit her husband to make use of such income, and acquiesce therein, yet that she had the right, if dissatisfied, to object and take charge herself, and even lease it out to others. And, finally, after propounding certain questions to the jury explanatory of the principles laid down, so as to enable the jury to apply these principles to the *testimony, he repeatedly said to them, that it was for them, and them alone, to pass upon that testimony, and to find the facts as evidenced thereby.

Now, was there error in the ruling of the Circuit Judge, as to gifts presumed by the circumstances referred to? In the case of Reeder & Davis v. Flinn (6 S. C., 240), it was held: "Where a wife permits her husband to manage her separate estate for a number of years, and dispose of the income as he sees fit, equity treats it as a gift to him." Further: "A wife, by negligence, or acquiescence, may forfeit her right to equities against her husband, which otherwise she might have asserted." This is even stronger than the charge of the judge. The court in that case, after stating the rule, and saying that there was no difference between a case where the husband secured the income from a trustee, and where he was in the immediate management himself, said: "That the rule rested on the assumption of either an express gift of the income to the husband, or one implied from her acquiescence." Citing Hill Trust, 425; Powell v. Hankey, 2 P. Wms., 82; Beresford v. Archbishop, 13 Sim., 643; Thrupp v. Harman, 3 M. J. & K., 513; and Charles v. Coker, 2 S. C., 136. And that this rule is stronger in matters between husband and wife than between strangers, as charged by the judge, see the remarks of Chancellor Kent in Methodist E. Church v. Jaques, 3 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.], 79.

We think the charge of the judge, when taken as a whole on the questions referred to above, was in accordance with the law, and fully supported by the authorities cited supra, and we do not see that the various detached portions of the charge found in the several exceptions where they are presented, modified or in any way relaxed the rule, or general principle laid down for the government of the jury, or was calculated to mislead them.

Inasmuch as the jury found for the defendant, doubtless on the question of gift, it is hardly necessary to discuss the question of the six years to which the judge limited the jury, in case they found for the plaintiff, nor the averaging of the rents with the improvements considered. If there was a gift, these matters were immaterial, but even if they were before us properly, we think the charge was right.

*There was no error in refusing the motion for a new trial.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

24 S. C. 283

STATE v. BECKHAM.

If a person assaulted, being himself without fault, reasonably apprehends death or great bodily harm to himself unless he kills the assailant, the killing is justifiable: but one cannot claim the privilege allowed by law of taking human life, unless the testimony show that he was entirely without fault in bringing about the difficulty.

Before Witherspoon, J., York, June, 1885.
The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellant.
Mr. Solicitor McDonald, contra.

February 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Under an indictment for murder the defendant was convicted of manslaughter. The counsel for defendant requested the Circuit Judge, amongst other things, to charge as follows: "That if the jury believe that the accused and others were in mutual combat, and the accused was attempting to withdraw, although he may have been in some fault in the first instance, but with no intent to commit a felony, and was followed and assaulted so dangerously as that escape was extremely hazardous, and he slew his assailant, it is excusable." The judge says that he refused to charge as thus requested: "As I thought that the law with reference to the right of self-defence, applicable to the case, had been sufficiently charged and explained to the jury."

The charge, as represented in the "Case," so far as this particular point was concerned, was as follows: "I charged the jury *that the right of self-defence was recognized and allowed by law under the plea of necessity: that the law was jealous of human life: and that before a defendant can claim the high privilege allowed by law of taking life, he must show by the testimony, and satisfy the jury that he was entirely without fault in bringing about the difficulty; in other words, that he must come into court with clean hands." Then after laying down the rule, as settled in the case of State v. McGreer (13 S. C., 464), as to who was to judge of the necessity, he proceeded as follows: "I instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the circumstances were such as to justify the defendant in concluding at the time that it was necessary to fire to avoid immediate danger to his life, or to avoid great bodily harm, they should render a verdict of 'not guilty,' otherwise they should find the defendant guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the view they should take of the testimony."

The only exception taken is in these words: "Because it was error to charge the jury that the defendant must show by the testimony that he was entirely without fault in bringing about the difficulty before he could claim the privilege allowed by law of taking human life."

We think the law was correctly expounded to the jury by his honor in his charge, and that the exception cannot be sustained. In 1 Bish. Crim. Law, sec. 865, that eminent author says (the italics being ours): "The rule is commonly stated in the American cases thus: If the individual assaulted, being himself without fault, reasonably apprehends death or great bodily harm to himself, unless he kills the assailant, the killing is justifiable;" and in support of this doctrine he cites quite a long list of American cases. Again he says, in section 869: "But one must not have brought on himself the necessity which he sets up in his own defence." It is true that there are some authorities which seem to support the view contended for, but when closely examined it appears to us that they go no further than to show that if the first combat, brought on by the accused, has terminated by his retiring therefrom, and a fresh assault is commenced by his adversary, that then the accused may, in defence of his life, or *to protect his person from great bodily harm, take the life of his adversary.

But whether this be so or not, it seems to us that the rule, as stated by Bishop above, is best supported by reason as well as by authority. All the authorities agree that the right of self-defence rests upon necessity, and if the necessity is created by the accused himself, arises from his own fault, he cannot plead such necessity as an excuse for so grave an act as that of taking human life. Where one, without legal excuse, commences a combat, and finding himself getting the worst of the fight, undertakes to withdraw, but his adversary presses him so closely that he finds it necessary for his own protection to take the life of his adversary, he cannot avail himself of the plea of self-defence, for that would be allowing him to take advantage of his own wrong. His life would not have been endangered but for his own fault in bringing on the contest, and it cannot be said, in such a case, that there was any legal necessity for taking life.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Williamsburg, October, 1883.

This was an appeal from the following decree:

On account of the lapse of time, manifest ignorance on the part of the plaintiffs of their rights, perfunctory agreement imperfectly performed, a series of annual rent notes for nominal sums, various ambiguous receipts, a multitude of chimney corner counsellors, an *attempted transfer of title to the land in dispute by one of the defendants to the other, a pretended tax sale, proceedings instituted for summary ejectment, and some appearances of artful design and unfairness, this matter is in great confusion. Without encumbering this decree with a detail of the evidence of these elements of confusion, I shall endeavor to make the briefest statement of the case that I can to be perspicuous and announce the conclusions which I have attained.

On December 27, 1870, the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, and the plaintiffs entered into an agreement, in writing, by which the former agreed to sell to the latter the land in question, containing 168 acres, for the sum of $400, payable in three annual instalments, after a cash payment of $60, with interest on the deferred payments. The agreement contains a forfeiture clause, in effect that if default be made as to any of the stipulated payments, the vendor "shall be at liberty to consider the contract as forfeited and annulled, and to dispose of said land to any other person in the same manner as if this contract had never been made," and without liability to refund any portion of the money paid or to pay for any of the improvements, &c.

The purchasers went into possession immediately, making the cash payment of $60. Up to January 1, 1874, the expiration of the three years, the purchasers paid in all the sum of $310, in various amounts and at various times. The last of these payments, to wit, the sum of $50, was made on December 27, 1873.

Immediately after January 1, 1874, B. M. Nesmith, the husband of Sarah Nesmith, notified the plaintiffs that their contract for the land was at an end. On the 12th of January, a few days after the notification, Sarah Nesmith accepted the sum of $15 from the plaintiffs and receipted to them for the same without specifying on what account. There is no evidence of any other indebtedness by the plaintiffs to her. On the same day the plaintiffs made their note to Sarah Nesmith for the sum of $1 for rent of the land for the year 1874.

On January 8, 1875, the plaintiffs paid to her the sum of $44, and she receipted for the same on account of rent of land, and the plaintiffs gave her their note for $1 for rent of land for the year 1875. On January 15, 1876, they paid her $30, for which *she gave a receipt expressing the payment to be "for land." They, as before, gave her their note for $1 for rent of the land for the year 1876. On January 20, 1877, they paid to her $28, for which she gave a receipt expressing the payment to be "for land." They again gave her their note for $1 for rent of land for that year.

During the year 1877 the plaintiffs made in all four payments at different times, the receipts for which do not express the account on which they were made. On January 25, 1878, they paid to her $2 "on land," and on February 18 following another payment of $7.05, and made their note to her for $1 for the rent of that year. Another payment of $25 was made by them on December

On February 1, 1879, they paid to her $9, and she gave them a statement in the following terms, viz.:

"This is to show that the amount still due on the land occupied by Dug Tucker, Bonus Graham, and Hope McNulty, is ($71.63) seventy-one dollars and sixty-three cents.

"February 1st, 1879."

Ten days afterwards they paid her $5.70, on what account not stated in the receipt, and made their note for $1 for rent of land for that year. This note has been lost. On January 12, 1880, they paid to her the sum of $24, the receipt does not state on what account, and they gave her their note for $1 for rent of land for that year. On December 29, 1880, Sarah Nesmith executed and delivered her deed of the land in question to W. E. Nesmith, in which the consideration is stated to be the sum of $165, which she said was duly paid to her by him.

No other payments are claimed by the plaintiffs to have been made to Sarah Nesmith on any account, though they say in their testimony reported by the referee that they tendered to her the balance due. In this they are sustained by one Sam McBride, a witness, who swore he went with them to Mrs. Nesmith and saw them offer the money. They further swore that the balance due to Mrs. Nesmith was borrowed by them from one Rhem for the purpose of paying the same to her, and D. D. Rhem swore that *he saw the plaintiffs borrow the money from his father and in a few days return the same to him.

W. E. Nesmith, who sets up title from Sarah Nesmith to the land in question, is her son; lives near her and within two or three miles of the land in question, and was living there when the plaintiffs went into possession. He was present on January 8, 1875, when the plaintiffs made a payment to his mother of $44, drew up the receipt for the same which she signed, and also drew up the note for $1 for rent that year.

It appears that for the year previous to the alleged sale of the land to W. E. Nesmith the plaintiffs had failed to pay the taxes for the first time since their possession of it. They undertake to explain their default by saying that upon application to the treasurer for that purpose they were told by him that the land had not been returned for taxation. W. E. Nesmith paid the taxes for it for that year and produced the receipt for the same, and although the land was perhaps in the "delinquent list," it cannot be true, as was stated by Mrs. Nesmith, that the land had been sold for taxes and had been purchased at the "tax sale" by her son, W. E. Nesmith. The execution of her deed conveying the land to her son, dated December 29, 1880, is inconsistent with the truthfulness of her statement, to say nothing of the production of the tax receipts held by W. E. Nesmith. When Mrs. Nesmith told the plaintiffs that her son had bought the land at the tax sale and referred them to him, they went at once to him to refund the amount of the taxes so paid. He declined to treat with them and claimed the land as his own.

Very soon afterwards he instituted proceedings before a trial justice to eject the plaintiffs from the land, in which he succeeded; and this complaint was filed to enjoin the enforcement of that process and for specific performance of the original contract of December 27, 1870.

Before entering upon the consideration of the gist of this action—the matter of the right to specific performance—it is proper to dispose of a serious question raised by the defendants as to the genuineness and efficiency of the statement alleged to have been given by Mrs. Nesmith to the plaintiffs, bearing date February 1, 1879, and set out in full supra.

*In view of the extraordinary transaction hereinbefore set forth, the character and condition of the parties concerned, the continuous acceptance of money by Mrs. Nesmith after the technical forfeiture, the various and ambiguous receipts for the same given by her, annual rent notes for the nominal sum of $1 each, and bearing in mind that equity is averse to regarding time as the essence of such contracts, I might safely conclude that there has been a waiver of the forfeiture clause of the agreement of December 27, 1870, and consequently adjudge this to be a proper case for the specific performance of that agreement.

The plaintiffs' right to such relief, however, cannot be denied if the statement of February 1, 1879, is a genuine paper. Is it genuine or not? The inquiry is not unworthy of the very best consideration. Mrs. Nesmith, who was put upon the stand by the plaintiffs to prove this and other papers, one of which was the original agreement, swore that she would not say whether she signed the papers exhibited to her or not. "I could not recognize my signature if it was shown me," etc. The plaintiff Tucker says, in his testimony, that Silas Nesmith wrote most of the receipts which his mother signed, and that he wrote the statement of February 1, 1879.

S. T. Cooper, a witness for the plaintiffs, said: "I have often seen the handwriting of Silas Nesmith, deceased. Think Silas wrote receipts dated February 10, 1877, February 1, 1879, February 23, 1877, and three receipts dated January 20, 1877; also, statement of amount due on land February 1, 1879." This statement was signed "Sarah Nesmith," and upon comparing it with her signature to the original agreement and with other acknowledged signatures of hers, I am satisfied, as was the intelligent referee, that this instrument is genuine and that the signature is hers.

It is strenuously insisted, however, by the learned counsel for the defendant that the proof of this and of the other papers is insufficient, because violative of the rule of evidence that comparison as an original means of ascertaining the genuineness of handwriting will not be permitted; admitting, however, that it is allowable in aid of doubtful proof. The latest case upon the subject is that of Benedict, Hall & Co. v.

Flanigan (18 S. C., *506 [44 Am. Rep. 583]), which reviews the former decisions in this State, and seems to me to be analogous to the one now under consideration. In that case the court say: * *

In this case Mrs. Nesmith declines to say whether the signature was hers or not; that she would not know her signature if she saw it, &c. Surely it would not be a violent presumption in the ordinary transactions of men, involving repeated payments of money, that the production by the payor of the payee's receipts is prima facie or presumptive proof of payments; but it becomes almost conclusive, scarcely needing the aid of comparative or other proofs, when the payors are ignorant and unlettered and the payee being put upon the stand refused to admit or deny her signature.

Another obstacle to a decree for specific performance is interposed by the defendant, W. E. Nesmith, who claims, under the deed of his mother, dated December 29, 1880, to be the real owner of the land in question. The referee has found that W. E. Nesmith did not have actual notice of the plaintiffs' claim to the land, and that the facts proved were not sufficient to charge him with constructive notice. I am unable to concur in this conclusion. The facts proved in the case, the proximity of W. E. Nesmith to the premises, family connection, preparation by him of receipts for a part of the money paid previously to his mother, continued possession by plaintiffs for nearly ten years, annual payment of taxes not stipulated for in the annual $1 rent notes, one of which W. E. Nesmith drew up—all, taken together, were abundantly sufficient, in my judgment, to have given to him both actual and constructive notice, and, if not, should certainly have put him upon inquiry as to the true state of affairs. Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq. 421.

Nor am I able to concur with the referee in his conclusions as to the $1 rent notes (so-called). The plaintiffs were either lessees or vendees. The referee found that they were the latter. In this I think he is right, and if so it would be inconsistent with the character of vendees to hold them liable for rent

my judgment, are void for want of consideration. The defendant, Sarah Nesmith, in taking them from the plaintiffs, could justly have valued them only as furnishing evidence of attornment to herself as landlord of the premises, and as fixing upon the plaintiffs the condition of tenants; and by reason of the fact of waiver, and of other circumstances hereinbefore stated, these notes, being insufficient for that purpose, are devoid of all value as money obligations and should be delivered up to the plaintiffs.

Not having been furnished with the notes given for the purchase money of the land, and having reason to believe from the testimony that a special rate of interest is set forth in them, which does not appear in the original agreement, I am unable to estimate the balance due to the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, for the land. This calculation should be made by the clerk of this court, attended for that purpose by the respective counsel engaged in the case, and the true amount ascertained after allowing the plaintiffs all just and proper credits, disregarding the $1 rent notes (so-called).

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, as follows:

I. That the exceptions on the part of the plaintiffs' and defendants' counsel respectively to the report of the referee be sustained or overruled as they may be found in conformity with, or in antagonism to, the principles herein decided, and that the report of the referee be in like manner modified.

II. That the plaintiffs herein are entitled to specific performance of the written agreement of date December 27, 1870.

III. That the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, have judgment for the balance due to her upon the original contract of sale, after allowing all just and proper credits to the plaintiffs for payments by them heretofore made to her.

IV. That in default of payment by the plaintiffs of balance due to the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, as soon as the same is ascertained by the clerk's calculation, that the sheriff of Williamsburg County do proceed, after due and legal notice, to sell, on sale day in February next, or some convenient sale day thereafter, in the usual manner of judicial sale, and for cash, the premises described in the pleadings, executing and delivering to the purchaser thereof his title deed as such sheriff.

*V. That from the proceeds of sale he do pay to the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, the amount of the balance of principal and interest due to her as the purchase money of said land.

VI. That in event the payment of the same be made to the said Sarah Nesmith without sale, as herein provided for, that she do, upon receipt of the money, execute and deliver to the said plaintiffs her deed of conveyance, in conformity with the covenants contained in the written agreement of date December 27, 1870.

VII. That the deed of conveyance executed by Sarah Nesmith to her son, W. E. Nesmith, bearing date December 29, 1880, be delivered up to the clerk of this court, to be cancelled by him and returned to the said W. E. Nesmith, for such other use than as a claim of title to the premises in question he may see proper to make of it.

VIII. That the parties hereto respectively pay their own attorneys' and witnesses' costs and the cost of subpoenaing the same; and that the cost of the referee and the officers of the court be paid to them—one-half by the plaintiffs and the other half by the defendants.

Mr. J. A. Kelley, for appellant.

Mr. T. M. Gilland, contra.

February 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MELVER. On December 27, 1870, the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, entered into a written contract with the plaintiffs for the sale of a certain tract of land to them on certain terms stated in said contract. The only one of these terms which it is necessary to notice, is expressed in the following language: "That if default be made in fulfilling this agreement, or any part thereof, on the part of the parties of the second part, then, and in such case, the party of the first part, her heirs and assigns, shall be at liberty to consider this contract as forfeited and annulled, and to dispose of said land to any other person in the same manner as if this contract had never been made; and, further that the said *party of the first part, her heirs and assigns, shall not be required to refund any portion of any sums which may have been paid in pursuance of this agreement, or be required to reimburse or pay to the said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, any sum or sums of money for means and labor expended, or time consumed in making any improvements or repairs whatever on the said land."

Under this agreement the plaintiffs went into possession of the land and made numerous payments towards the purchase money, but did not pay the same in full within the time limited for that purpose by the agreement. The defendant, Sarah Nesmith, claiming that by reason of this the contract was forfeited, sold and conveyed the land to her son and co-defendant, W. E. Nesmith, on December 29, 1880. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, claim that after the time limited for the payment of the last instalment, and before the conveyance of Sarah Nesmith to her son, W. E. Nesmith, the said Sarah Nesmith waived the forfeiture by accepting several payments on account of the purchase money and receipting for the same as such, and especially so by a statement in writing, bearing date February 1, 1879, purporting to be signed by said Sarah Nesmith in these words: "This is to show that the amount still due on the land occupied by Dug Tucker, Bonus Graham, and Hope McNulty is ($71.63) seventy-one dollars and sixty-three cents." The defendants, however, contend that there was no legal evidence that Mrs. Nesmith had ever signed these receipts or the statement above copied, and this is one of the questions made by the appeal. The defendant, W. E. Nesmith, also claims that he is a purchaser for valuable consideration without any notice of the plaintiff's equity, and this is the only other question made by the appeal.

The action was for specific performance, and it was referred to a referee to take the testimony and report his conclusions of law and fact to the court. Without going into the various matters considered in the report, which are not now before us, it is sufficient to say that as to the two questions raised by the appeal, the referee found as follows: "On February 1, 1879, the plaintiffs paid Sarah Nesmith $9.00; at the same time she gave them a statement showing the amount still due on the land occupied by *the plaintiffs to be $71.63." And as to the other question raised by the appeal, the finding of the referee is as follows: "The question whether W. E. Nesmith had notice of the plaintiffs' claim is involved in some doubt. He did not have actual notice, and my opinion is that the facts proved by the plaintiffs do not amount to constructive notice."

The case was heard by his honor, Judge Cothran, upon the report of the referee, "and exceptions filed thereto by both plaintiffs and defendants," as he says, though we do not find any exceptions to the report incorporated in the "Case," and therefore cannot tell with certainty whether the two findings of the referee, upon which the questions raised by the appeal largely depend, were properly excepted to. But as the Circuit Judge seems to have considered them, we will assume that these questions were properly raised. In speaking of the statement of February 1, 1879, his honor says: "This statement was signed 'Sarah Nesmith,' and upon comparing it with her signature to the original agreement, and with other acknowledged signatures of hers I am satisfied, as was the intelligent referee, that this instrument was genuine, and that the signature is hers." And after discussing the point raised by the appellant as to the admissibility of testimony as to handwriting by comparison, says: "I think the referee was right in admitting supplementary testimony"—referring doubtless to the fact that at the reference a witness, who claimed to be a judge of handwriting, was permitted by the referee to testify, after comparing the signatures to the receipts and statement of February 1, 1870, with the acknowledged signatures of Mrs. Nesmith to the deed to her son, to the original agreement for the sale of the land, and to an affidavit made in the application for injunction, that the signatures to the receipts and statement were in the same handwriting.

As to the question of notice to the defendant, W. E. Nesmith, the Circuit Judge said that he was unable to concur with the referee in his finding, that there was no proof of actual notice; but, on the contrary, concludes that the various circumstances, mentioned in the decree, were abundantly sufficient to have given him both actual and constructive notice, and if not should certainly have put him upon inquiry as to the true state of affairs. *He, therefore, rendered judgment that the deed from Sarah Nesmith to W. E. Nesmith should be cancelled and that the former should be required to perform specifically her agreement of December 27, 1870, upon the payment by the plaintiffs to her of the balance due on the purchase money.

From this decree defendants appeal upon the following grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in holding that the defendant, W. E. Nesmith, was not a bona fide subsequent purchaser of the land in question without notice of the sale to the plaintiffs. II. Because his honor erred in holding that the various receipts and statements signed by the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, were completely proven, it being respectfully submitted that there was no evidence to sustain his honor's conclusions that a comparison of handwritings was in aid of doubtful proof, but that these receipts and statements were only proved by a comparison with other handwritings of the defendant, Sarah Nesmith, as original evidence. There being no other evidence introduced as doubtful proof, consequently every receipt and statement signed by defendant, Sarah Nesmith, was entirely incompetent and violative of the well settled rule of evidence on the subject of a comparison of handwriting."

As to the first ground of appeal, we agree entirely with the Circuit Judge. All the circumstances proved in the case which have been adverted to in the decree, and need not be repeated here, pointed very strongly to the conclusion that the defendant had notice of the claim of the plaintiffs when he took his conveyance from his mother. But waiving this, there can be no doubt that he had constructive notice. It is well settled that possession is notice sufficient to put a party upon inquiry, and that is enough. Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq., 421; Sheorn v. Robinson, 22 S. C., 32; Bienau v. White, 23 Id., 490. Finding these plaintiffs in possession, his duty was to inquire of them by what right they claimed to hold the land, and such inquiry would have led to a notice of their equity which they are now seeking to set up.

As to the second ground of appeal, we see no error on the part of the Circuit Judge, conceding the general rule to be as claimed by appellants, that comparison of handwriting

ing cannot be resorted to as original evidence, but only in aid of doubtful proof, yet we do not think the rule was violated in this case; though, in common with many other judges who have treated of this matter, we may add that we are unable to see any reason for the distinction. For, as is well said by the Chief Justice, in Benedict, Hall & Co. v. Flanigan, 18 S. C., 506 [44 Am. Rep. 583]: "The testimony of those who are acquainted with the writing of the party in question, either from having seen him write or [are] otherwise familiar with his acknowledged writing, has invariably been allowed. From a knowledge thus acquired the witness is supposed to have a standard in his mind impressed by his memory with which he can compare the disputed writing and thus reach a correct conclusion. This being the theory upon which such testimony has been uniformly received, it is somewhat illogical that comparison on the witness stand of a disputed signature with one acknowledged to be genuine has been as uniformly rejected by most courts."

So that in reality all testimony as to handwriting, except where the witness testifies that he saw the party sign, or heard him admit that he did sign, is, in effect, by comparison. But there seems to be an exception to this rule (1 Greenl. Evid., § 578), to wit: "Where other writings admitted to be genuine are already in the case. Here the comparison may be made by the jury with or without the aid of experts." Now in this case the comparison was made with other writings admitted to be genuine which were already in the case, viz.: the original agreement for the sale, the deed to W. E. Nesmith, and some affidavits made in the case upon the application for injunction. So that this case falls clearly under one of the exceptions mentioned by Mr. Greenleaf.

But, more than this: we think that the Circuit Judge whose province it was, according to the case of Benedict, Hall & Co. v. Flanigan, supra, to determine in the first instance whether there was such doubtful proof as authorized a resort to comparison of handwriting, having determined that question, and there not being any patent error or any error at all in such determination, according to our view, the question is concluded. There was some testimony by the plaintiff, Tucker, tending to show, although possibly not sufficient to show, that the papers in question were signed by Mrs. Nesmith, and that makes just such a case as lets in proof by comparison of handwriting. So that it seems to us that in no view of the question was there any error on the part of the Circuit Judge in resorting to proof by comparison of handwriting.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

"Thirty days after date I promise to pay L. Cass Carpenter, or order, four thousand dollars, payable at the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, S. C., value received. If not paid at maturity, interest thereafter to be at the rate of thirty per cent. per annum.

"(Signed) J. L. Neagle.

"(Endorsed): Renewal. L. Cass Carpenter, W. E. Rose."

The note was transferred for value to the plaintiff who brought this action against Neagle, the maker, and Carpenter and Rose, as endorsers.

*At the first trial there was judgment against Neagle, the maker, but the Circuit Judge granted a non-suit as to Carpenter and Rose for want of sufficient notice of protest. The Supreme Court set aside the non-suit and remanded the case. At the second trial Rose contested, denying that he had ever signed the endorsement on the note, or received legal notice of the protest; and henceforth the contest was narrowed down almost entirely to the question whether Rose signed the endorsement or it was a forgery. The plaintiff produced witnesses, including Neagle, who testified that the signature of Rose as endorser was genuine, and after contest the plaintiff had a verdict against him for the balance due on the note. But the Supreme Court set aside the verdict on the ground that the presiding judge had charged upon the facts. See Benedict v. Rose, 16 S. C., 629.

At the third trial it seems that Rose made the old question as to want of legal notice of protest, but the principal contest was as to whether the signature of Rose as endorser was genuine or a forgery. Upon that point there was a good deal of testimony on both sides. As part of his testimony the defendant offered the record of an indictment for forgery against L. Cass Carpenter, which the judge at first held to be inadmissible, but afterwards recalled his ruling and allowed it to be put in evidence. This time there was a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds:

I. "Because his honor erred in admitting in testimony the record of the case of the State v. L. Cass Carpenter, indictment for forgery.

II. "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that from the testimony the jury must believe that Rose signed and delivered it for value.

III. "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the notice of protest of the dishonor of the note must have been given within the day after the dishonor."

IV. "Because his honor erred in his charge that there was a great deal of testimony in this case and that they must consider it all."

V. "And plaintiff excepts to the order of his honor July 24, *1882, refusing a new trial in the case, and appeals from said order to the Supreme Court."

From the view the court take it will not be necessary or proper to consider any of the exceptions except the first, which alleges that it was error to admit in evidence the record of an indictment for forgery in the case of the State v. L. Cass Carpenter. In reference to this point it strikes us that the first impression of the Circuit Judge was correct and that the record from the Court of Sessions was not admissible. As a judgment to estop the parties from disputing the matters adjudged it was clearly inadmissible. In the first place, it did not appear that the subject matter of the indictment had any connection whatever with the issue between Benedict and Rose as to the alleged indorsement of the note sued on. To have the force of res adjudicata it is necessary that the subject matter should be the same. In the next place, the parties were not the same. Neither Benedict nor Rose had anything whatever to do with the indictment against Carpenter, and therefore it was res inter alios acta. And finally it was a criminal proceeding, and for that reason the record was not admissible in a civil action. The authorities go so far as to hold that even if the forgery charged in the indictment was as to the very paper sued on in the civil action, the record of conviction will not be admitted as evidence therein. 1 Stark. Evid., 281; Cluff v. Ins. Comp., 99 Mass., 317; Cottingham v. Weeks, 54 Ga., 275; Ryer v. Atwater, 4 Day [Conn.], 431; 1 Greenl. Evid., § 537; 2 Whart. Evid., § 776. In this latter reference Mr. Wharton says: "A judgment of conviction on an indictment for forging a bill of exchange, though conclusive as to the prisoner being a convicted felon, is not only not conclusive but is not even admissible evidence of the forgery in an action on the bill."

It is contended, however, that the record of an indictment from the Court of Sessions is always admissible to prove the fact of conviction—that is to say, to prove itself. Properly understood this is true. The judgment being a public transaction, rendered by public authority and presumed to be faithfully recorded, is the only proper legal evidence of itself and the legal consequences resulting from the fact; and when it is offered for that purpose *cannot be said to be inter alios and is admissible whoever may be the parties to the suit in which it is offered. But as we understand there is a wide difference between the admissibility of a judgment as a fact and as evidence of ulterior facts. These distinct objects for which the judgment is admissible must not be confounded. As Judge Wardlaw said, in Etters v. Wilson, 12 Rich., 152: "The mistake that has given rise to the objection has proceeded from confounding the purposes for which a judgment may be offered, first to show the truth of what has been adjudged, and second to show the fact that the judgment was rendered and the legal consequences thence deducible. For the latter purposes a judgment inter alios is always admissible, and often is not only conclusive, but the only proper evidence."

Mr. Greenleaf (vol. 1, section 527) states the principle as follows: "A judgment when used by way of inducement or to establish a collateral fact may be admitted though the parties are not the same. Thus the record of a conviction may be shown in order to prove the legal infamy of a witness." That is to say, if Carpenter had presented himself as a witness, the record might have been offered as conclusive evidence of the fact that he had been convicted of forgery. But Carpenter was not offered as a witness nor do we see that there was any occasion for proving the conviction as a collateral fact. It must have been offered in the case with a view to its indirect effect upon the issue, as tending to lead the mind to the conclusion that Carpenter may have forged the name of Rose as endorser on the note; and for such purpose it was not admissible. Considered simply as evidence in the case, we cannot see that, on the issue made, the defendant had any more right to offer in evidence the forgery record from the Court of Sessions than he had to go into any other proof in a civil suit of the general bad character of Carpenter. It was irrelevant.

The judgment of the court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

*DANIEL v. HESTER.

[1. Mortgages ⇨452.]

A plaintiff must prove his case as made by the pleadings. In action for foreclosure, an allegation of title in the mortgagor is not required, but is involved in the other usual allegations; and in this case, these allegations were not so controverted by the defendants in possession as to make it incumbent upon plaintiff to prove title in the mortgagors.

The answer not having controverted the allegation in the complaint that the defendants were claiming some interest accruing subsequent to the mortgage, the assertion of present title in themselves was new matter, and in the issue ordered they were properly required to be the actors.

Before Witherspoon, J., Colleton, February, 1884.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Howell & Murphy, for appellants.
Messrs. Edwards & Tracy, contra.

February 26, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action in the usual form to foreclose a mortgage upon a lot of land in St. George's, Colleton County, given by Joseph G. Hester and his wife, Josephine N. Hester, September 2, 1868, to secure a note to the plaintiff for $750. The action was not commenced until 1883, and the plaintiff, finding that the mortgagors, Hester and wife, had left the country, and the mortgaged premises were in the possession of other persons, made those in possession as well as the mortgagors parties defendant. The complaint alleged the execution of the note and mortgage, that the debt was not paid, and, stating that the persons in possession of the land set up some interest therein "accruing since the execution of the mortgage," prayed foreclosure.

The mortgagors, Hester and wife, did not answer, but let the case go by default. The answering defendants, however, claimed that they had been in possession of the land for more than ten years, and "deny that the mortgagors have any interest in the *premises, and allege that they, the said defendants, are seized in fee thereof."

The plaintiff made the usual proof of the note, mortgage still due, &c. The answering defendants offered no proof whatever as to their claim of title, but moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the plaintiff failed to prove that Hester and wife were the legal owners of the land when they executed the mortgage. The Circuit Judge refused to dismiss the complaint, and upon the proof gave judgment of foreclosure against the mortgagors, Hester and wife, but enjoined its enforcement until an issue could be decided, which he ordered, as to the title of the mortgaged premises, in which the answering defendants who set up title were made the actors.

From this decree and order the said defendants appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

I. "For that the plaintiff having failed to make good by testimony his allegation, 'that the defendants, T. O. McAlhamy and others, claim some interest in, or lien on, the mortgaged premises accruing since the lien of said mortgage,' and having failed to show title in the mortgagors, the judge erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint as against said defendants: such proof being necessary to give the Court of Equity jurisdiction, and enable that court to adjudicate the defendants' title.

II. "For that his honor erred in ordering that an issue be tried by a jury, 'whether or not the defendants have title to the land in these proceedings mentioned,' and that at such trial the defendants shall assume the burden of proof, and shall establish their affirmative defence as set forth in their answer. Whereas, it is submitted, his honor should have held that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to make out his case; that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and that the defendants' title was good against all except him who showed a better title, &c.

III. "For that the tenor of the order is against the settled policy and law of this State, in that it requires the defendants to show that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover," &c.

There is a good deal of confusion in this case, resulting from a want of fulness and perspicuity in the pleadings. It is undoubtedly true that the plaintiff must prove his case, but there is *always a preliminary question as to what is the case made. What was the issue made here by the pleadings? The complaint was in the usual form, to foreclose a mortgage, stating the execution of the note and mortgage, that the debt is still due and unpaid, &c. We do not understand that in such case it is usual for the plaintiff to go on and allege in terms that the mortgaged premises belonged to the mortgagor, but such allegation is always involved. Considering it as made here by the plaintiff, it does not seem to us that it was controverted by the defendants in such way as to make it incumbent on the plaintiff to prove, in the first place, that Hester and wife had title at the time they executed the mortgage. The mortgagors themselves certainly made no such issue, for they made default, and judgment of foreclosure was properly rendered against them.

Did the answering defendants make any such direct issue? Their answer is very peculiar, and really seems carefully to avoid such issue. They do not state how or when their alleged interest arose, but simply that they have had possession for more than ten years, that they are now seized in fee, and that the Hesters now have no interest in the land. It is insisted that this was equivalent to denying that Hester and wife ever had title, but it does not so strike us. Their assertion of title is carefully limited to the present—that they are now seized, &c. This does not, necessarily, exclude the idea that Hester and wife had title when they executed the mortgage, but had subsequently transferred it to them, and that they, being in under the Hesters or with their consent, their title had been perfected by long possession. We cannot say that the plaintiff failed to prove his case, as made by the pleadings, or that the judge erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint.

But who should be the actor in the issue ordered? That must depend upon the inquiry, whether the claim of title by these defendants was what is called new matter; that is to say, whether it is analogous to the plea of confession and avoidance, which admits the cause of action alleged did once exist, and alleges subsequent facts which operate to discharge it. The new matter of the code admits all of the material allegations of the complaint, and consists of facts not alleged therein, which destroy the right *of action and defeat a recovery. From what we have already said, it will be seen that, under the pleadings, the title set up by the answering defendants must be regarded as new matter. The plaintiff stated in the complaint that the claim of the defendants, whatever it might be, "accrued after the lien of the mortgage." This statement was not denied by the answer of the defendants, and the effect of that failure to controvert was to admit the truth of it. "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, shall, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true; but the allegation of new matter in the answer, not relating to a counter-claim or of new matter in a reply, is to be deemed controverted."

verted by the adverse party, as upon a direct denial or avoidance, as the case may be." Code, § 189. We agree with the Circuit Judge, who ordered the issue, that, under the pleadings in this case, the answering defendants should be the actors and prove their allegations of new matter made by them.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Before Hudson, J., Marion, July, 1885.

This was an action by Stephen Smith against the administratrix and children of Samuel S. Smith, to recover under a covenant of warranty contained in a deed of Samuel S. Smith to Stephen Smith, the breach being a prior encumbrance fixed by the case of Clark v. Smith, 13 S. C., 592. The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, after stating the facts and quoting the words of the will of Samuel Smith, jr., proceeded as follows:

I have taken the trouble to copy in full these clauses before commenting upon them, because of the vast research and learning brought to bear by the counsel for the plaintiff in giving construction to them. He contends, in the first place, that the trust here created is one that is executed by the statute and converted into a legal estate in Samuel Smith, the life-tenant, and that the trust being thus removed, the limitations are such as give a fee simple to the said first taker, Samuel Smith, jr., under the rule in Shelley's Case.

I will not attempt to follow the learned counsel through his able argument upon this construction, neither as regards the application of the statute of uses, nor the rule in Shelley's Case. The simple question is, whether Samuel Smith, jr., under this devise took a life estate or a fee simple. It is difficult for me to conceive what language could be used more clearly creating a life estate in Samuel, than the language of the testator, and I hold that such is all he had, and it matters not whether it was legal or in trust, whether the statute executed the use or not. But the statute did not execute the use, nor do the limitations come within the rule in Shelley's Case. At the death of Samuel, jr., his estate terminated, and the children he left surviving him take as remaindermen under the will, and not as heirs at law of the life-tenant. They hold none of this property as descended real estate, so far as the will affects it.

But it is contended by the plaintiff's counsel that the testator, Samuel Smith, sr., revoked or abrogated this part of the will, because, after its execution and before his death, he conveyed this land by deed to his son, Samuel Smith, jr., in fee simple, bearing date January 22, 1857. This deed conveys one hundred and fifty acres of land, more or less, calling for a plat as representing the boundaries, and gives the metes and bounds in a very general manner. The only plat then proved to be in existence is one made as far back as 1840, by surveyor Carmichael, and is a plat of one hundred and fifty acres of land, conveyed by one Turberville to the testator May 14, 1839, and it lies adjacent to, and north of, the Robbins tract, which latter tract is very large, containing over one thousand acres, a fact well known to the testator when he devised it in trust for Samuel and his children, as above set forth. He could not have been so careless and thoughtless as to convey the Robbins land as containing only one hundred and fifty acres, more or less. The description by metes and bounds in the deed of January 22, 1857, fits reasonably well the metes and bounds of the Turberville tract, as found upon the only plat then in existence, and to which he evidently refers, and made it a part of the deed. The area or quantity fits it exactly. Whilst it would be against all the facts and circumstances of the case to so strain matters as to make the deed include the Robbins land within its metes and bounds, I hold that it does not, and that the will alone conveys the latter large tract. The bequest and devise above were never revoked.

But plaintiff's counsel contends that at all events, and in any view of the case, Samuel Smith, jr., died intestate as to this 150 acres of land. It is conceded that on August 16, 1862, he sold it to his daughter, Mrs. Virginia Connerly, who was then a young girl; and this was nearly a month before he entered into the contract of warranty, in selling a six hundred acre tract to his brother, the present plaintiff. But when his deed was put on record on June 28, 1866, Mrs. Connerly did not have it probated, and plaintiff's counsel says that such record is no notice, and that his client stands in the position of a subsequent creditor without notice. I don't think he can, after so long a time, nor in any point of view, make assets descended out of this land. This was in 1862, about twenty years before this suit was instituted, when Samuel Smith, jr., so far as we know, was perfectly solvent. In 1869, for the sake of a more formal deed, and a more definite description of the land, he executed a deed of confirmation, which was duly recorded; an unnecessary act, however.

*The daughter has all along been in possession; and to say now that this deed can be set aside as a fraud, or as void for want of probate when recorded, and thus make the land assets descended; that is, that grantor was seized as of fee of this land at the time of his death in 1880, eighteen years after he had in due and proper form conveyed it to his child, would be doing violence to every principle of law and equity. I hold that under no legal or equitable right can the plaintiff subject this land to the payment of a debt accruing upon a contract entered into with the grantor, after he had parted with this land, and upon which contract a right of action did not accrue for seventeen or eighteen years thereafter. There is no shadow of evidence that when Samuel Smith, jr., gave this land to his daughter, he had in contemplation the committing of a fraud upon his brother Stephen by subsequently selling to him an encumbered tract of land. I conclude that in no point of view can this daughter's land be regarded as derived from her father by descent.

The plaintiff, in my judgment, has failed to show that at the time of his death Samuel Smith, jr., was seized and possessed of any lands now in the hands of his heirs or of any land whatever. The defendants, having received no assets by descent from their said father, are not liable in this action.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

From this decree, the plaintiff appealed upon the exceptions stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. W. W. Sellers, for appellant.

Mr. Ferd. D. Bryant, contra.

March 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The facts of this case are somewhat involved, and in order to understand the points made, it will be proper to make a short statement. Stephen Smith, the plaintiff, claiming to be a creditor of his deceased brother, Samuel S. Smith, instituted this proceeding against his children (heirs), to make liable for his alleged debt certain lands in their possession, claimed to have descended to them from their father, the said Samuel S. He died intestate, leaving no personal estate, and his heirs at law deny that they inherited any lands from him, and whether they did so or not was the question in the case. The contention was principally in regard to two tracts of land, viz., the "Robbins land," consisting of something over 1,000 acres, and a small tract of land adjoining, consisting of 150 acres, and known as the "mill tract," or "Turberville land;" and to prevent confusion we will take them up separately.

As to the Robbins land. Samuel Smith, sr., the father of Samuel S. Smith and the grandfather of most of the defendants, died in 1857, leaving a will bearing date in 1849, by which he devised the Robbins land as follows: "I also give and bequeath to my said son, Wm. H. Smith, the tract of land known as the Robbins land, to have and to hold and to stand seized and possessed of the same to and for the uses and purposes that I have given the three last named negroes, Randall, Betty, and Handy, for the benefit of my son, Samuel Smith, to be held, conveyed, and disposed of by him in the same manner and upon the same trusts and limitations as the said last mentioned negroes given to him, the said Wm. H. Smith."

The uses and purposes declared as to the negroes in a former part of the will were as follows: "In the further trust and confidence, also, that he, the said Wm. H. Smith, do stand seized and possessed of the negroes (naming them) to the use and benefit of my son, Samuel Smith, and that he permit the said Samuel to *have the labor, hire, and services of the said negro slaves and their increase for and during the term of his natural life, and at his death, if there be no child of the said Samuel, who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years (when the division hereinafter is to take place), to hold the said slaves and their increase for the use and benefit of the children of the said Samuel until a child of the said Samuel arrives at the age of twenty-one years; and if the said child be dead, until such time as such child would have arrived at such age if living, then to convey and deliver the said slaves and their increase to the children of the said Samuel or the survivors of them, the child or children of any such child or children to represent or receive the share or shares that the parent or parents would have received if living," &c.

In a subsequent clause of the will, and affecting all the bequests and devises to his various children, the testator further says: "It is, further, my will and desire that if any of my above named seven children should die without leaving a child or children or grandchildren him surviving, the share or shares which I have given such child or children who may die as aforesaid, shall be equally divided between the survivor or survivors of them, and the children of them who may be dead, the child or children of any such who may be dead at the happening of such event to represent and receive the portion or portions of such that the parent of such child or children would have received if living. Such portion of such child or children dying without child or children or grandchildren, as aforesaid, to be vested in the trustee or trustees, when the same appointed to be held by such trustee, upon the same trusts, limitations, and conditions which are provided in the respective clauses relating thereto," &c.

Under these provisions of the will of Samuel Smith, sr., it was contended for the plaintiff, that though the land was devised to Wm. H. Smith, as trustee, for the use of Samuel S. Smith during his life, and then over to his children, the statute executed the use; and, the trust being thus removed, the limitations are such as, under the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, to give a fee simple to the first taker, Samuel S. Smith, of which he died seized and possessed. Upon this question of construction the Circuit

Judge held with the defendants—that they did not inherit *the Robbins land from their father, but received it as devisees under the will of their grandfather, Samuel Smith, sr.

But assuming this to be the proper construction of the will of Samuel Smith, sr., the plaintiff further contends that the Robbins land did not pass under and subject to the trusts and limitations of the will: but that the testator, after he had executed his will (in January, 1857), in consideration of $400, conveyed directly to Samuel S. Smith a tract of land, described in the deed itself as containing 150 acres, but which deed, properly understood, embraces and conveys in addition to the 150 acres the whole of the Robbins land, containing something more than a thousand acres. The defendants, on the other hand, contest this construction of the deed, and insist that the only land intended to be conveyed, or actually conveyed by that deed, was the mill or Turberville tract of 150 acres, which corresponded precisely with the number of acres and reasonably well with the description in the deed. This was little more than a question of location, as to which also, the Circuit Judge held with the defendants—that the aforesaid deed did not cover and convey the Robbins land, which remained the property of Samuel Smith, sr., until his death, and passed under his will.

As to the small parcel known as the mill tract. We have already seen that this tract did not pass under the will of Samuel Smith, sr., but on January 22, 1857, was conveyed directly to Samuel S. Smith by deed. It also appeared that on August 16, 1862, the said Samuel S., in consideration of love and affection, conveyed this land, united with 100 acres of the Robbins land, making 250 acres, to his daughter, Virginia Alice Smith (now Connerly), when she was a little girl. This deed was recorded June 28, 1866, but it did not appear that it had been probated, and a more full and formal deed was executed in 1869. The deed was made before S. S. Smith executed the covenant of warranty, out of which arose, years after, the claim of plaintiff as creditor, and, as far as appears, the donor was then solvent. The donee, Virginia Alice, married F. H. Connerly in 1869, and they have been in actual possession of the land ever since. The plaintiff claims that, although a subsequent creditor of the donor, he is a creditor without notice, as the first informal deed, having been *recorded without regular probate, was not constructive notice to him, and he may have it set aside as void, leaving the land as the intestate property of Samuel S. Smith, deceased. The Circuit Judge ruled with the defendants, saying: "I hold that under no legal or equitable right can the plaintiff subject this land to the payment of a debt, accruing upon a contract entered into with the grantor, after he had parted with this land, and upon which contract a right of action did not accrue for seventeen or eighteen years thereafter. There is no shadow of evidence that when Samuel S. Smith, jr., gave this land to his daughter, he had in contemplation the committing of a fraud upon his brother Stephen by subsequently selling to him an encumbered tract of land. I conclude that in no point of view can this daughter's land be regarded as derived from her father by descent," &c.

The plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the statute of uses executed the trusts of the will of Samuel Smith, sr., so far as it related to Samuel Smith, jr., and transferred the legal estate to Samuel, junior, the cestui que trust.

2. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the life estate given to Samuel Smith, jr., in the will of testator was by proper construction and operation of law enlarged into an estate in fee simple.

3. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that, the statute executing the use, the rule in Shelley's Case applied, and the children (heirs) of Samuel, jr., took by limitation and not by purchase.

4. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that testator revoked his will quoad hoc by his deed of January 22, 1857, to Samuel, jr., conveying 150 acres of land, more or less, adjacent to the lands devised, and so bounding the lands conveyed as to include the lands devised.

5. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the will, being thus revoked, the heirs at law of Samuel, jr., had real assets by descent, and were liable for the breach of their ancestor's covenant of warranty, after eviction.

6. "Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the four deeds of Samuel, jr., to his four daughters, and especially the one *to his daughter, Virginia A., on August 16 and 17, 1862, being voluntary and not recorded, were fraudulent and void as to plaintiff, a subsequent creditor without notice, under 13 and 27 Statute Elizabeth.

7. "Because the plaintiff was not barred, either by the statute of limitations or by lapse of time, by any of the four deeds of August, 1862, or by possession under them, as the plaintiff had no right of action, as to the fraudulent conveyances, until breach of the covenant by eviction."

First. In regard to the construction of the deed from Samuel Smith, sr., to Samuel S. Smith, of date January 22, 1857. We concur with the Circuit Judge, that said deed, properly construed, did not include the Robbins land, of which at that time there was no plat. The description of the land conveyed is not as full and precise as it might have been, but we think the intention was to convey the little tract on Buck Swamp, known as the mill tract, and no more. That tract had been purchased from Turberville, contained 150 acres, lay north of the Robbins land, and adjoined it for some distance. One Carmichael had made a plat of the tract in 1840, which was manifestly before the parties when the deed in question was made, for the deed also calls for the precise quantity of 150 acres, and gives reasonably the outline of the Carmichael plat nearly down to the point in Buck Swamp where the mill tract touched the Robbins land, and then the description proceeds as follows, "thence down said swamp, as the plat represents, by the Edwards land, thence around to the beginning corner." In order to supply the hiatus, it is necessary to determine what was meant by the phrase, "thence around to the beginning corner." Around what? Hardly the Robbins land, of which there was no plat, to which no reference had been made, and which in itself contained about 1,100 acres. We would rather think that the grantor meant around the lines as represented on the plat before him; that is to say, by running down the interior line of the Carmichael plat, which divided the mill tract from the Robbins land, and closing precisely at Bennett Peritts' land, mentioned as the beginning corner. This, we think, is the natural construction, and is the only one which reconciles all parts of the *deed, and is in exact conformity to the number of acres mentioned in it.

Second. Assuming, then, that, the Robbins land passed under the will of Samuel Smith, sr., what is the proper construction of its provisions—what estate did it give and to whom? It is very certain that the land was not devised directly to Samuel S. Smith or his children but to William H. Smith as trustee, "to have and to hold, to stand seized and possessed of the same for certain uses and purposes * * to the use and benefit of my son Samuel, and that he permit the said Samuel to have the profits, rents, and issues for and during the term of his natural life, and at his death, if there be no child of the said Samuel who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, to hold the same for the use and benefit of the children of the said Samuel until a child of the said Samuel arrives at the age of twenty-one years, &c., then to convey and deliver the same to the children of the said Samuel or the survivors of them," &c. It is contended, however, first, that the statute of uses executed the trust and thereby converted the equitable interests of the beneficiaries into legal estates; and then, second, that the life estate given to Samuel S. Smith by operation of the rule in Shelley's Case was enlarged into a fee, and that his children did not take by purchase under their grandfather's will, but from their father by descent.

It is possibly true, as stated at the bar, that on this subject there is some want of clearness and consistency in the cases; but as we understand it, certain principles have been established with reasonable certainty, which, without undertaking to follow the very learned argument of appellants' counsel, we will endeavor to apply to this case. All trusts are not forbidden by the law. It only declares executed a certain class of trusts, the leading test of that class being "that where the intention is that the estate shall not be executed in the cestui que use, and any object is to be affected by its remaining in the trustee, then it shall not be executed." Tried by this test we are of opinion that the trusts here belong to that class which the law will not execute. There cannot be the least doubt about the intention. Most manifestly the testator did not intend that the estate should be executed. And it seems to us equally clear that there were several objects *to be effected by its remaining in the trustee. The land was devised to him, and he was to "hold, stand seized, and be possessed of it" for the use of Samuel S. Smith during his life, then until a child should attain the age of twenty-one years, and then to convey and deliver the same to the children of the said Samuel or the survivors of them. We cannot think this was a mere passive trust. The Escheator v. Smith, 4 McCord, 452; Posey v. Cook, 1 Hill, 414; Porter v. Doby, 2 Rich. Eq., 52; McCaw v. Galbraith, 7 Rich., 80; Bristow v. McCall, 16 S. C., 546, and Farr v. Gilreath, 23 Id., 502.

Third. But if the statute eliminated the trusts and converted the interests given into direct legal estates, we do not see that the limitations are such as to make the rule in Shelley's Case applicable. We know of no clearer definition of the rule than that given by Chancellor Harper in Williams v. Foster, 3 Hill, 194: "By the rule in Shelley's Case it was determined that if an estate of freehold is given to the ancestor and a remainder be therein limited to his heirs or the heirs of his body, such remainder is immediately executed in possession in the ancestor so taking the freehold and he takes an estate in fee or in tail according to the terms of the limitation." As we understand it, the principle is that where the remainder is given to the very persons who would without such remainder take by descent from the life tenant, they shall be held to take by descent and not by purchase. Now, the persons who would have taken by descent from Samuel S. Smith were his lineal descendants in an unbroken line to the remotest generation as his heirs.

Was the remainder in this will given to such heirs by an indefinite line of descent? It seems to us not. Neither heirs, nor heirs of the body, nor even issue are mentioned in the will. The word used is "children," the legal construction of which accords with its popular signification, namely, as designating the immediate offspring; for in all the cases in which it has been extended to a wider range of objects, it was used synonymously with a word of larger import as issue. See 2 Jarm. Wills, 690, and notes to 4th Amer. Edit. There is nothing in the will which requires us to construe "children" as synonymous with "heirs," or "issue," or "heirs of the body." On the contrary, *the will indicates clearly a class of persons to take at a particular period, and they therefore take as purchasers—devisees under the will of their grandfather, and not by descent from their father. See McLure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq., 574; Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C., 228; McIntyre v. McIntyre, Ibid., 291; Reeder v. Spearman, 6 Rich. Eq., 88.

Fourth. The only other question is that in reference to the mill tract, which, as we have seen did not pass under the will. This tract was conveyed directly to Samuel S. Smith, and he, in August, 1862, in consideration of love and affection, conveyed by deed to his young daughter, Virginia Alice, who, in January, 1869, married F. A. Commerley, and they have been in possession of it ever since, more than ten years. The plaintiff's claim as creditor of the donor, Samuel S. Smith, arose in this way: After the aforesaid deed to Virginia Alice was executed by her father he sold a tract of land to the plaintiff with warranty of title, which was broken by eviction as late as 1879, and the proceeding is for damages on that covenant of warranty. So that whether we consider the date of the warranty or the breach of it, the claim arose subsequent to the execution of the deed. "It is well settled that a voluntary deed of conveyance by one who is at the time free from debt is not presumptively fraudulent and void as against subsequent creditors; there being no prima facie presumption against its validity, the burden of proof rests upon the subsequent creditor, who impeaches it, of showing either an actual fraudulent intent or circumstances from which such fraudulent intent may be inferred." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 973, and notes. See, also, Hey v. Niswanger, 1 McCord Ch., 518; Henderson v. Dodd, Bail. Eq., 138; Blake v. Jones, Ibid., 141 [21 Am. Dec. 530]; Egleberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill Eq., 114 [26 Am. Dec. 192]; Footman v. Pendergrass, 3 Rich. Eq., 42.

From the circumstances of the case, and particularly in view of the fact that the claim of the creditor consists in damages for a breach of warranty made many years ago, the Circuit Judge held that the deed from her father to Virginia Alice, though voluntary, was bona fide and without any intention on the part of the donor to commit a fraud subsequently upon his brother, Stephen, by selling him a tract of land from which, as it turned out, he was evicted by paramount title; and in this finding we cannot say that he committed error. As was said by Judge Evans, in Henderson v. Dodd, supra: "This contingent liability was not such, in my opinion, as to authorize the court to set aside the conveyance of Mrs. Henderson to her son John merely because it was voluntary."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

MOORE v. SMITH.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨66.]

Where a verdict has been rendered establishing the legal title of the plaintiff to the land in dispute, but judgment is suspended to await an investigation of the equities set up by defendant as a defence to the action, an appeal would ordinarily be premature (Whitesides v. Barber, 22 S. C., 47); but the defendant here having moved for a new trial of the issue submitted to the jury, and his motion being refused, he has the right to have his appeal heard now. Code, § 11, ¶ 2.

Where an administrator filed in the Probate Court an ex parte petition praying the sale of the lands of his intestate in aid of assets, and the heirs were not mentioned in any of the proceedings, in action subsequently brought by the heirs to recover the land from the purchaser at the Probate Court sale it cannot be presumed that these heirs, who were necessary parties to such a proceeding, had been brought within the jurisdiction of the Probate Court.

[3. Ejectment ⇨106.]

In an action by these heirs to recover the possession of this land, the defendant alleged that the purchase money paid by him had been applied to the payment of debts of the intestate. The Circuit Judge properly submitted only the legal issue to the jury, withholding from their consideration the equitable defence; and upon verdict rendered for plaintiffs, he properly suspended the entry of judgment thereon, and referred the equitable defence to the master for testimony and report.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover possession of a tract of land, both plaintiffs and defendant claiming under a common source of title, to wit, one Edgar Doby; the plaintiffs claiming as his heirs at law, and the defendant under a sale made by the judge of probate under a proceeding to marshal the assets of Doby's estate. The sale was made upon a proceeding instituted in the Court of Probate by the administrator of Edgar Doby to which the heirs at law of said Doby do not seem to have been made parties. The defendant in his answer, after denying plaintiffs' title, sets up as a second defence the fact that the land was sold in aid of the personality to pay the debts of said Edgar Doby and bought by Andrew Crawford, Esq., for the sum of two hundred and fifty-five dollars, which was paid by him into the Probate Court and the largest portion thereof was applied to said debts. He therefore, as the alienee of said Crawford, claimed that he should be subrogated to the rights of the creditors of Doby whose debts had thus been paid, and that he is entitled to recoup from the plaintiffs the said sum of two hundred and fifty-five dollars so paid by said Crawford. The plaintiffs replied admitting the payment of the two hundred and fifty-five dollars by Crawford, but denying each and every other allegation in respect thereto.

At the trial the plaintiffs proved seizin in Edgar Doby and that they were his heirs at law, together with the rental value of the land, and then introduced the record of the proceedings in the Court of Probate under which the sale was made, by virtue of which defendant claimed title. When the plaintiffs closed their case the defendant submitted a motion for a non-suit upon the following grounds: "1st. That in the absence of any proof to the contrary there was a presumption from the proceedings appearing in the record that the Probate Court had obtained jurisdiction of the persons of the heirs at law of Edgar Doby by the service of the necessary process. 2d. That the real estate of said Edgar Doby, deceased, being assets for the payment of debts and at the time in the possession of the administrator, a sale thereof by such administrator, under the orders of the Probate Court, even without the heirs at law being parties, would convey a good title. 3d. That the land in question having been sold for the payment of the debts of Edgar Doby, deceased, by order of the Probate Court, and the money having been applied to the payment of such debts, the plaintiffs were not entitled to maintain this action for the possession of the land without first tendering a return of the money, although the sale might have been void." The motion was refused and the defendant duly excepted.

The Circuit Judge then charged the jury that the plaintiffs, having established their legal title, were entitled to a verdict for the possession of the land, "though it would still be a question for the court, in the exercise of its equity powers, to determine what relief should be granted to the defendant." To this charge defendant excepted on the same grounds as those taken for a nonsuit. The defendant requested his honor, the Circuit Judge, to charge as follows: "That if the jury believe that the land in question was sold by order of the Probate Court for the payment of the debts of Edgar Dobeý, deceased, and that the money was applied to the payment of the debts, the plaintiffs are not entitled to maintain this action for the possession of the land without first tendering a return of the money, although the sale may have been void." His honor declined so to charge and the defendant excepted.

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiffs the defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused in an order in which the Circuit Judge held that, "although the verdict must stand, execution and enforcement thereof must be suspended until the equities of the defendant are heard and determined. The facts are not before me in such shape as to enable me to decree thereupon intelligently, but in accordance with the case of Cathcart v. Sugenhimer (18 S. C. 123), I do adjudge that if the facts sustain the allegations of the answer that the said purchase money was applied in due course of administration to the payment of debts of the decedent, Edgar Dobeý, to that extent the defendant is entitled to be reimbursed before he can be compelled to surrender the land to the plaintiffs. In order that the *facts may be made to appear in such form as will enable the court to make a final decree, it is ordered that it be referred to the master to take testimony and report how much, if any, of the purchase money paid for the land in dispute at the sale thereof by order of the Probate Court to Andrew Crawford, was applied to the just and bona fide debts of the deceased, Edgar Dobeý, in due course of administration. And that the judgment herein upon the verdict of the jury be suspended until the coming in and hearing of said report and the judgment of the court thereon." The defendant excepted to the refusal of his motion for a new trial.

The defendant also gave the following notice of appeal: "Please take notice that the defendant will appeal from the judgment entered upon this cause upon the grounds stated in the exceptions heretofore taken."

This case is very much like the case of Whitesides v. Barber (22 S. C. 47), where the appeal was held to be premature, there having been there, as here, no final judgment entered; and, on the contrary, the same having been suspended until the facts, upon which the equities set up by the appellant rested, were ascertained and the same adjudged. But in that case there was no order refusing a motion for a new trial of the issue submitted to the jury, while here there is such an order; and hence, under subdivision 2, of section 11, of the Code, we suppose that the appellant has a right now to have his appeal heard. We will proceed, therefore, to consider whether there was any error in refusing the motion for a new trial. The grounds of this motion are the same as those relied upon on the motion for a nonsuit hereinabove set out.

We do not see how, in the face of the record to the contrary, any presumption can arise that the Court of Probate had obtained jurisdiction of the persons of the heirs at law of Edgar Dobeý. The proceeding does not purport to be anything more than an ex parte proceeding of the administrator. The heirs are not even named as parties, and certainly the record does not show that they were ever made parties by any proper process for that purpose. The order of the judge of probate does not recite that all proper and necessary parties were before him. In fact, there is *nothing whatever to indicate that the heirs were even intended to be made parties, and, on the contrary, everything to show that they were not parties. That they were necessary parties cannot, for a moment, be doubted. The title to Edgar Dobeý's real estate descended to them immediately upon his death, and could never be divested except by some act of theirs, or by some order of court made in a proper proceeding to which they were parties.

The other grounds are based upon a misconception of the nature and object of the action, and the defences set up. The action was simply an action at law to recover the possession of real estate, to which two defences were pleaded, one a denial of plaintiffs' title, which was plainly legal in its nature, the other that defendant should be subrogated to the rights of the creditors of Edgar Dobeý, whose debts, as it was alleged, had been paid by the purchase money of the land, which was plainly equitable in its nature. One of these issues was triable on the law side of the court, with the aid of a jury, while the other was triable on the equity side, by the court alone: and it would have been error to confuse the two. Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 97, and many other cases of a similar character. The defendant having denied plaintiffs' title, the issue thus raised was properly submitted to a jury, and that branch of the court had nothing to do with the equitable features of the case. Those features were to be considered and determined by the court after the verdict of the jury had established the legal title of the plaintiffs. There was, therefore, no error in refusing the motion for non suit on the grounds taken, or in refusing the request to charge above set out, as they involved matters not proper for the consideration of the jury, but were alone cognizable by the court after the issue as to the legal title had been determined by the verdict of the jury.

We agree entirely in the view taken by the Circuit Judge. Whether there were any bona fide debts due by the intestate Dobey, and whether the proceeds of the sale, or any part thereof, had been properly applied to the payment of such debts, were matters which could only be determined in a proceeding to which the heirs were parties, where they could be heard as to such questions. It did not appear that any debt had been reduced to judgment against the administrator, and it did not even appear that any claim had been established before the judge of probate, in the proceeding for the sale of land, in the usual way under a proceeding to marshal assets, which, however, would not have been binding on the heirs, inasmuch as they were not parties to such proceeding. The only thing that does appear is that in the ex parte return of the administrator he credits himself with paying sundry alleged debts of the intestate, which, so far as appears, had never been legally established in any form whatever.

The judgment of this court is, that the order of the Circuit Court refusing a new trial be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the order of the Circuit Judge.

GILKERSON v. CONNOR.

M. contracted to purchase a lot of land from C. and made sundry payments, leaving a balance due. M., being indebted to G., gave to him the following paper: "Mr. C., you will please see that G. is paid for all my indebtedness to him for * *, before you make titles to me for the land and lot purchased of you." G. brought an action alleging these facts, and stating that nothing had been paid him, and he demanded judgment for the amount due him, and if not paid that the land be sold and the proceeds applied to the costs, then to the payment of the balance due C., and then to plaintiff's claim. The defendants demurred upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The Circuit Judge overruled the demurrer, and M. appealed. Held:

1. That the order must be sustained as to C., as he did not appeal.

[2. Pleading ⇨193.]

That the complaint stated a cause of action against M., in that it alleged a debt due by him and demanded judgment therefor.

[3. Bills and Notes ⇨66; Mortgages ⇨11.]

That the equitable interest of M. in this land might be mortgaged, but that this paper was not a mortgage, but a simple order on C. to pay G. a certain debt. As C. never accepted the order and had no funds in hand, he was not liable.

[4. Assignments ⇨71; Mortgages ⇨28.]

The plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, as the paper he holds does not assign him, either legally or equitably, the interest of M. in the original contract.

*The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit Judge was as follows:

According to the allegations of the complaint, the defendant, Ned Murphy, acquired, by his contract to purchase the small lot of land of F. A. Connor, an equitable interest or estate therein. Connor's bond for titles and the possession of Murphy thereunder gave him such an estate in the land as could be aliened by conveyance, absolute or by way of mortgage. See 1 Jones Mort., §§ 172, 173; Roddy v. Elam, 12 Rich. Eq., 343.

I construe this paper in the form of an order, notice, or instruction, which was delivered by Murphy to Gilkerson, a copy of which is set out in the pleadings as an assignment of so much of Murphy's interest in the land, as is sufficient to pay his indebtedness to Gilkerson and a notice to Connor of the fact. It is in the nature of an equitable mortgage on the estate of Murphy in the land. I interpret the complaint to be an action having for its object the foreclosure of this mortgage with all parties in interest properly before the court.

It may be viewed in another light, viz., as an action for specific performance by an assignee of the original contract.

Viewed in either light, the complaint is not obnoxious to a demurrer as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

It is adjudged, therefore, that the demurrer be overruled with costs to abide the event of suit; and that the defendants, F. A. Connor and Ned Murphy, have leave to answer the said complaint within thirty days from the filing of this judgment.

Mr. W. C. Benet, for appellant.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Sometime in 187-, the defendant Murphy contracted to buy from the defendant Connor a certain lot of land situate in the town of Cokesbury, in this State, at the price of —, which was to be paid "within a reasonable time" after said contract, upon which payment Connor agreed to *execute titles. Murphy paid a portion of the purchase money, and was let into possession. He has since made various other payments, but there still remains unpaid some $155. Since Murphy has been in possession, he has become indebted to the plaintiff, and on February 21, 1881, he executed to the plaintiff a paper, of which the following is a copy: "South Carolina. Abbeville County. Mr. F. A. Connor: You will please see that Mr. Gilkerson is paid for all my indebtedness to him for advances, and for his security to Wm. Z. McGhee for one horse, before you make titles to me for the land and lot purchased of you, &c. (Signed) Ned Murphy, [L. S.] In the presence of F. F. Gary, &c."

The complaint of the plaintiff stated the above facts, in substance, with the further statement, that the amount due the plaintiff from the defendant Murphy was $259, no part of which had been paid, and that Connor had been duly notified of the execution of the paper above referred to, but that Connor and Murphy had refused to adjust and settle the matter; wherefore he prayed judgment against Murphy for the amount aforesaid, and in case of his refusal or inability to pay the same, that the land be sold, the proceeds to be applied, first, to the costs and expenses of suit; second, to the payment of the balance due Connor; and, third, to the claim of the plaintiff, &c.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. His honor, Judge Hudson, overruled the demurrer, on two grounds: First, because, in his opinion, the paper in question was an equitable mortgage of Murphy's interest in the land, and the action being an action to foreclose this mortgage, it was maintainable; and, second, the action might be regarded as an action for specific performance by an assignee of the original contract. The defendant Murphy appealed upon several exceptions, contesting both the grounds upon which his honor overruled the demurrer.

We think his honor's order must be sustained, but upon other grounds than those upon which it was based. In any event, it must be sustained as to Connor, because he has not appealed, and it must be sustained as to Murphy, for the reason that the complaint states a cause of action against him, independent of the *relief sought, by foreclosure of the equitable mortgage. It is stated that Murphy is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $259, which the paper in question was executed to secure, and it demands that Murphy be required to pay this amount. In other words, it demands judgment, and only seeks a sale of the land in the event that Murphy refuses, or is unable to pay the said debt. Here, then, is a clear cause of action, which was sufficient to sustain the complaint and keep it in court, although one of the remedies sought may not have been appropriate or pertinent. We do not think, however, that the paper in question was either an equitable mortgage, giving a lien upon the lot, which the plaintiff Gilkerson could enforce, nor did it authorize Gilkerson, as assignee of the original contract of purchase, to demand specific performance.

What is the legal character of the paper? It is nothing more than an order drawn by Murphy on Connor in favor of the plaintiff. Connor, as it appears, had no funds in his hands belonging to Murphy, nor did he accept the order. Connor was, therefore, in no way liable upon this order. It may be said, however, that while Connor had no funds in his hands belonging to Murphy, yet that he held titles to the lot in question, in which Murphy had an equitable interest, to the extent of the purchase money paid by him, and that this paper was drawn on the land to that extent, and, therefore, a mortgage on it to that extent, as an equitable interest may be mortgaged. 1 Jones Mort., §§ 172-3; Roddy v. Elam, 12 Rich. Eq., 345.

It is true, that where one gets possession of land under a contract of purchase with bond for titles, or, perhaps, even under a mere contract of purchase without the bond, in terms, for titles, he may have such an equitable interest therein as would be the subject of mortgage; and if it appeared that such was the intention of the parties here, that is, that Murphy intended to mortgage his equitable interest in the land to the plaintiff, and give him a specific lien thereon, it might possibly be enforced. But does this intent appear, from a legitimate construction of the paper? The land is not mentioned as a pledge to the plaintiff, nor does it appear anywhere in the paper, expressly or impliedly, that it was intended to be a security for the plaintiff's claim. On *the contrary, as already stated, the paper is a mere order on, or rather a request to, Connor, that he pay a debt to the plaintiff, which Murphy acknowledges he owes to said plaintiff, saying, in substance, if he would do so that he might hold on to the titles until he was reimbursed. But Connor has not made the payment requested; he has declined. Nor has he assigned any rights he had, if any, under it to the plaintiff.

Under these circumstances, it seems to us that it would be stretching the doctrine of mortgages of equitable interests too far to allow the plaintiff a specific and prior lien on this land by virtue of a paper of the kind before us. The authorities cited in the argument before us sustain the proposition that certain equitable interests in land may be the subject of a mortgage, but that is not the question here. The question is, does the paper in question amount to a mortgage, and not whether the interest of Murphy is mortgagable. It is certainly not a mortgage in form, and, therefore, it is not a legal mortgage. Nor does it appear to us to have been intended as a mortgage to the plaintiff, and, therefore, it is not an equitable mortgage, of an equitable interest, as claimed. Nor do we think that the action can be construed to be an action for specific performance by the plaintiff as an assignee of the original contract, as, in our opinion, the paper does not assign said original contract, either legally or equitably.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, overruling the demurrer, be affirmed, as to both defendants, on the grounds stated above.

Before Kershaw, J., Greenville, November, 1883.

This was an action by Frank & Adler against William C. Humphreys, commenced in February, 1883. The appeal was from the following decree:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs to set aside the release of a debt due them by the defendant, alleging that it was given upon a general composition of debts between the defendant and all his creditors, whereby defendant was discharged upon the payment of forty per cent. of the amount due upon the claims against him, which was procured by a false statement of the amount and value of his assets and other misrepresentations made by the defendant to his creditors. The prayer of the complaint in substance is that the release of plaintiffs' demand be declared null and void, and the payment stand merely as a payment pro tanto; that the plaintiffs have judgment for the balance of their debt, or such other relief as they may be entitled to. The defendant by his answer denies the frauds alleged.

The cause was placed upon calendar one, and heard as a jury case. After a protracted hearing, a great deal of testimony, and an exhaustive argument, both upon the law and the facts, the case was submitted to the jury and they found for the defendant. The jury were charged in accordance with the requests in writing of plaintiffs' counsel, with such further explanation as occurred to the presiding judge to be proper. After the rendition of the verdict, plaintiffs' counsel made a motion, upon the minutes, for a new trial, heard upon the facts, and upon supposed errors of the presiding judge.

*While they moved for a new trial, the plaintiffs' counsel also insisted that this was really a case in chancery, to be decided by the judge, one of them claiming, however, that the verdict should not have the usual effect of findings on issues submitted. Defendant's counsel conceded that this was properly a case in chancery, to be decided by the court upon the facts as settled by the verdict, so far as the court was satisfied with the verdict, as in all cases submitted from a court of chancery to a jury. In this latter view I fully concur, and if the case had resulted differently, and the court had gone on to decree relief to the plaintiffs, all the creditors would have been called in to share in the benefit of the decree, if the entire compromise had been held void, or at least all the compromising creditors, if the release was confined to subjecting a particular fund to distribution among them. There will be something more to be said upon this subject hereafter.

The complaints against the presiding judge will now be noticed. Upon his examination in chief, when the defendant was stating in a narrative form his means of meeting the compromise, he said: "I had two thousand dollars, and was selling a hundred dollars a day, and therefore I asked for thirty days' time. I also went to Alexander and asked him about getting the insurance money. I had the insurance money then in my safe. Alexander had signed the receipts under the assignments; the money was to come to Alexander, and the companies required his receipt. I used the money in my business and in settling these claims." The witness was here led by the examination to speak of other matters. Afterwards the subject was resumed, and he said: "I commenced paying off on the 9th day of February. From sales and cash I had $5,600. After the creditors had accepted I took the checks for the insurance money to Alexander. The checks were payable to Alexander. I did not get permission to use the money until after the compromise. That was $1,760. It was paid a little before it was due."

Plaintiffs' counsel in the argument to the jury—the closing argument—having insisted to them that defendant had said that, at the time of the compromise, he "had the insurance money then in his safe," without any qualification, I thought it my duty to remind the jury of what else he had said on the subject, in order to prevent their being misled as to what the evidence had been. I therefore read the passage of the testimony last quoted to the jury. The counsel then turned to the jury, and, as I thought, appealed to their recollection, against my statement as to what the witness had said. I told him he must not do that. This was one of the grounds insisted on for a new trial.

I am authorized by law to state the testimony, and when counsel in the closing argument undertake to say what a particular witness said, and confines his statement to a single remark, and insists upon that as the testimony of the witness upon that point, I consider that I would be derelict to my duty if I did not also call to the attention of the jury whatever else the witness may have said upon the same point, explaining or qualifying the remark stated to the jury as his evidence upon the subject. If that be my duty, I cannot conceive that it is proper for counsel, when I have stated the testimony, to insist to the jury that his own statement was the correct one. As I do not consider that the jury were misled in any way by this circumstance, I do not regard the point as material in any respect. If what was said by the presiding judge was calculated to induce the jury to believe that they were bound to accept the statement of the judge as to what the testimony really was, in the place of their own recollection or knowledge of it, plaintiffs' counsel ought to have asked that the jury be charged otherwise.

I have no doubt, however, that the jury understood as I did, that, when the witness loudly said, "I had the insurance money then in my safe," he had referred to the checks for the insurance money, as was made fully to appear when he came to speak of particular transactions thereto. The checks, he said, were afterwards transferred to him by Alexander, and if that statement were not true from the nature of the business, its falsity could easily have been shown. The policies of insurance were produced in evidence, with Alexander's receipts endorsed upon them, Mr. McBee testifying that the companies would not recognize his receipts, but required Alexander's before they would pay the money. All this goes to confirm the statement of defendant, that the money was paid in checks payable to Alexander, and it could not have been difficult to show when the checks were transferred to defendant, or when they were paid to him. But even if the checks had been collected before the compromise, and lay in defendant's safe at the time, the money, according to the testimony, was turned over to defendant to be applied to the repairs or improvement of the building, and could not, without the consent of Messrs. McBee and Alexander, have been diverted to any other purpose, and the point is, under those circumstances, wholly immaterial.

The next point of complaint of the presiding judge was that he instructed the jury in regard to the insurance money as follows, to wit: "That the evidence tended to show that the policies stood in Alexander's name, and that, if so, the money legally belonged to him; that defendant said he considered it Alexander's, though both Alexander and McBee seemed to have claimed it; that if it was Alexander's or McBee's money, still if they had held it the mortgage would have been credited with the amount, and the incumbrances on the property could have been reduced by that amount; that for this reason the creditors ought to have been informed about it; that if it was omitted from the statement innocently, it would not give the plaintiffs a right to recover on that ground. But if it was intentionally omitted, it would be a fraud upon the creditors, and the plaintiffs would be entitled to a verdict on that ground." Plaintiffs insist that whether the omission were intentional or the result of an innocent mistake as to the bearing of the matter upon the value of the securities, it was constructive fraud and sufficient to avoid the compromise.

This is really the only point in the case affecting the verdict of the jury, which I consider at all debatable. In all other respects the verdict of the jury was wholly unaffected by any alleged error of the presiding judge, and is entirely satisfactory to my view and conclusive of all the alleged frauds. It is important to bear in mind that the jury have negatived any fraudulent intent on the part of defendant in his failure to disclose the fact concerning the claim for the insurance money. The only question, therefore, in regard to it is, whether the innocent and unintentional failure to make the disclosure ought to vitiate the settlement between the defendant and his creditors. If it was a *fact which it was his duty to disclose, and if the failure to disclose it may be supposed to have misled the creditors, and to have induced them to agree to the proposed compromise, which they would not have done had they possessed full knowledge of the facts, then it is true that to that extent the compromise would be liable to be set aside.

The property in question had been sold to the defendant by one Alexander, several years before the compromise, for $10,000, of which $3,000 were paid in cash, and the balance secured by a mortgage on the property, payable with interest in annual instalments of $1,000. At the time of the compromise $8,000 remained due on the mortgage. The mortgage debt had been assigned to Mr. Alexander McBee by Alexander as a security for six thousand dollars due by the latter to the former. To the extent, therefore, of $2,000, Alexander retained an interest in the mortgage after Mr. McBee should be satisfied therefrom. The policies of insurance on the property were in Alexander's name, though by him also assigned to Mr. McBee. The creditors appear to have regarded the encumbrance of $8,000, which was represented in the statement submitted to them by the defendant to be upon the property as sufficient to shut them off from any expectation of payment from that source.

There is evidence going to show that Alexander was not satisfied that the property, after the fire, would bring more than enough to satisfy Mr. McBee's debt of six thousand dollars. Mr. McBee said he felt secure of his money, and was willing that defendant should have the insurance money to do what he pleased with it. He said defendant might have thrown it into the river if he chose, so far as he (Mr. McBee) was concerned. Alexander, however, insisted that defendant should only have it upon the condition that it should be laid out on the building, in order to restore the security to its former value. Defendant says that after his compromise, Alexander consented to his using the money otherwise in his business and settling with his creditors, but still upon the express condition that a like sum should be laid out on the building. If Alexander's estimate of the value of the property as a security was correct, then it would require the insurance money and the property to secure the $8,000 due *on the mortgage to him and McBee, and if the creditors were of the like opinion, a knowledge of all the facts would not have affected their decision to accept the proposed compromise.

There is nothing to show that Alexander's estimate was not correct or reasonable. It is true that the property had sold for $10,000, on long time, but it had suffered a direct injury to the amount of $1,760 at least, and valuable buildings adjoining it had also been recently destroyed by fire, and it is not improbable that that would affect its marketable value until they were restored at least. If the creditors had been forced to resort to that property, they would have had to sell it subject to the rights of the mortgages. Who is to say it would have yielded them anything under the circumstances as they then stood? In the evidence before me, I cannot undertake to say that it would.

There is no evidence that the creditors were misled in any way. The plaintiffs were represented by their Mr. Frank, who was in Greenville for some days before the meeting of creditors, for the purpose of making an investigation into defendant's affairs. He was in defendant's store, the building which had been damaged by the fire in question. The fire had then recently occurred. He must have known of the fire. It is not reasonable to suppose that he made no inquiry as to whether there was an insurance upon the building, or as to the amount and condition of the fund. Many of the creditors were represented by astute and industrious attorneys, local lawyers. It is not reasonable to suppose that they were all ignorant of the fire, the insurance, and condition of the fund. These are not matters of a private nature. Nothing is more common than the publication in the newspapers of the amount of losses, and of the insurance on property destroyed or injured by a fire so destructive as this in a city like Greenville. Mr. McBee, who held the mortgage and claimed the insurance moneys, was present at the meeting of creditors representing his debt. He had no intent or motive in concealment upon this subject. He was incapable of acting upon it, if he had such motive. It did not seem to have occurred to him that the subject was one which was required to be brought to the notice of the creditors.

It is noticeable, too, that this concealment is not one of the *matters alleged in the complaint as a ground for attacking the compromise, and was first brought into the case by the defendant when giving testimony as a witness at the trial. It would seem, therefore, that the plaintiffs either continued in ignorance of what they now deem a most important fact for all these years, with the fullest opportunities of inquiring of Mr. McBee, Mr. Alexander, the insurance companies and agencies, the bank, and others having knowledge; or they considered the matter of no importance. When a matter is involved in so much doubt, I am not disposed to set aside a settlement like this, after so long a time, upon the mere possibility that the creditors might have insisted on better terms had they known the facts.

There is another question which has occurred to me, during the investigation of this case, the solution of which is not favorable to the plaintiffs. They do not occupy such a position in relation to the subject as to entitle them to any special favor. They endeavored, by a side bargain, to get an advantage over the other creditors, by contracting with defendant for the payment to them of five hundred dollars, under the guise of compensation for using their influence with the other creditors, to induce them to accept the compromise, which they claim to have done by writing some letters and sending some telegrams. The bargain was rescinded by defendant the next day after it was made, as a wrong to other creditors; but it was afterwards insisted on by plaintiffs, with threats of litigation in other courts than that of South Carolina; when this failed, the present action followed, after the lapse of three years from the date of the settlement. No other creditor has joined in the complaint, nor is it a creditors' bill, but a suit solely for the benefit of the plaintiffs. All the allegations of fraud stated specifically against the defendant have been found by the jury in his favor.

The plaintiffs are placed in the position of having pursued the defendant without just cause. While a fraudulent debtor ought to be prosecuted and pursued ruthlessly for the public good, charges like these ought never to be made unless the proof be clear and convincing. Nor should a creditor, who has joined in a general composition, separate himself from his associates in such litigation. If in this case the fraud had been established, it would have been the duty of the court to call in the other creditors before the master. Plaintiffs would not have been permitted to get the advantage over their associates in the compromise. If the settlement had been set aside only on account of the failure to mention the insurance money at the creditors' meeting, but without fraudulent intent on the defendant's part, the relief would have been confined to the distribution of that fund among the compromising creditors, and they must have been called in. If, however, the jury had found actual fraud, and the whole settlement had been thus vitiated, all the creditors would have been called in to share in the distribution of the defendant's assets.

Therefore, under such circumstances, a single creditor would not be allowed to sue alone. A demurrer would have laid to this complaint on this ground, or the objection might have been made in the answer. Not having been made, the defendant has waived it. In a meritorious case, the court would, under such circumstances of waiver, cure the irregularity by calling the creditors before the master. But the plaintiffs do not appear before the court under such a favorable aspect as to entitle them to the exercise of this administrative power of the court in their behalf, even if a stronger case had been made against the defendant. Mr. Justice Story, in his work on Equity Pleadings (§ 103), says: "A single creditor, in cases of this sort, would not be permitted by a court of equity to sue for his own single demand without bringing the other creditors in some form or manner before the court, from the obvious inconvenience and apparent injustice in deciding upon the extent of their rights and intents in their absence."

Joy v. Wirtz (1 Wash. C. C., 417 [Fed. Cas. No. 7,553]) was a suit in equity, brought by two creditors, for the purpose of setting aside a release made by all the creditors to a debtor, upon an assignment of his estate for their benefit. Mr. Justice Washington thought that all the creditors should have been made parties, or the bill should have been brought in behalf of all, for all of them might be affected by the decree setting aside the release, as it would not be set aside as to a part of the creditors, and left optional as to others. He stated the rule thus: "Where the creditors are to be paid out of a particular fund, or united in the same transaction so as to produce a privity between them, all are to join in either by name or by being represented by a part serving in the names of all." The whole subject is discussed ably and fully in the case of Johnston v. R. R. Bank, 3 Strob., 337, and especially in the dissenting opinion of Ch. Johnstone in that case.

On the whole case, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the findings of the jury upon the issues submitted to them herein be and they are hereby confirmed, and that the complaint herein be dismissed, and that the defendant have leave to enter up judgment against the plaintiffs for his costs and disbursements herein, and that execution issue therefor.

Plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his honor erred in failing to decree that the $2,500 taken out of his store by the respondent and turned over to his wife shortly before the settlement, belonged to him, and was fraudulently concealed from his creditors.

2. Because his honor erred in not decreeing that the concealment of the $1,700 insurance money by respondent was a fraud upon his creditors, and that the settlement should be set aside on that ground.

3. Because his honor decided that the verdict of the jury negatived any fraudulent intent on the part of the respondent in his failure to disclose the facts about the insurance money to his creditors.

4. Because his honor erred in deciding that the appellants and other creditors must have known of the insurance money, when there was no evidence at all that they had any knowledge or even a suspicion of it, and all the evidence on that point shows that none of the creditors knew anything about it.

5. Because his honor erred in deciding that the creditors did not regard the insurance matter as of any importance, because none of them had discovered it before the trial of this action on the Circuit.

6. Because the duty of the respondent to know his rights as to the insurance money, cannot be overcome by his feigned ignorance thereof.

7. Because the respondent's testimony showed that at the *meeting of creditors he falsely represented the mortgage of Mrs. Thurston to amount to $660, when in fact he only owed $600 on it.

8. Because the testimony of the respondent shows that at the time of the creditors' meeting he had property outside of what was represented by him to his creditors.

9. Because the respondent wilfully and knowingly misrepresented the extent and condition of his property to his creditors at the time of the compromise, and for that reason his honor should have decreed for the appellants.

10. Because the respondent wilfully concealed facts which it was his duty to disclose to his creditors, and for that reason his honor should have decreed in favor of the appellants.

11. Because his honor erred in attempting to define what misrepresentations of the respondent would or would not be sufficient to influence the minds of the creditors in accepting the compromise.

12. Because his honor should have held that a composition with creditors being a bounty bestowed upon the debtor, the utmost good faith is required in his representations of his assets, and creditors are not required to investigate for themselves, but may rely wholly upon debtor's statements.

13. Because his honor directed that there was no evidence that the creditors were misled in any way.

14. Because his honor accepted the verdict of the jury as conclusive of all alleged frauds in favor of the respondent, and made his decree in accordance therewith, without coming himself to a conclusion as to said frauds.

15. Because his honor erred in deciding that the jury had specifically found all the allegations of fraud against the appellants, and in decreeing that the findings of the jury upon the issues submitted to it be confirmed, when in fact no specific issues had been submitted to it.

16. Because his honor having erred in his statement of the respondent's testimony in reference to the insurance money to the jury, and also in charging the jury that if the insurance matter was omitted from the statement to the creditors innocently, the appellants could not recover, which points were made material by the effect which was given to them, the verdict cannot be allowed to stand, and his honor erred in refusing to entirely disregard it in making up his decree.

17. Because his honor erred in stopping appellants' counsel in the closing argument because he did not, as his honor thought, state all that respondent had testified to on a particular point.

18. Because his honor erred in interrupting appellants' counsel, and in stating to the jury that the respondent had not sworn at the time he made the offer of compromise he had the insurance money in his safe; and he erred further when the counsel appealed to the recollection of the jury, by again interrupting him and saying that counsel could not appeal from his statement of the testimony to the recollection of the jury, and that the jury must take the testimony from his notes, from which he read in part.

19. Because his honor erred in deciding that this action was not meritorious because the appellants had attempted at the time of the settlement to get something for their services in making the settlement.

20. Because his honor having decided upon the objection of the appellants that it was not competent for the defendant to give in evidence any conversation between himself and Alexander, who was dead at the time of the trial, it was error for him to allow it to go as evidence to the jury, and to use it as proof in making up his decree.

Messrs. Wait & Westmoreland, for appellants.

Messrs. Perry & Heyward, A. Blythe, contra.

March 8, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant, a merchant at Greenville, being in failing circumstances, called his creditors together, and effected a compromise at forty cents on the dollar. The plaintiffs attended the meeting, and, consenting to the compromise, received their pro rata and receipted the defendant in full. Afterwards they instituted the action below, alleging that defendant had falsely represented his ability to pay, and that at *the time his creditors accepted his offer of compromise he was able to pay in full, which he kept concealed for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, with other circumstances of fraud, and they prayed that the compromise be declared void and the payment of forty cents on the dollar be regarded as a payment pro tanto, and that they might have judgment for the balance of their debt, to wit, $1,914.20, with interest. The defendant denied the fraud.

Upon the call of the case on calendar I, Judge Kershaw presiding, "it was determined, without objection, that all issues, and especially the two issues of fraud or no fraud and the amount due, if they should find for the plaintiffs, be referred to the jury without framing any issues specially." The plaintiffs made several requests to charge, all of which his honor charged. The verdict was for the defendant, whereupon, it being conceded by the counsel on both sides that the case was a case in chancery, to be decided by the court upon the facts as settled by the verdict, so far as the court was satisfied therewith, his honor, after taking the papers and full time for consideration, filed a written decree, in which he confirmed the verdict, and dismissed the complaint with leave to defendant to enter judgment and execution for his costs and disbursements.

The appeal presents a number of exceptions in form, twenty in all. The first sixteen, however, may be consolidated under one head, to wit, because his honor confirmed the verdict, when he should, in the opinion of the appellant, have disregarded it, and have found the compromise fraudulent for the causes stated in these exceptions. The 17th and 18th assign error because his honor interrupted appellant's counsel in his argument, and corrected his statement of the testimony, in certain particulars, in which his honor thought counsel was mistaken. 19th, because his honor "decided the action was not meritorious," the appellant having attempted at the time of settlement to get something for their services in making the settlement. And the 20th, "because his honor, having decided upon the objection of the appellant that it was not competent for the defendant to give in evidence any conversation between himself and Alexander, who was dead at *the time of the trial, it was error for him to allow it to go to the jury, and to use it as proof in making up his decree."

The appellant's counsel have not discussed their exceptions seriatim, but submitted their argument under several propositions. First proposition: That his honor erred in refusing to set aside the verdict, (1) because his honor erred in refusing to submit specific issues of fact to the jury upon plaintiffs' motion, and in submitting the whole case, the issues of law as well as of fact. We find it stated in the "Case," that after some discussion by counsel, it was determined, without objection, that all issues, &c., should be referred to the jury. Besides this, there is no exception which raises this question.

This subdivision, therefore, and the discussion under it must be passed over.

(2) "Because his honor erred in stopping plaintiffs' counsel in the manner he did, and in stating only a part of defendant's testimony on a given point, and in telling the jury they must decide according to his notes of testimony as read to them" (16th and 17th exceptions). No error of law can be assigned to a Circuit Judge for correcting counsel in their statements where he, the judge, conceives that a mistake as to the testimony is being made. While the judge, under the constitution, cannot charge upon the facts, yet it is his duty to take down the evidence, or have it taken, and so far as what is said by the witnesses, he is arbiter between counsel, and his notes of testimony may be read. From what is said in the "Case" as to what occurred, we not only see no legal error affecting the issues involved, but we think his honor was quite within his power over the conduct of the business before him when he ruled that plaintiffs' counsel must not appeal from his notes of the testimony to the recollections of the jury, which, before the counsel's disclaimer, he, the judge, thought was rudely made, as it is stated. Counsel have the right to defend their clients' interests with earnestness and ardor, and it is commendable for them to do so, but their zeal should be restrained within proper bounds, and to this end much should be left to the discretion of the court.

(3) The next subdivision under the first proposition is, "Because his honor erred in charging the jury, that if the defendant innocently omitted to mention the insurance money, or to include *it in his statement of assets, it was no fraud." If the case was a case at law, and the presiding judge had charged the jury in the general terms as stated, doubtless it would have been error, as even an innocent omission of property, where the creditors are relying upon the statements of the debtor, might vitiate the compromise, at least to the extent of the value of the property thus omitted. But this is not a case at law—it is a case in chancery, and the reference to the jury was to inform the chancellor's conscience. He was not bound by the verdict; in fact, under the law, even after verdict, he was not relieved from examining for himself and finding his own conclusions. This, it seems, he did. In his well considered written decree, he discusses this very matter fully and satisfactorily, to which we refer.

In it, it appears that the policies of insurance were in the name of one Alexander, from whom the defendant had bought the property insured, though they had been assigned to McBee, who held them and the mortgage on the premises to secure a debt of $8,000, $6,000 of which belonged to McBee and the remaining $2,000 to Alexander. The property had been considerably injured by fire, and Alexander was not satisfied but that it would take the insurance money as well as the property in its then condition to indemnify McBee and himself, and he claimed the insurance money as his. Under these circumstances, the defendant did not estimate it as a portion of his assets, to be used in compromise with his creditors. It is true that he did use it afterwards in settling with his creditors, but this was done with the consent of Alexander, and with the express understanding that a like sum should be expended by Humphreys in repairing the property, so as to reinstate it as a security for the mortgage debt. And it was upon these grounds that the judge held, for himself, that the failure of the defendant to mention this money at the compromise was not fraudulent, express or implied. So that his charge to the jury, whether in the abstract right or wrong, was not material. Even supposing that the verdict was influenced thereby, yet his honor went behind the verdict and decided for himself, as was his right and duty. We think his finding and ruling in this respect was correct.

It will not be necessary to consider the other propositions severally on the question of fraud, or their subdivisions. They resolve themselves into a general allegation, that his honor erred in not finding fraud, actual and intentional, or, at least, implied and constructive, and, therefore, the composition should have been vacated. The fact of fraud, or its existence in a transaction, when alleged, is always a question of fact, and although when it comes before this court in a case in chancery we are at liberty to look into and pass upon it, yet our examination is subject to the familiar principle, that we should not disturb the finding below, except where that finding is wholly unsustained by the evidence, or is manifestly against its weight.

Now, wherein is the decree objectionable as to either of these rules? The specific allegations of fraud alleged in the complaint are, 1st, that the defendant sought to account for his deficiency in assets, because he had unexpectedly been called upon to pay a large sum to the United States Government by reason of some connection with a distillery; and, 2d, that the defendant falsely represented his ability to pay his debts, having more property than stated, which he kept concealed from his creditors. Nothing is said in the exceptions in regard to the distillery; we must, therefore, regard that charge as satisfactorily explained. The other misrepresentations as to the amount of property on hand, or that should have been on hand, specified in the exceptions, were $2,500 alleged to have been taken from the store and turned over to defendant's wife, just before the compromise; also $1,760, the insurance money, and a mortgage of Mrs. Thurston put down by him at $660, when it should have been $600. We have looked into the testimony as to these matters, and we cannot see that his honor's refusal to set aside the compromise was wholly unsupported, or against the weight of the testimony as to these matters. And the same may be said as to the other exceptions in which the appellants allege, generally that the evidence showed that the defendant had other property than that disclosed, &c., and that his honor erred in confirming the verdict, &c.

The 19th exception raises no question of law or fact.

As to the 20th. It appears that his honor sustained appellants' exception to conversation with Alexander, and if he afterwards permitted it to go to the jury, we have not found such fact *in the "Case"; but even if he did, it would not be sufficient to reopen the case, and have the matter reinvestigated. The main question involved was one of fraud in the conduct of the defendant. This question has been passed upon by a jury after full and most thorough examination and argument. The verdict was for the defendant. This verdict the Circuit Judge has confirmed, and made its result his finding—not hastily, but after taking the papers and giving the case mature consideration, as is apparent from his decree. Under these circumstances, it should require a stronger showing than that made by the appellants, to overthrow the judgment.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

24 S. C. 341

SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Under the decision of this case on a former appeal (20 S. C., 92) the statutory liability of the directors of the defendant corporation for its debts, did not attach to the note sued on, which was a renewal and consolidation of other items of antecedent indebtedness; the directors in office when such indebtedness was created were liable, and not the directors in office at the date of the consolidation. But that case did not decide the facts as to a note consolidated into the note sued on, which was itself a consolidation of antecedent indebtedness. This court, however, concurred with the finding below, that it, too, was a mere renewal and not payment.

The directors' liability, where not barred, was upon the original notes creating the liability, according to their terms; and therefore the directors were not liable for a high rate of interest stipulated in the consolidated note.

Before Hudson, J., Greenville, April, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard before me on the report of the master, to whom it was referred by the decree of Judge Pressley, herein, of date September 28, 1882, to take testimony and report as to what items of debt and their respective dates were consolidated in the note of October 16, 1876, being the note for eight thousand and eight dollars and twenty-seven cents, herein sued on, and also to report who were the directors of the Sullivan Manufacturing Company at the time each debt was contracted. The master in his report gives each item of indebtedness from the beginning, showing the different consolidations and renewals down to the note now in question. The plaintiff's counsel contend that the note for $3,852.52 was a payment of the pre-existing notes and constituted a new contract, especially where the former notes were payable to different parties.

I have carefully examined the opinion of the Supreme Court and the decree of Judge Pressley, and in the light of these decisions, I am satisfied that the position of the plaintiff's counsel is not tenable. Judge Pressley held that this legal note was made up of a series of notes. He says: "I find that the company is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of eight thousand and eight dollars and twenty-seven cents, on the note dated October 16, 1876, with interest at ten per cent. from December 25, 1876." He thus fixes the liability of the company; but he further says: "The directors have pleaded the statute of limitations, and my judgment is that the statute runs in their favor from the time the several debts were contracted. There is no sufficient proof before me as to the exact date of the several contracts which were consolidated in the said note of October 16, 1876." He therefore refers it to the master to ascertain and report the items of debt and their respective dates, and who were directors at the time each debt was contracted. He has thus found, in substance, that the pre-existing notes have not been paid by the giving of the new notes.

Now, the very question here made before me was made and fully argued, and the Supreme Court was asked on the appeal to enlarge Judge Pressley's order. The plaintiff's second ground of exception was: "Because every new note given by the defendant, the Sullivan Manufacturing Company, was a new debt created in satisfaction of an anterior existing debt or debts, and not a mere renewal of the same, especially when the anterior debt or debts were due to strangers and the notes representing the same were delivered up to the said defendant." From the printed arguments used in the Supreme Court and submitted to me, it appears that this exception was argued before that court. They sustain Judge Pressley's decree in every particular. He had sufficient testimony before him to satisfy him that the intention of the parties, which is to govern in all such cases, was consolidation or renewal and not payment, and so found.

I am therefore satisfied that I have not the right, even if I desired to do so, to disturb that which has been settled by these decisions. It is res adjudicata. But even if it was an open question and not res adjudicata, I should still hold that the new notes were renewals, and not payment of the pre-existing debts. The question is simply one of intention, and the onus probandi is on the plaintiff who alleges payment. Yet I am satisfied from an inspection of the different notes themselves, with the endorsements thereon, and from the concurring testimony of the plaintiff and defendants on this point, that the intention of the parties was renewal and not payment, and that the various small notes were consolidated into the large one merely for convenience. Some of the debts which entered into the consolidation were payable to outside parties, and that is the strongest view which can be taken of plaintiff's position. But even that would not justify the conclusion that the debts were paid by the consolidation and new debts created. The treasurer or other financial officer of the company could not thus shift the liability of the directors. They were liable only for the debts which were contracted, or which fell due, during their term of office, and even though the form of the debt was changed, the same liability existed. The liability could not be thus shifted from one set of directors to another set. Such is my construction of the 29th section of the statute.

This suit was instituted on February 17, 1880, and therefore all debts contracted prior to February 17, 1874, are barred. It is, then, simply a question of calculation. The testimony and the report of the master show what notes were renewed and their respective amounts and dates, and who were the directors at said dates. It is only necessary to calculate the amount of each note not barred, according to its tenor, up to the maturity of the large *note, and the interest on each amount thus ascertained up to date at ten per cent. per annum. This will furnish the amount on each note, for which the directors are respectively liable. I find the following notes and due bills which are not barred according to the principles enunciated in this decree, and I number them according to the enumeration set forth in the master's report, to wit: * * *

I further find that George W. Sullivan, sr., George W. Sullivan, jr., and D. Dunklin Moore were the directors during the time the obligations numbered 16 and 17 were contracted and became due, and that George W.

Sullivan, sr., and George W. Sullivan, jr., were the directors at the time the obligations numbered 13, 14, and 15 were contracted and became due. I further find that the obligations reported by the master, and numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, respectively, are barred by the statute of limitations.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendants, George W. Sullivan, sr., George W. Sullivan, jr., and D. Dunklin Moore, for the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars and eighty-five cents, and against the defendants, George W. Sullivan, sr., and George W. Sullivan, jr., in the further sum of twenty-six hundred and seventy-six dollars and twenty-two cents. It is further adjudged, that the plaintiff recover of the defendants the costs of this case on Circuit, except as hitherto adjudged; as to any costs on appeal incurred, this court adjudges nothing in relation thereto now.

Messrs. Perry & Perry and J. H. Whitner, for plaintiff.

March 8, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff brought the action below on a note for $8,008.27, dated October 16, 1876, and bearing interest at 10 per cent. per annum. The note was under seal and was given by the defendant company. Judgment was demanded on this note against the company, and the plaintiff also sought judgment thereon against the defendants, directors of said company, under certain provisions of a certain act of the legislature, which it was alleged in the complaint made the directors liable. The plaintiff also prayed that the corporation be dissolved, that a receiver be appointed, and that an assignment made by the company be set aside as fraudulent and void. These latter prayers, however, are not now involved, having been adjudicated and disposed of on a previous appeal from a decree of Judge Hudson. Sullivan v. Sullivan Manufacturing Co., 17 S. C., 588. After this the case came before his honor, Judge Pressley, who, considering the matters left open by Judge Hudson, gave judgment against the company for the note and interest mentioned above, and also for an open account amounting to $1,432.98, claimed in the complaint. He also authorized judgment against the defendants, G. W. Sullivan, sr., and G. W. Sullivan, jr., for the amount of the account, it being in proof that these defendants were directors during the year this account was contracted. As to the liability of the directors for the large note, supra, he found as matter of fact, that this note was made up by the consolidation of previous debts and indebtedness of the company combined into one, which was the note in question, and that the liability of the directors was not upon the note, but attached to the different items embraced in the consolidation, the directors for the years in which the original items respectively were contracted being liable, subject to the statute of limitation, which was plead, and he referred it to the master as to what items of debt and their respective dates were consolidated in said note, and who were the directors at the time each item of debt was contracted. This decree on appeal was affirmed by this court, 20 S. C., 92.

The case was then remanded, and the master proceeded to make the inquiry ordered, and having reported the various items, amounts, and dates embraced in the consolidated note, with the names of the directors in office when these several items were consolidated, Judge Hudson, after eliminating such debts as were barred by the statute, ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendants, Geo. W. Sullivan, sr., Geo. W. Sullivan, jr., and Dunklin Moore, for $3,500.85, and against Geo. W. Sullivan, sr., and Geo. W. Sullivan, jr., $2,676.22.

pealed: the plaintiff, "I. *Because his honor erred in ruling that, under the Circuit decree of Judge Pressley, as affirmed by the Supreme Court, all the points involved in plaintiff's position were res adjudicata. II. Because his honor erred in ruling that even if the matters in plaintiff's position was an open question, under the evidence, the note for $3,852.52 was a renewal of pre-existing debts, rather than a payment thereof, and a new debt of the said company for which the directors then in office were liable, according to the terms of said note." The defendants (Sullivans) appealed: "Because his honor allows interest against them as directors at the rate of 10 per cent. from the maturity of the large note sued on; whereas they claim that the interest should have been computed in accordance with the terms of the several demands for which they were found liable."

The first exception of plaintiff is very general and fails to raise in itself any separate and distinct legal proposition applicable to the case. It complains that his honor ruled that all of the points involved in plaintiff's position were res adjudicata, but it is not stated what legal points were involved. We suppose, however, from the terms of the second exception, and from what is said by Judge Hudson in his decree, that the error alleged, and complained of, is in reference mainly, if not altogether, to the $3,852.52 note, and we have directed our attention to that. The plaintiff's counsel contended before his honor, Judge Hudson, that whether that note was a payment of pre-existing notes consolidated constituting a new debt, or simply a renewal, was an open question, which they urged should be determined in favor of payment, and therefore that the directors were liable upon it as a new debt. The judge ruled to the contrary: first, because he held that the question was res adjudicata by the former decree of Judge Pressley, affirmed by this court (20 S. C., supra); and secondly, because upon the evidence it was intended as a renewal.

There is no doubt but that this court in the previous appeal (20 S. C., 93) affirmed the decree of Judge Pressley. What was that decree? What was its proper construction? is the real question before us. The plaintiff had sued upon a large note, amounting to $8,008.27, given by the company, upon which he prayed judgment not only against the company, but against the *directors. Judge Pressley found and held that (this note was a consolidation of previous indebtedness of the company, as a renewal and not the creation of a new debt, and therefore that the directors could not be liable on the note; but he held further, that the directors who were in office at the time of the creation of the debts which made up the large note sued on by the consolidation, were respectively liable therefor, subject to the plea of the statute, and he ordered the master to report as to said items, their dates, and the names of the directors then in office. All this this court affirmed, and all this, therefore, is res adjudicata.

It is contended, however, that the note of $3,857.52, now under consideration, which was consolidated into the $8,008.27 note, was itself a consolidation of other and previous notes, and that such being the fact, that plaintiff was not precluded by the decree of Judge Pressley from showing that, as to that note, its consolidation was not renewal, but payment of the previous notes consolidated, and therefore a new debt for which the directors then in office were liable. The principle laid down by Judge Pressley, and upon which his decree was based, was that where consolidation was intended as a renewal of the notes consolidated and not payment, that the previous notes were not extinguished, and in a case of this kind, that the liability of the directors, which existed on the consolidated items, at the time of the consolidation, would still remain, without regard to the renewal note. No doubt he supposed that the items in the large note were made up of original indebtedness, and therefore the master would not go behind these items.

He knew nothing of the fact that some of these items might themselves be consolidations. He did not in his order, therefore, direct the master to inquire whether one or more of these items consolidated into the large note, were themselves made up of previous indebtedness, and if so, whether such consolidation was intended as payment or renewal. Nor did this court, in affirming his judgment, make any ruling on that precise point. We affirmed the principle, to wit, that a mere renewal consolidation did not create a new liability on the directors, and impliedly, that a consolidation intended as payment, and amounting to payment of the previous debts, would be the creation of a new debt.

*for which the directors then in office might be held responsible. Under this principle, we think that either party had the right to make the question of payment or renewal as to the $3,852.52 note, below. In other words, that note, not having been before the court previously, nor any inquiry made in reference to its basis, the question of the application thereto of the principle laid down had not been determined so as to be res adjudicata.

But we do not see at last how this can benefit the plaintiff, because we concur in the judgment of the Circuit Court upon the other ground. We think with the Circuit Judge, that the preponderance of the evidence sustains the finding that the note in question was a renewal and not payment, and therefore that defendants, directors, had the right to go back to its several items. This disposes of the plaintiff's appeal.

As to the defendants, we think it was error to charge them with interest on each note not barred up to the maturity of the large note, and the interest on the amount thus ascertained up to date at 10 per cent. per annum. The directors, in our view, were not liable for any portion of the large note, principal or interest. Their liability, under the decree of Judge Pressley, had been determined to rest on the notes consolidated, and the plaintiff was thrown back upon them, and his recovery against the directors must be upon them according to their terms.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, except as to the interest mentioned. Let the case be remanded so that the judgments rendered may be corrected accordingly.

*Before Hudson, J., Greenville, April, 1884.

This was an action by William D. Sullivan against P. D. Huff, C. A. Parkins, J. H. Latimer, and Hewlet Sullivan, commenced in July, 1883. So much of Master Douthitt's report as relates to the matters considered by this court was as follows:

The master, to whom it was referred to hear and determine the issues of law and fact involved in the above entitled cause, with leave to report any special matter, begs leave to report that he has held references, and from the evidence adduced and herewith filed, he respectfully submits the following report:

As matters of fact, he finds:

I. That the plaintiff, as assignee of the Sullivan Manufacturing Company, advertised the real estate, the factory, and other appurtenances for sale at public outcry, at Greenville Court House, on Saturday, the 1st day of July, 1882, for one-third cash and the remainder on a credit of twelve months; the credit portion to be secured by bond of the purchaser and a mortgage of the premises. The factory and other buildings to be insured and the policy of insurance to be assigned to the plaintiff. In the advertisement the factory was represented as containing 1,136 frame ring spindles, 316 twister spindles, and 960 mule spindles, with accompanying machinery of modern style, and that there were also 50 four-quarter looms for plain sheetings, which were idle, but in good repair.

II. That the property was sold on the day advertised, and was purchased by the defendants (with the exception of Hewlet Sullivan) for $25,000. The said Hewlet Sullivan, on behalf of the purchasers, in compliance with the terms of sale, deposited with the plaintiff $5,000 as security that the terms of sale would be complied with as soon as the titles could be investigated. The keys were then turned over to the purchasers, and they were virtually put in possession. On the following Monday, at the request of the plaintiff, the superintendent of the factory carried Messrs. Huff and Parkins, two of the purchasers through the factory and showed them all the machinery, and explained to them what belonged to J. H. Sullivan & Co., lessees, which was reserved and excepted at the sale, and on Thursday or Friday following *they, in company with their superintendent, were again shown through the factory by G. W. Sullivan, and all the machinery was shown to them. On Friday, the 7th of July, 1882, defendant Sullivan, for the purchasers, paid the balance of the cash portion, and they at once commenced operating the factory, but they did not deliver to the plaintiff their note and mortgage until the 21st day of August, 1882, nor was the deed to the property delivered to them until then. They continued to operate the factory, and made no complaint to the plaintiff about the machinery being defective, or not being as represented in the advertisement, until after their note had become due, and he demanded payment of them. They then claimed that it was defective, but offered to compromise and settle if he would discount, according to their statement, $3,000, and according to his, $2,500, which he refused, and in a few days thereafter instituted this suit.

V. That by mistake the plaintiff advertised eight spindles more than were actually in the factory, which were worth about $24.

VI. That the purchasers operated the factory about thirteen months, and lost during that time between $2,500 and $3,000, exclusive of improvements made by them, which cost from $2,500 to $2,800.

VII. That at the sale of the property, G. W. Sullivan, sr., who was a large stockholder, a large creditor, and former president of the old company, bid $24,000 for it, and before the bidding commenced deposited with the assignee a check for $5,000; and it also appears from his testimony that he intended to make it bring the amount it sold for.

VIII. That when the lessees leased the factory, they found the machinery full of wrought cotton, and when they turned it over to the purchasers, they left it in the same condition; that said cotton was worth $150, and it was not included in the advertisement.

The foregoing are the undisputed facts, and the matters in dispute are whether the spindles, with accompanying machinery, were of modern style, and the looms in good repair, as represented in the advertisement. There is a great deal of testimony on these points, from which it will be seen that there is quite a difference *of opinion touching the same, and it is very hard to reconcile, as all of the witnesses are equally entitled to credit as to veracity, so far as the master knows. * * *

It must be remembered that this factory was started in 1872, and that constant improvements and modifications have been made in machinery since then, and what might have been considered modern then might not have been considered, technically speaking, modern at the date of the sale; that is, it might not have had all of the latest patents and attachments; still it might have been sufficiently modern to justify the plaintiff to advertise it as such, and the master is inclined to that opinion, as there is a slight preponderance of testimony given, and that after making an examination and actually testing the machinery by operating it for about six weeks, they chose to stand by their bargain, gave their bond and mortgage, and accepted a deed to the property. The master is of opinion that the maxim, that a sound price warrants a sound commodity, cannot be applied to this case, even if had been known that the property sold was not the kind represented in the advertisement, which certainly has not been done by a preponderance of the testimony. The master, therefore, finds that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount of his mortgaged debt, which at this date amounts to eighteen thousand seven hundred and seventeen 55-100 dollars.

But admitting that it did not strictly come up to the representations made in the advertisement, are the defendants entitled to any discount on account thereof? They claim that a sound price calls for a sound commodity, which is correct as a general proposition of law, but is this proposition of law applicable to all the facts in this case? The maxim of the civil law, that a sound price calls for a sound commodity, which has been adopted in this State, applies to cases where the defect in the thing sold was unknown to the purchaser at the time of the sale, or where, by fraud or misrepresentation, the purchaser is misled as to the character, extent, or probable consequences of the defect known to him at the time of the sale. The object of the rule formulated in this maxim is to protect the purchaser against latent defects and against fraud and circumvention, and it was never designed to enable persons to get rid of injudicious contracts fairly made, under a full knowledge of all the circumstances relating to the subject matter of such contracts." Thomson v. Sexton, 15 S. C., 93.

The evidence in this case shows that the purchasers have resided in this county from the time the factory was first started up to the time of sale; one of them, it seems, was one of the original stockholders; all of them are nearly related to, or connected by marriage with, the founders of this factory, and must have known when the machinery was first put in, and could thus form an opinion as to how long it had been in use. They assumed the responsibility of buying it without first making an examination of it, or without employing an expert to do so for them (which *two of the witnesses, Messrs. Hammett and Launeau, testify that they never would have thought of doing). But after they had purchased, and before they had complied with the terms of the sale, Messrs. Huff and Parkins were twice shown through the factory, once in company with Mr. Jones, their own superintendent, and all of the machinery was pointed out to them. The evidence further shows that they operated the factory for about six weeks before they finally complied with the terms of sale by giving their bond and mortgage, and receiving a deed for the property.

Now, is it reasonable to suppose that the purchasers, who are all intelligent men, would have made so important a purchase on the mere representations made in the advertisement without knowing something of the condition of the property they were buying? But if they were imprudent enough to do this, had they not ample opportunity after the sale, and before complying with the terms thereof, to ascertain its true condition? The evidence shows that they did, and that after making an examination and actually testing the machinery by operating it for about six weeks, they chose to stand by their bargain, gave their bond and mortgage, and accepted a deed to the property. The master is of opinion that the maxim, that a sound price warrants a sound commodity, cannot be applied to this case, even if had been known that the property sold was not the kind represented in the advertisement, which certainly has not been done by a preponderance of the testimony. The master, therefore, finds that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount of his mortgaged debt, which at this date amounts to eighteen thousand seven hundred and seventeen 55-100 dollars.

The master further finds that the plaintiff is entitled to recover two hundred and forty dollars on account of the insurance, less twenty-four dollars for the deficiency in the number of the spindles, which leaves due on account thereof two hundred and sixteen dollars.

Exceptions taken by defendants to this report were overruled by the Circuit Judge, and the report was confirmed. Defendants appealed.

*Messrs. Perry & Perry, for appellants.

March 8, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, as assignee, held a large note on the defendants, other than Hewlet Sullivan, given in the purchase of certain real estate situate in Greenville County, including the factory buildings erected thereon, with all the machinery thereof, known as the property of the Sullivan Manufacturing Company, the said note being secured by a mortgage of the property purchased, which property was afterwards sold by the aforesaid defendants to the defendant, Hewlet Sullivan, the said Hewlet obligating himself to pay whatever sum might be justly due and recoverable on the mortgage debt. The action below was brought on this note, and to foreclose the mortgage. The property was purchased by the defendants first named, other than the said Hewlet, at public sale, made by the assignee under an advertisement, in which it is alleged that certain false statements were made as to the character, quantity, and quality of the machinery. The defendants resisted full payment on the ground that the property bought was not as represented in the advertisement; that it was greatly deficient, both in quantity and quality; that there was failure of consideration; and that they had been misled by these misrepresentations, and thereby damaged to a large amount. And they asked that these matters should be inquired into, and that the amount of damage sustained by them be deducted from the mortgage debt, with leave to pay the balance into court, and be dismissed with their reasonable costs and charges.

The case was referred to the master, who, upon the testimony, reported, in substance, that the plaintiff as assignee acted in good faith in his advertisement; that the statements as to the modern character of the machinery, &c., were justified by the preponderance of the testimony; that there was no failure of consideration, but even if there was, that the defendants could not claim the benefit of the doctrine, that a sound price demands a sound commodity, for the reason they must have known all about the character of the property bought, or might have known it, from their near residence thereto, and their familiarity with the factory during all the time it had been in operation before the purchase—one at least having been a stockholder, and two or more of them having been shown through and afforded ample opportunity to examine the machinery before the purchase was completed. And he concludes, therefore, that even if it had been shown before him that the property was not as represented in the advertisement, yet the defendants could not, under the circumstances, claim a deduction: stating distinctly, however, that this was not shown by the preponderance of the testimony. He reported that plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of his mortgage debt, which at that date amounted to $18,717.55. He also reported in favor of an insurance claim, not involved here.

To this report the defendants excepted: 1st, as to the findings of fact on the question of misrepresentations in the advertisement, and the failure of consideration. And, 2d, because the master erred in holding that the doctrine of sound price, &c., did not apply to the case. His honor, Judge Hudson, overruled these exceptions and confirmed the report, ordering a foreclosure sale, with leave to issue execution for any deficiency, &c. The appeal raises the same questions as those below.

As to the questions of fact. The testimony is very fully reported, as taken down from the witnesses and then examined and discussed in the elaborate report of the master, in which he shows very satisfactorily that its preponderance sustains his findings. True, the witnesses do not entirely harmonize, and there is some difference of opinion between them as to the quality of some portions of the machinery, but upon weighing the whole evidence, we do not feel at liberty to reverse the master's finding, sustained as it is by the unqualified concurrence of the Circuit Judge.

Nor was there error below, by the Circuit Judge, in overruling the exception to the master's report in regard to application of the doctrine of a sound price, &c. Thomson v. Sexton, 15 S. C., 93, and the cases there cited. It is apparent, from what is stated, that the defendants (purchasers) had full opportunity to examine the property; some of them went through the factory more than once, after they had bid it off, and before the contract was con*summated by the execution of papers; one of them had been an original stockholder; all were near neighbors; they completed the contract without complaint; and nothing was ever said about misrepresentation or failure of consideration until the note fell due and payment was demanded. But even if it had been otherwise, the complete answer to all this is, that the master has found as matter of fact that there was no misrepresentation nor failure of consideration of any kind. The Circuit Judge has confirmed this finding, and we cannot say that the finding is either without testimony to sustain it, or is against the manifest weight thereof.

of the commissioners *in dower, and Mrs. Asbill put in possession. Subsequently she acquired more land by purchase, and executed two deeds to her youngest sons, Michael and William Asbill, conveying the land of which she had been put in possession by the commissioners in dower, as well as the land which she had subsequently acquired. These deeds were delivered by her to G. W. Asbill, to be delivered to the grantees after her death. They were delivered to Michael and William at their request a short time before the death of their mother.

Mrs. Elizabeth Asbill having died, her older children bring this action to partition the land which had been assigned to her, and by her conveyed to her two youngest children, and claim that she only had an estate for life in the land, and at her death it became divisible among the heirs of A. W. Asbill. Upon the other hand, the grantees of Elizabeth Asbill, Michael and William, allege that one-sixth in value of their father's land was assigned in fee to the widow in lieu of dower, by the commissioners to lay off dower, and that that assignment was confirmed by the court by the consent of all parties in interest. It thus appears that the pivotal question in the cause is, what was the nature of the interest of Mrs. Asbill in the land assigned to her by the commissioners' return which was confirmed by the court?

The cause came on to be heard before Judge Aldrich, who, after listening to the argument of counsel, directed that an issue be submitted to a jury to say, "What was the return of the commissioners in dower, confirmed by Chancellor Carroll November 13, 1867?"

The cause came on to be heard before me and the issue directed by Judge Aldrich was submitted to a jury. The testimony taken before the master was read over to them, and after able and exhaustive argument by counsel, the jury found in substance that the land assigned to Mrs. Asbill was assigned absolutely and in fee, and was not assigned for her life only. It should have been stated before that this inquiry was rendered necessary by the loss of both the writ and the return of the commissioners. The order of confirmation, however, was on the record. I think the preponderance of the testimony is in favor of the finding of the jury, which is therefore approved. The assignment of one-*sixth in value of the land having been confirmed by the court, and not appealed from, the absolute right of Mrs. Asbill to the fee became fixed and cannot now be disturbed. It is a necessary consequence that her deed conveyed the fee to her two sons, Michael and William. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed.

Messrs. Arthur S. Tompkins and L. Charlton, for appellants.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. A. W. Asbill died intestate in 1867, possessed of a considerable property, consisting for the most part of several tracts of land. He left as his heirs at law, his widow, Elizabeth, and eight children. Being largely indebted, a bill was filed to sell the lands and marshal the assets. The widow claimed dower, and commissioners were appointed to lay it off. Three of them, L. P. Rutland, Charles Pardne, and William Powell, executed the writ and made return, which (as appears from the records of the office of the then commissioner in equity) was confirmed in general terms by an order of Chancellor Carroll, Nov. 13, 1867. It appeared that all the lands of the estate were sold except the tract marked "No. 1," to which reference was made in bounding "No. 2," as having been "assigned to widow as her dower." The widow and her two youngest sons, Michael and Willie, lived on this place until she died in 1882, when this action was commenced by some of the other children to partition the same as of the estate of the intestate, A. W. Asbill, in the view that, having been assigned to the widow as her dower, her interest expired at her death, and the land is now subject to partition among all his heirs.

The younger sons, Michael and Willie, being in possession, answered, denying the right to partition. They claimed that their mother had fee simple title to the whole tract of 195 acres; that 133 acres of it were assigned to her in fee by the commissioners in dower as her one-sixth part in value of all the lands of *which her husband died seized, and the same was conveyed by her to them on May 26, 1871; and that afterwards, in February, 1872, she acquired by purchase from Lewis G. Asbill the remaining 34 acres, and also conveyed the same to them on February 13, 1874, and that they together now have a fee simple title to the whole of the said land.

Judge Fraser referred it to the master to take the testimony, which was done. Among other things, it appeared that the writ in dower and the return of the commissioners in the original bill of M. B. Asbill et al. v. Elizabeth Asbill et al., to marshal assets, were lost, and Judge Aldrich ordered an issue to be submitted to a jury to say "what was the return of the commissioners in dower, confirmed by Chancellor Carroll, Nov. 13, 1867." The issue came on for trial before Judge Wallace. The testimony was read to the jury and, under the charge of the judge, they found in substance that the land assigned to Mrs. Asbill was assigned absolutely and in fee, and was not assigned for her life only. Whereupon the judge held, "that the preponderance of the testimony was in favor of the finding of the jury, which was approved. The assignment of one-sixth in value of the land having been confirmed by the court and not appealed from, the absolute right of Mrs. Asbill to the fee became fixed and cannot now be disturbed. It is a necessary consequence that her deed conveyed the fee to her two sons, Michael and William."

From this decree the plaintiffs appeal upon various grounds, involving in substance these propositions: First, that Judge Aldrich erred in ordering an issue to determine "what was the return of the commissioners," as it could not, according to law, have been other than an assignment for life; that the statute authorizing one-sixth of the fee simple value of the lands to be given for dower is limited to the case of an assessment of money in lieu of dower; but when lands are assigned it can only be one-third and that for life. Second, that Judge Wallace erred in not charging the jury as to what are the powers and duties of commissioners in dower, and as to the well defined methods and established usages of this State in assigning dower. Third, that he erred in submitting the issue to the jury and in approving their finding. Fourth, that he erred in finding that Mrs.

Elizabeth Asbill purchased any of the land in dispute. "She did bargain for some, but never paid for it, and titles were never made to her, and the court misconceived the testimony on that point."

This was a case for equitable relief, and Judge Aldrich had the right to order an issue to determine any fact as to which there was conflicting testimony, and which was pertinent to the decision of the case under consideration. As we understand, the issue was not ordered to construe a written paper in existence, but to determine, as a fact, what were the terms of the lost paper. It is true that dower at common law was one-third for life of the lands of which the husband was seized during coverture; but our statute provides that a sum of money may be assessed in lieu of dower, and in that case it has been adopted as a rule of practice to give one-sixth of the fee simple value of the lands; for the reason that—assuming a life estate to be seven years, and the interest on money to be equivalent to the use of lands—the interest on one-third of the value of lands for seven years is found to be within a fraction of one-sixth of the value of the whole. Wright v. Jennings, 1 Bail., 277; Douglass v. McBill, 1 Speers, 140.

This being established as the money value of dower, it is not as a fact impossible that commissioners, when the widow desired it, should undertake to assign as dower, not one-third of the land for life, but one-sixth in fee simple. Such assignment would be out of the usual course, and irregular, but could hardly be said to violate any substantial rights; and if those who were parties to the proceeding in which it was made, stand by and allow it to be confirmed, giving to the widow the use of less land, in consideration of that being in fee, we do not see that they could afterwards object, and cut down the fee to an estate for life, simply for the reason that it was assigned as dower. Suppose we had the return before us, and it gave in express terms the land as one-sixth in fee, would the parties who were before the court when that return was confirmed, be heard now to object to it? If not, the tenor of that return was an important fact in the case. See section 2285 of the General Statutes; McCaw v. Blewitt, Bail. Eq., 98.

submitting the issue to the jury. It was the order of the judge who preceded him, and he could not disregard or reverse it. Nor did he commit error of law in omitting to go on and instruct the jury as to the powers of commissioners in dower and the established practice in assigning dower in this State. There were no requests to charge in the particulars indicated, and therefore the omission so to charge was not error of law appealable to this court.

But it was urged that the judge erred in finding that the land was assigned to Mrs. Asbill as one-sixth absolutely and in fee, and not for life only. This was a question of fact, as to which there was concurrence between the jury, who tried the issue, and the Circuit Judge, who approved the finding. In such case, it is the settled practice of this court not to disturb the finding, unless it is without any evidence to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. In this particular the case is like that of Pressley v. Kemp, 16 S. C., 343 [42 Am. Rep. 635]. That, also, was an equity case, in which there were findings of a jury on issues of fact approved by the Circuit Judge. The court says: "Under these circumstances, this court will generally accept as established the facts there found. Inquiry must end somewhere. A jury of the vicinage acquainted with the witnesses, &c., is peculiarly fitted to weigh conflicting testimony and decide contested questions of fact. Where the finding of such a body of twelve men is approved and adopted by the Circuit Judge, intelligent, disinterested, and accustomed to consider the force of testimony, it would seem that the verdict ought to be as near absolute truth as is attainable under imperfect human institutions," &c.

We have looked carefully through the testimony, only the more closely because of the strange disappearance of the return, and the peculiar character claimed for it; and we cannot say that the finding was against the weight of evidence. On the contrary, we incline to agree with the Circuit Judge that it was in accordance with the weight of the testimony. There was some conflict, but both the surviving commissioners, Rutland and Pardue, who assisted in laying off the dower, concurred in their impressions, that one-sixth in value was assigned in fee. It appeared with reasonable certainty that before the assignment, Mrs. Asbill expressed the wish to have what was given to her in such way that *she "could do what she pleased with it;" and after the assignment, that continued to be her view: for as early as 1871 she got her brother-in-law, G. W. Asbill, to draw the deed of 133 acres assigned to her, and afterwards to draw the other deed of 34 acres, which she acquired from Lewis G. Asbill, saying that "Michael and William, at the death of their father, were quite small and weakly, and have since been feeble, and had none of the advantages enjoyed by the other children."

From the view taken, we do not see that it was important to determine whether the whole 195 acres or only the 133 acres were assigned as dower, except as bearing upon the question of fact, whether one-third or one-sixth was assigned. But if it were important, we think there can be no doubt that the parties themselves considered that only the 133 acres were effectively assigned as dower; for when Mrs. Asbill made her first deed to her sons in 1871, she only conveyed that number of acres; but after Lewis G. Asbill (who had purchased the land at the sale) made a deed to her of the 34 acres, she also conveyed that in 1874.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. I concur in the result of this case on the ground that the parties to the action to marshal the estate and sell the real estate of the deceased, in which the widow claimed dower, submitted to the confirmation of the assignment of dower by the commissioners without appeal. But I cannot agree to the proposition, that commissioners in dower have the power to assign any portion of the real estate in fee, as an original question.

Mr. Justice McIVER. As I cannot accept the conclusion reached by the majority of the court upon the main question involved in this case, I propose to indicate as briefly as practicable some of my difficulties.

It seems to me that there was no room for the question of fact upon which the decision is made to turn. There is no doubt that the land in question, or, rather, the larger portion of it, was assigned to the widow as her dower; and, according to my understanding, there is but one way by which this can be done—that is, by the assignment of one-third in value of the land, in which the right of dower exists, for the life of the widow. It is true that our statute provides that in certain contingencies a sum of money may be assessed to the widow in lieu of dower; but, properly speaking, that is not an assignment of dower, but by the express terms of the act is compensation in lieu of dower. Whenever, therefore, the fact is ascertained that dower has been assigned to the widow, then the law steps in and fixes absolutely the nature of the interest so assigned. In this case, the fact that dower was assigned is conceded, and those portions of the record which have been preserved demonstrate that the fact is as it is conceded to be, and, hence, it does not seem to me that there was any room for further inquiry as to the facts.

But, more than this, the record shows that there was an order of the court, directing "that a writ for the admeasurement of the widow's dower do issue," directed to certain persons named, requiring them "to admeasure the widow's dower," and another order in these words: "On hearing the bill and answer, together with the return of the cause [no doubt a misprint for commissioners] to the writ to admeasure dower in this cause, on the motion of Mr. Clark, complainant's solicitor, and with the consent of Messrs. Abney & Wright, defendant's solicitors, ordered, that the said return be confirmed." The writ for the admeasurement of dower and the return of the commissioners were, however, lost. Now, it seems to me that, upon well settled principles, we are bound to assume, from this order confirming the return of the commissioners, which was in effect the final judgment as to the matter of dower, that all the previous and intermediate proceedings—the writ and return—were regular and proper; and if so, then the conclusion is inevitable, that the land assigned to the widow as her dower was only assigned to her for life, and not in fee.

As to the other points involved, I concur with the majority of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, March, 1885.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of General Sessions dismissing a writ of certiorari. The opinion states the case.

Mr. John Banskett, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Frederick Schmidt petitioned the Court, stating that the city council of Columbia had tried and convicted him of "disorderly conduct in the opera house of said city"; that he had no right of appeal from the sentence pronounced, which was that he should pay a fine of forty dollars, or be confined in the guard house for ten days; and being about to be deprived of his liberty by reason of said sentence, which was erroneous and illegal, the city council ¹It will be observed that the charter of the city of Columbia has no provision like that of Beaufort and Lexington, upon which was based the decision in Beaufort v. Ohlandt, ante, p. 158, and Lexington v. Wise, ante, p. 165.—RE-PORTER.

being wholly without juris*diction in the premises, prayed for a writ of certiorari, to inquire into the cause of such findings and sentence.

Upon the affidavit made, Judge Wallace granted the writ requiring the mayor and aldermen to return the judgment and sentence, and all the proceedings upon which said judgment and sentence were founded. They made return, that "The mayor's court of the city of Columbia is not a court of record; that on September 16, 1884, the petitioner, Frederick Schmidt, was brought before the mayor, acting in his official capacity as judge of the city court, on the following charge: 'violation of an ordinance to amend an ordinance concerning the city police, drunk and disorderly conduct in the opera house'; that the mayor in his official capacity, being satisfied with the proof of said charge, sentenced said Frederick Schmidt to a fine of forty dollars, or ten days in the guard-house of said city, which said fine was within the jurisdiction of said mayor; that said petitioner appealed from said sentence to the city council, and they sustained the decision of the mayor." &c.

Upon hearing the return, Judge Witherspoon dismissed the writ, and the petitioner appeals on the grounds: "1. Because the ordinance of the city of Columbia, under which the relator was tried and convicted, was repealed by section 1739, chapter XV., of the General Statutes, and Mayor Rhett exceeded his jurisdiction in taking cognizance of the cause and in passing said sentence. 2. Because the proceeding ab initio was in violation of sections 14 and 19, article 1, of the Constitution of this State. 3. Because the proceeding ab initio was in violation of article V. and section 1, article XIV., of the Constitution of the United States."

As we understand it, certiorari from the Court of Common Pleas goes to an inferior tribunal to keep it within the scope of its powers, if not to correct error of law, but certainly not to correct error of fact. It is not denied that the ordinance under which the relator was convicted covered the offence charged and authorized the punishment imposed. Nor can it be denied that the city authorities had the right to pass the ordinance under their charter, which enacts that "The mayor and aldermen shall have full and ample power to establish such by-laws, not inconsis*tent with the laws of the land, as may tend to promote the quiet, peace, safety, and good order of the inhabitants thereof; and the said mayor and aldermen, or the said mayor alone, may fine and impose fines and penalties for violations thereof, which may be recovered in a summary way, to the extent of forty dollars; * * and also are authorized and empowered to impose the alternative punishment of hard labor in the work house: provided the term of imprisonment shall not exceed ten days for any single offence." 14 Stat., 571.

It is, however, insisted that the ordinance under which the relator was tried and convicted had been repealed by section 1739 of the General Statutes, which enacts that "Any person who shall be found drunk or grossly intoxicated in any street, highway, public house, or public place, shall be fined upon view of, or upon proof before any mayor, &c., not exceeding five dollars, and, if the same is not paid, imprisoned five days." We do not think this provision repeals the ordinance referred to. One is a provision in the general license law, applicable to the whole State, while the other is a local regulation for the government of the city of Columbia. Besides, they are not inconsistent. The offences are not identical. Being "drunk and disorderly" is very different from being simply found "drunk or grossly intoxicated."

But it is further insisted that the act of the legislature granting the charter in the terms stated is in conflict with the constitution of the State as well as that of the United States, particularly in respect to the right of trial by jury. We need not consider the objection, that the charter was in violation of the provisions of the constitution of the United States, articles 5 and 6 of amendments, for it has been settled that the provisions indicated impose limitations on the exercise of power by the government of the United States, and has no application to the legislation of the States. State v. Shirer, 20 S. C., 404.

Then, as to the provision in the Bill of Rights of the State Constitution, that "No person shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or dispossessed of his property, * * or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." Assuming that the phrase, "judgment of his peers," means the verdict of a jury, there has always been some lack of *clearness and certainty as to the other phrase, "the law of the land." See State v. Starling, 15 Rich., 120. It seems to us that it would be fatal to the peace and good order of cities and towns, if every one brought before the municipal authorities for the violation of an ordinance, simply of a police character, should have the right to demand a trial by jury, with all the expense and necessary delays incident thereto.

Without reopening the argument, we agree with Mr. Dillon, when he says: "Offences against ordinances, properly made in virtue of the power of the corporation, or in the exercise of its legitimate police authority for the promotion of the peace, good order, safety, and health of the place, and which relate to minor acts and matters not embraced in the public criminal statutes of the State, are not usually or properly regarded as criminal, and, hence, need not necessarily be prosecuted by indictment or trial by jury." See 1 Dill. Corp., § 361, and notes; Ryers v. Commonwealth, 42 Penn. St., 89; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc., § 758; McGear v. Woodruff, 33 N. J., 213; Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga., 509; [Floyd v. Com'rs of Town of Eatonton] 14 Ga., 358; [Vason v. City of Augusta] 38 Ga., 542; State v. Sims, 16 S. C., 486; State v. Bowen, 17 S. C., 61.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

THOMPSON v. RICHMOND & DANVILLE R. R. COMPANY.

In action against a railroad company under section 1511 of General Statutes to recover damages for personal property destroyed by fire beyond defendant's right of way, testimony is inadmissible to prove that defendant had paid for cotton burned at the same time, which had been received by the company for carriage.

Under section 1511 of General Statutes, a railroad company is liable for property destroyed by fire, beyond its right of way, communicated by its locomotive engines or originating within the limits of its right of way in consequence of any act of an authorized agent, and this liability attaches without regard to the question of the company's negligence, or of proximate or remote cause.

*This was an action by Jeff Thompson against the defendant company, to recover damages for furniture and other personal property burned at Duncan's, in Spartanburg County, on the line of the Atlanta and Charlotte Airline Railway Company, then operated by the defendant. The action was commenced August 15, 1883. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. On November 24, 1882, the plaintiff had certain personal property destroyed by fire, in a house occupied by him as the tenant of one Greer, which was about one hundred and fifty yards from the railroad of the defendant, and outside the limits of its right of way; and this action was brought to recover damages for the destruction of said personal property under the allegation that the fire originated from the escape of sparks from defendant's engines.

It seems that some cotton on the platform of defendant's depot was also burned on the same day, and, against the objection of defendant, witnesses were allowed to testify that the defendant company had paid for said cotton—his honor, the Circuit Judge, ruling that "it may in one sense be that it is an admission of their liability. It may not be by word, but by acts." It appeared in evidence that this cotton had been delivered at the depot for shipment, and taken charge of by the defendant's agent, though no bill of lading had been given, it being the custom at that depot for shippers to call in the evening and get bills of lading for all cotton put in charge of defendant's agent during the day. At the close of the testimony as to the cotton defendant's counsel moved "that so far as the paying for this cotton could be construed to be an admission of defendant's liability, it be stricken out," to which his honor replied: "That is for the jury. I will charge the jury on the law with regard to it;" but so far as appears from the charge as set out in the record, this matter was not alluded to.

*The Circuit Judge after reading to the jury section 1511 of the General Statutes (which will hereinafter be set out in full), in substance instructed the jury that if the plaintiff's property was destroyed by fire communicated by sparks from the locomotive engines of the defendant, or by fire originating within the limits of defendant's right of way, in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employees, the defendant would be liable, the terms of the law above referred to having eliminated all inquiry into the question of negligence and into the question of proximate or remote cause.

The plaintiff having obtained judgment the defendant appealed on various grounds, which raise questions as to the admissibility of the testimony objected to, as affording any evidence of defendant's admission of liability to the plaintiff, and as to the proper construction of the above mentioned section of the general statutes, which will be considered without referring to the various grounds of appeal seriatim.

First, as to the question of evidence. We think the testimony objected to was incompetent, and its admission, with the accompanying remarks of the judge, that: "It may, in one sense, be that it is an admission of their liability. It may not be by words, but by acts," was well calculated to prejudice the cause of the defendant, especially when he further said: "Here is a fire, in consequence of which this plaintiff claims that he has been injured. Now, we cannot conceive that every little fact and detail of the burning can be proved, but we must exercise our judgment and be allowed to infer from one fact another. It is asked whether, as a consequence of this fire cotton having been destroyed, the company did pay for it? Now, what if they did pay for it? The inference is that it is an admission of liability."

It seems to us clear that the last sentence of these remarks, which we have italicised, only with the view to direct special attention to it, was well calculated to prejudice the defendant; in fact, virtually decided the case against the company. For, as we have seen, the judge withdrew from the jury any question as to the negligence of the defendant, and any question as to whether the fire originating on defendant's right of way was the proximate or remote cause of the destruction of plaintiff's property, so *that, practically, the only question for the jury to determine was whether the fire was the consequence of the act of any authorized agent or employee of the defendant; and if the fact that defendant had paid for the cotton was evidence of defendant's admission of its liability to the plaintiff, it must necessarily have been an admission that the fire was the consequence of the act of some one of defendant's agents or employees.

But the test of defendant's liability for the cotton was very different from that of its liability for the property of plaintiff which had been destroyed. If, as seems to be the fact, the cotton had been delivered to the company as a common carrier, then its liability became that of an insurer, and it did not matter who caused its destruction unless it was by the act of God or the public enemy. Hence, if it had been proved to a demonstration that the fire did not originate from any act of the company, or any of its agents or servants, the company would still have been liable for the cotton, but not liable for the plaintiff's property. The fact that no bill of lading had been given for the cotton amounts to nothing, in view of the fact that the testimony showed that the cotton had been delivered to and received by the defendant's agent for shipment, and the giving of the bill of lading simply deferred for convenience until evening. The bill of lading would serve simply as evidence of the delivery for shipment; and if there is other evidence of that fact, the bill of lading would be unnecessary. We are of opinion, therefore, that the fact that the company had paid for the cotton was no evidence whatever of its admission of liability for the destruction of plaintiff's property, and that it was error to receive the evidence objected to.

Next, as to the construction and effect of section 1511 of the General Statutes, which reads as follows: "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damages to any person or corporation whose buildings or other property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employees, except in case where property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully or without its consent, and shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route, for which it may *be so held responsible, and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf." An analysis of the terms of this section will show that the legislature intended to make a railroad company liable for property destroyed by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or by a fire which originated within the limits of its right of way in consequence of any act of an authorized agent, unless the property destroyed was placed on the right of way of the company unlawfully or without its consent.

Hence, in a case of this kind, the only questions would be whether the property was destroyed by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or by fire which originated on its right of way in consequence of the act of some agent of the company, and the only defences would be either that the fire, though originating on the company's right of way, was not the result of any act of one of the company's agents or employees, or that the property destroyed had been placed on said right of way unlawfully or without the consent of the company. Nothing is said in the act about negligence, and the very fact of such omission shows that the object of the act was to eliminate any question of negligence, inasmuch as under the law as it previously stood the company would only be liable in case of negligence. We are, therefore, forced to conclude, that the purpose of the act was to dispense with any inquiry into that subject, for it declares the company liable for property destroyed by fire, originating on its right of way from any act of any of its agents, without any qualification whatsoever, either as to negligence or otherwise.

So, too, under the terms of the act, there can be no necessity for an inquiry as to whether the fire caused by the act of the company or its agents was the proximate or remote cause of the destruction of the property in question, as would have been the case under the old law: for it declares in absolute terms, without any qualification, that the company shall be liable for the destruction of property by fire which originated within the limits of the right of way from some act of the company or its agent or employee, and this precludes any inquiry as to whether the fire so originating was the proximate or remote cause of the damage complained of. As the Circuit Judge well says, if the act had simply declared that the company should be liable to any person whose *property may be injured or destroyed by fire communicated by sparks from its locomotive engine and stopped there, it may be that then the question as to proximate or remote cause might have been a material inquiry, but the act goes on to declare that the company shall be liable for damage caused by fire which originated on the right of way. So that, if the fire originated there from the act of the company or its agents, it is liable, even though such fire may have been the remote and not the proximate cause of the damage complained of, as there is nothing in the act to qualify or restrain the general terms used.

Again, it is contended that the liability imposed by this act does not extend to property injured or destroyed outside of the limits of a railroad company's right of way, but is confined only to such property as may, lawfully and by the consent of the company, be placed on its right of way. It is not pretended that there is any such express limitation in the act, but it is argued that, construing all the different parts of the section together, such is the necessary inference. The latter part of the section, which exempts the company from liability for injury to property placed upon its right of way unlawfully or without its consent, and which gives to the company the right to take out insurance for its own benefit on property for the destruction of which it is made liable, is relied on for this purpose. The provision which exempts the company from the stringent rule of liability imposed by the act for property unlawfully, or without its consent, placed upon its right of way, cannot have the effect contended for, inasmuch as this provision simply exempts the company from this stringent rule of liability to mere trespassers; and, therefore, the only remaining inquiry is as to the effect of the provision authorizing the company to insure the property for injury to which it may be made responsible under the act.

It is argued that the intention was to limit the liability to such property as the company was given an insurable interest in, so that its liability should be co-extensive with the means of relief afforded the company by the act; and that as it was given an insurable interest only in the property which was on its right of way, its liability under the act could only extend to such property. It will be observed, however, that this argument is based *upon the assumption, unwarranted, as we think, by the terms of the act, that the company is given an insurable interest only in the property placed upon its right of way. In the previous parts of the section, whenever it was designed to speak of the "right of way," those terms were used. For example, in speaking of the origin of the fire, the language used is, "originating within the limits of the right of way of said road," &c., and in the exception, as to the liability of the company, the language is, "except in any case where property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully or without its consent;" but when we reach the provision as to insurance, the phraseology is changed, and the language there used is, "and shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route, for which it may be so held responsible."

This, it seems to us, indicates exactly the opposite of what has been assumed in appellant's argument, and that the intention was to give a railroad company an insurable interest in the property along its route, and not simply upon that within the limits of its right of way. Indeed, we suppose that, without the act, a railroad company would have an insurable interest in all property delivered to it for transportation as a common carrier, and it is property of this kind which is most usually placed upon its right of way, and hence the purpose of the act must have been to give a railroad company an insurable interest in any property upon its route, which, without the act, it could not have. We do not see, therefore, that the provisions of the section relied upon necessarily imply that the intention of the act was to limit the rule of liability established by the act to such property as might be within the limits of the right of way, especially when the act declares in general and comprehensive terms, that "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damages to any person or corporation whose buildings or other property," without any limitation as to the location or kind of property, "may be injured by fire," &c.

The judgment of the court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed upon the first ground considered herein, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Fraser and Wallace, JJ., November, 1883, and April, 1885.

This action was instituted by B. T. Dunlap in October, 1882, to recover possession of his interest in a tract of land, and, after his death, was continued by his sole executor and devisee, Thomas W. Whitesides. The plaintiff claimed 65-144 of this land as heir at law of Thomas W. Whitesides and of certain other persons, deceased, and the defendant claimed the land as purchaser under a sale ordered by the Court of Probate. This sale was made under a decree rendered by the judge of probate in two proceedings, heard and decided together: (1) a petition by J. H. Clawson, a creditor of Thomas W. Whitesides, who owned two-thirds of the land, against the heirs at law of Thomas W. Whitesides; and (2) a petition by the widow of said Thomas W. against all the other parties in interest, praying partition and dower in her husband's portion. But it did not appear that any will of Thomas W. Whitesides had ever been proved, or any letters of administration ever granted. In the first proceeding, B. T. Dunlap was personally served, but in the second proceeding he was not, having accepted service and afterwards appeared by a guardian ad litem duly appointed.

After the sale of this land and its purchase by the defendant, B. T. Dunlap attained his majority. He then refused to receive his proportion of the proceeds of such sale, and afterwards instituted this action. The jury found for the plaintiff 65-144 of the land in dispute, and of $1,750.04, the net rents and profits. Judge Fraser thereupon ordered the cause transferred to calen*dar 2, with leave to plaintiff to apply for judgment on this verdict, and with leave to defendant to amend his answer and to set up any equities that he might have. An appeal from this order was held to be premature. Whitesides v. Barber, 22 S. C., 47.

Defendant thereupon amended his answer, and claimed to be subrogated to the rights of certain creditors who had been paid out of the proceeds of the sale. Judge Wallace thereupon passed the following decree:

Upon reading and filing the special verdict of the jury in above stated case, and after hearing argument of counsel, on motion of Wilson & Wilson, plaintiff's attorneys, it is ordered, that the plaintiff, T. W. Whitesides, have judgement against the defendant, Ferguson H. Barber, for the possession of sixty-five one-hundred and forty-fourth (65-144) part of the premises described in the complaint herein, in fee. And it is further ordered, that said plaintiff have judgment against the said defendant for the sum of seven hundred and thirty 92-100 dollars, and interest from November 14, 1883, the same being 65-144 of the net value of the rents and profits of said premises, as found by said special verdict, after deducting therefrom said plaintiff's proportionate share of money paid by the said defendant and applied to the debts of Thomas Whitesides, deceased.

Defendant appealed from this decree, and from the former order of Judge Fraser in the cause.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case are fully and clearly stated in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McGowan when the case was before this court on a previous occasion, as will be seen by reference to 22 S. C., 47, and, therefore, it will not be necessary to repeat them here, but only to state what has occurred since. In accordance with the judgment then rendered, the case was remanded to the Circuit Court, when the plaintiff, in accordance with the former order of Judge Fraser, applied for *and obtained from Judge Wallace a judgment for an undivided portion of the land in controversy, together with the sum of seven hundred and thirty 92-100 dollars, and interest from November 14, 1883, being his proportion of the net value of the rents and profits, after deducting therefrom the plaintiff's proportionate share of the amount paid by defendant and applied to the debts of Thomas Whitesides, deceased.

By this appeal the appellant seeks to review the alleged erroneous rulings of Judge Fraser, on the trial before him, upon the exceptions then taken, as well as the final judgment rendered by Judge Wallace. Without undertaking to set out in detail the various exceptions appearing in the record, we propose to consider the several questions made thereby. The fundamental inquiry is as to the validity of the sale, made by the order of the judge of probate, under which the appellant claims that he acquired title to the land in dispute.

First, as to the proceeding instituted by Clawson as a creditor of Thomas Whitesides, deceased. The object of that proceeding was to sell the real estate of Thomas Whitesides, deceased, in aid of the personalty, for the payment of debts, and to that proceeding the heirs of Thomas Whitesides seem to have been regularly made parties, but no administration having been granted upon his estate, neither his executor nor administrator was, or could have been, made a party. The first inquiry, therefore, is, could the Court of Probate obtain jurisdiction in such a case? That being a court of limited and not of general jurisdiction, we must look to the law defining its jurisdiction to determine this question. Section 40 of the Code of Procedure confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Probate to order a sale of the real estate of a person deceased, for the payment of his debts, when it shall be made to appear that the personal estate is insufficient for that purpose, but this jurisdiction is conferred only upon the Probate Court of the county in which the will of such deceased person was proved, or in which administration of his estate was granted.

Hence, it would seem to follow, that until a will has been proved, or letters of administration have been granted, no Court of Probate can take jurisdiction of a proceeding to sell the real estate of a deceased person.

This is not a mere question of defect of parties, as has been argued by the appellant, for, although it is undoubtedly true that in such a proceeding the executor or administrator, as the case may be, would be a necessary party, yet the defect here lies deeper, and is jurisdictional. No Court of Probate could take jurisdiction of a proceeding like the one in question until a will has been proved or administration granted, because such jurisdiction is conferred only upon the Court of Probate of the county where the will has been proved or administration granted. We think, therefore, that there was no error on the part of Judge Fraser in charging the jury that the proceeding by Clawson, assignee, to sell the land for the payment of the debts was void.

Next as to the partition proceedings; and the fundamental inquiry here is, whether B. T. Dunlap, who was then a minor, was properly made a party to such proceedings. The law prescribes explicitly the mode in which a minor may be made a party to an action, and unless the requirements of the statute are complied with, no court can obtain jurisdiction of the person of the minor, so as to enable it to render any judgment in such action which will be binding on the minor. It has been settled by the decisions of this court (Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C., 435; Riker v. Vaughan, 23 S. C., 187; and Genobles v. West, Ibid., 154) that an infant is incapable of making himself a party to an action by accepting service of a summons, so as to be bound by a judgment therein; and as it does not appear that there was any other legal evidence that the minor, B. T. Dunlap, had been served with the summons issued in the partition proceedings, he cannot be regarded as a party to such proceedings, and his rights cannot, therefore, be precluded by any order or judgment therein. The record only shows that he accepted service of the summons, which, as we have seen, was not sufficient, and there is no such proof of service, as is required by section 159 of the Code.

It may be, as contended by appellant, that the minor, B. T. Dunlap, was cognizant of the proceedings for partition, and was aware of what was going on, but, as we have said in the case of Warren, Wallace & Co. v. Simon (16 S. C., 364), even in reference to an adult, that it would be a dangerous precedent to establish, that a party might be liable to have a judgment rendered *against him, or an order granted affecting his rights, in a cause to which he had not been made a party in the manner prescribed by law, simply because he was otherwise informed of the proceedings.

According to these views, it is quite clear that, so far as the interest of B. T. Dunlap in the land was concerned, the sale was void for want of jurisdiction, and hence the other points presented in the argument cannot arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

From this, it follows that the plaintiff, as sole devisee of B. T. Dunlap, was entitled to recover his undivided interest in the land, subject to the equity set up by the appellant to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors of Thomas Whitesides, and this equity, as we understand it, has been properly allowed him in the judgment rendered by Judge Wallace, by deducting from the plaintiff's share of the rents and profits his proportion of the debts of Thomas Whitesides, which have been paid by the appellant.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., York, November, 1884.

This was an action by Mary R. Briggs against her husband, Benjamin F. Briggs, for alimony. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellant, contended that his first exception was well taken, inasmuch as the Circuit Judge had stated no findings of fact whatsoever, and thus left defendant ignorant of the ground upon which the decree was rested. 2 McCord Ch., 96; 4 S. C., 291. Upon the 2d and 3d exceptions counsel cited 10 Rich. Eq., 176; 1 McCord Ch., 207; Harp. Eq., 144; 4 Rand., 662; 4 DeSaus., 100.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for alimony, brought February 28, 1883, by the plaintiff against her husband, Benj. F. Briggs. The grounds alleged were cruelty, consisting not only of foul and obscene language uttered in presence of the plaintiff, but also of blows directed against her body, making life almost an intolerable burden, adultery with a woman of low character living in his house, and desertion. The defendant answered, stating that the plaintiff had previously brought an action against him for "divorce and alimony" which she had discontinued; that she had, without cause, wilfully abandoned the home provided for her; and that, notwithstanding her many past errors and infirmities of mind and disposition, he has at all times been ready to receive her back under his roof and to support and sustain her, &c.

A special referee was appointed to take the testimony, which was very voluminous, and being all printed in the brief need not be stated here. The Circuit Judge made no separate findings of fact, but adjudged and decreed "that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of two hundred dollars per annum during the time they shall live separate and apart, or until he shall agree to *cohabit with her and treat her as becomes a man to treat his wife, &c. And also that the defendant do pay the costs of this action, to be assessed by the clerk, as well as the sum of two hundred dollars reported by the referee to be a suitable fee for plaintiff's attorney for his services herein."

From this decree the defendant appeals on the grounds: "I. Because no facts are found or decided for or against appellant as the basis of said judgment. II. Because of error in not finding as matter of fact that the desertion was on the part of the plaintiff. III. Because of error in adjudging alimony against defendant until he should consent to take back plaintiff and treat her as a husband ought to treat his wife, he having made such offer bona fide in his answer as well as at other times previously, and the said offer having been rejected by plaintiff. IV. Because of error in requiring appellant to cohabit with respondent. V. Because of error in requiring defendant to pay to plaintiff the sum of two hundred dollars per annum during the time they shall live separate and apart or until he shall agree to cohabit with her and treat her as becomes a man to treat his wife. VI. For error in adjudging costs and counsel fees against defendant, it not appearing from any finding of fact that he has been in default. And upon said exceptions the appellant will move the Supreme Court to reverse the judgment and direct that the complaint be dismissed."

Pending the appeal the defendant died and the action was continued, by order, against Joseph F. Wallace as his executor. The sixth exception as to costs and counsel fees was not argued, and we suppose that it is not insisted on.

As to the first exception. We regard the provision of the Code (section 289) which requires that the decision of the court shall contain a statement of the facts and the conclusions of law separately, wise and salutary as tending to prevent confusion and to promote clearness. But it has been held that an omission in that regard is not ground for reversal unless it is made to appear that the appellant has suffered prejudice thereby, as it regards the merits of his case. We do not see that such prejudice has resulted in this case. Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 329;

The exceptions 3, 4, and 5 complain that on the merits a case for alimony was not made out; that, in truth, instead of the defendant deserting the plaintiff, she deserted him. That was a question of fact, and, after reading the testimony carefully, we cannot say that the decision was unsupported by the evidence. Three grounds were alleged for alimony, viz., adultery, cruelty, and desertion; and if either of them was sustained by the proof, we cannot say that the decree was wrong. It is insisted that adultery on the part of the husband is not good ground for alimony. In States where divorces are authorized it is certain that adultery is generally given as one of the grounds, if not the principal ground, for granting it; but if as argued infidelity to the marriage vows alone is not sufficient ground for alimony, there is no doubt whatever that cruelty is, and will justify the wife in withdrawing from the presence of her husband and claiming against him a decree for alimony. "In pursuance of the decisions and the practice of the ecclesiastical and consistorial courts of England, in South Carolina alimony is granted for bodily injury inflicted or threatened and impending, amounting to the saevitia of the civil law, which may be defined to be personal violence actually inflicted or menaced, and affecting life or health." Hair v. Hair, 10 Rich. Eq., 173. And to this may be added as constituting saevitia of another kind: When the husband has not actually inflicted any bodily injury, yet practises such obscene and revolting indecencies in the family circle that a modest and pure-minded woman would find these grievances more intolerable to be borne than the most cruel afflictions upon her person.

There is in this case some conflict in the testimony, but, taking it all together, we think there was a preponderance of evidence of such saevitia of both kinds as to warrant the decree for alimony. In general terms it appeared with reasonable certainty that the parties had not lived happily together and there had been some differences on former occasions; but in March, 1873, when they were boarding with their son-in-law, Mr. L. D. Goore, in the "Thornwell House" in Yorkville, the final separation took place. The plaintiff gave her account of the particulars of that occasion, in which, for the most part, she was corroborated by Mr. and Mrs. Goore. She said: "On the occasion of my separation from defendant he came to our boarding house late in the evening; he entered our bedroom and I went in after him; when I said good evening, he said 'Go to —.' I asked him if he would have his supper; he replied, 'Go to — with your supper.' After this he kept continually cursing and abusing me for an hour or more. He then advanced toward me in a striking attitude. When I attempted to escape from the room through the door, he caught hold of the door with his left hand and struck me with his right fist in the side, when I sunk down in a chair and screamed. Mr. L. D. Goore then pushed open the door while defendant was still holding it. I then left the room. When defendant struck me he said, 'You are a——— ungrateful wretch.' * * * He left me on the occasion of separation before stated without making any kind of arrangement for my place of residence or subsistence, and has made none since to my knowledge. During the ten years since our separation I have received only fifty-five dollars from defendant—received through my son and daughter." &c. The defendant left the house immediately, and when in the act of leaving Mr. Goore invited him to return; he replied with an oath that he would not, saying significantly, "This winds up the show—this is my last trip." According to this account it would seem that the defendant deserted the plaintiff. But if it were as alleged, and the plaintiff, after such conduct on the part of the husband, had left his house, it would not have been legal desertion, and we do not see that the judge erred in so deciding.

Exception 3 complains that the Circuit Judge decreed that the defendant should pay alimony, although he had offered bona fide in his answer as well as at other times previously to take back his wife and treat her as a husband ought to treat a wife. It was not satisfactorily proved that he had ever made such an offer in plain and unequivocal terms. Sometimes he talked that way and at other times and repeatedly he said that he would never again live with his wife. Even the invitation in his answer was certainly very perfunctory, evidently made under pressure and in "limited and guarded terms. He says that he has "at all times been willing to provide plaintiff a home in his residence and to support and maintain her in such comfort as his condition and circumstances will justify." &c.

It does not strike us that the rule, which declares that an offer to take back should condone all past offences, is fully satisfied by a cold, formal proposition to give the wife of his youth and the mother of his children merely house room and supplies sufficient to appease hunger and support animal life. The heart of a true wife craves and is entitled to something more than that. As we understand it, the invitation back which the rule contemplates is a cordial overture by the husband to return to the bosom of his family, and there, as its head, to discharge her household duties and to be cherished and supported as a wife should be, and be treated with respect and conjugal love and tenderness. The invitation of Mr. Briggs after all that had occurred, after frequently declaring that he would never again live with the plaintiff, and especially in view of the fact that he was then living in adultery with a woman of bad character, was too apparently a mere affectation; and it is not at all surprising that the wife declined it as a hollow mockery of her rights as his wedded wife, the mother of his children, and the rightful mistress of his house and heart. We cannot say that in this respect the judge erred in decreeing alimony.

The obligations of the marriage relation continue only during the joint lives of the parties, and of course the charge must cease at the time the defendant died.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, with qualification as to time herein stated.

Before Pressley, J., Orangeburg, May, 1885.

This was an action by James F. Izlar against Sophronia Haitley and Robert Haitley for the recovery of a tract of land, commenced March 15, 1882. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. Samuel Dibble, for appellant.

Mr. M. I. Browning, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, appellant, bought a tract of land, situate in Orangeburg County, at sheriff's sale, as the property of one David J. Clayton. The action below was to recover this land from the defendants, who were in possession. The plaintiff relied upon the sheriff's deed; the defendants upon adverse possession in the answer, and in the evidence upon a gift of the land to the defendant Sophronia by David J. Clayton, her father. Sophronia had no deed from her father, but she relied upon a verbal gift made years before the sale by the sheriff, accompanied with continued and adverse possession, claiming the land as her own for more than ten years before said sale.

Before the trial, the plaintiff gave notice to defendants to produce certain papers, among them a deed from the sheriff to David

J. Clayton, conveying the land, and dated March 3, 1856. These papers were produced, but when this deed was offered in testimony, it was objected to by defendants, unless upon strict proof of its execution. The objection was sustained.

It was in evidence that plaintiff, when he bought, had full knowledge that defendants claimed the land, Sophronia having served notice upon the sheriff not to sell, and having also given notice at the sale.

the case was tried, *among other propositions, charged the jury that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it was necessary for him to show that David J. Clayton had been in the possession of the land for ten years. The verdict was for the defendants. The appeal involves the two questions made below, to wit: 1st. The admissibility of the deed to David J. Clayton from the sheriff in 1856 without strict proof. 2d. The correctness of the charge of his honor as to the necessity of proof of ten years' possession in David J. Clayton under the facts of this case.

In general, all private writings offered in evidence must be proved to be genuine and duly executed, but there are several exceptions to this rule. One where the instrument is produced by the adverse party pursuant to notice, the party producing it claiming an interest under the instrument. In such case, says Mr. Greenleaf, "The party producing the instrument is not permitted to call on the other for proof of its execution, for by claiming an interest under the instrument, he has admitted its execution." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 571. Also: "The same principle is applied where both parties claim similar interests under the same deed, in which case the fact of such claim may be shown by parol."

Now, here the deed in question was produced by the defendants under notice. Did they claim an interest under it? The deed was one of the muniments of title in David J. Clayton. The defendants claimed, in one aspect of the case, through David J. They relied upon a gift from him, evidenced by a delivery of possession by the said David to Sophronia as a gift, and their long and uninterrupted possession thereunder, claiming as owner. In other words, they in substance contended that Sophronia had obtained title from David J. by a verbal gift and delivery of possession, which, by continued possession since then, had ripened by such possession into a perfect title. They, therefore, claimed in fact from David, and the deed in question being a link in her chain of title, they must be regarded as claiming an interest under it, which brings the question under the exception mentioned to the general rule above. Such being the case, we think the exclusion of the deed was error, because the exception and not the general rule should have been applied by his honor,

*2d. As to the necessity of plaintiff showing ten years' possession in David J. It is well understood, that where both plaintiff and defendant claim from a common source, no proof of title beyond that source is necessary. In fact, it is not necessary to prove title even in the common source, because, in the very nature of the case, both parties are supposed to admit title there, and neither can dispute it. The question in all such cases, therefore, is, which of the two has the best title from the common source. His honor instructed the jury that, as a general rule, it was the plaintiff's duty to make out title in himself; that he could not rely on the weakness of his adversary's title. This, no doubt, was correct as a general rule. But he went further as to this case, and said: No paper title having been made out in David J. Clayton, the plaintiff could not recover unless he had shown by the evidence title in David J. by possession; thus requiring the plaintiff, in any and every aspect of the case, as condition of his recovery, to prove ten years' possession in the said David J.

He then laid down four legal propositions to the jury in reference to the possession of the defendant Sophronia. He said if she went in possession by the permission of her father, David J., with the understanding that she was to use it until demanded, then her possession was that of her father, and the ten years, which it was necessary for the plaintiff to show, had been shown. If, however, second, she entered under a verbal gift from her father, and held it for ten years herself and as her own, then her possession would not be the possession of her father, and the plaintiff had failed to show the ten years in David J. 3d. If she had been put in possession by her father, nothing being said as to the character of her possession, but was allowed to use it as her own, the law would presume that it was a gift after ten years, and, therefore, her possession would not be the possession of her father, operating to the advantage of the plaintiff. And, 4th. That if she went in by the consent and permission of her father as a "loan," and afterwards gave him to understand that she claimed it as her own, from that time her possession would cease to be his, and the plaintiff could not rely upon it as the possession of the father, so as to make out the ten years required. So, that, in any event, in this case, the plaintiff was required by the charge *to prove title in David J. by a possession of ten years before he could recover.

We think the legal propositions laid down by his honor, as applicable to the different conditions under which Sophronia may have entered and held, were in the main correct, but the prior proposition to these, to wit, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not shown any paper title in David J., he must fail to recover unless he had shown ten years' possession in him, was error. Because this was good law only in the event that the parties did not claim from a common source, to wit, from David J.; and the manner in which his honor laid down the proposition as to these ten years, excluded the jury from considering the question, whether or not both parties did claim from the said David J. as a common source—the jury being restricted by the charge to the questions, whether Sophronia was in possession by permission, and, therefore, holding for her father, or by gift, holding as her own, or against the will of her father, and, therefore, adversely to him and all others.

As to the first character of holding, to wit, by permission, there can be no objection even as applied to this case, because, if Sophronia was so holding, her possession being the possession of her father, the ten years required appeared. Nor was there error as to the third, because, if she held adversely in defiance of her father and all others for ten years, she did not rely on a common source, and the doctrine that the plaintiff should not be required to go beyond a common source, would not apply. But as to the second, where the gift is relied upon, proved, and sustained by ten years' possession under it, that would, as it seems to us, be a case where both of the parties claimed through a common source, and in that event the plaintiff would not be required to prove title in the common source either by papers or ten years' possession, as in such case neither party would be allowed to dispute the title of the common source.

We think the error of the charge was in holding the plaintiff to the proof of ten years' possession in David J., in that aspect of the case, in which the jury may have found a gift of the land to Sophronia; but we express no opinion upon the validity of the gift, if such there was, as compared to the plaintiff's title.

[1. Judgment \hookrightarrow §41.]

A rule was issued in supplementary proceedings requiring the defendant and a judgment debtor of his to show cause why the indebtedness of the latter should not be applied to plaintiffs' demand, and enjoining defendant meanwhile from assigning this judgment. This order was served on the next day one hour after defendant had assigned this judgment to another creditor, in pursuance of a previous promise, defendant having no knowledge of the order, nor of facts sufficient to have put him upon the inquiry.

Held, that the assignment was valid. The assignee being an innocent party, was entitled to hold on to the assignment.

The assignment in this case held to have been delivered.

Before Aldrich, J., Aiken, June, 1885.

On March 11, 1884, G. P. Segler confessed judgment to Dr. W. H. Timmerman for $3,245.25. At April term, 1885, of the Court of Common Pleas for Aiken County, G. P. Segler obtained judgment against G. C. Coward and T. W. Coward for $446.33; and at the same term, Robertson, Taylor & Co. obtained judgment against G. P. Segler for $550.27. An execution upon this judgment having been returned unsatisfied, the plaintiffs obtained an order from Judge Aldrich, at Barnwell, on May 7, 1885, requiring the Cowards and Segler to show cause before him at Barnwell, on May 22, why the indebtedness of the former to the latter should not be applied to the judgment of plaintiffs against Segler, and, in the meantime, the Cowards were enjoined from paying their indebtedness to Segler to any other person than plaintiffs, and Segler was enjoined from assigning or otherwise disposing of his judgment. This order was served on Segler the next day, May 8, and also on the Cowards.

Defendant made return, that on May 8, before the order was served upon him, and in pursuance of an agreement had with *Dr. Timmerman before defendant obtained his judgment against the Cowards, he had assigned this judgment to Dr. Timmerman, and had no further interest in it.

From the oral testimony taken before the judge, and the affidavits submitted on the hearing of this return, it appeared that plaintiffs' attorney returned from Barnwell with the order of Judge Aldrich on the night of May 7; that on the morning of May 8 attorney for defendant saw plaintiffs' attorney in conversation with the sheriff, and from a remark afterwards made by one Moore and another by the sheriff, defendant's attorney surmised that the sheriff had some paper to be served on Segler, but he did not know what it was, nor was it on file in the clerk's office. This attorney thereupon got the assignment (which bore date May 7) and sent it off by a special messenger, who was instructed to beat Moore to Segler's house, and to tell Segler to sign it at once and send it back. All this was done, and when Moore, the sheriff's deputy, arrived an hour later the paper had been signed, and Segler said to him, "You are beat; you are too late; or words to that effect." The assignment was brought back to defendant's attorney.

The judge, after hearing argument, remarked: "This is a race between creditors. Timmerman had a judgment and so did these plaintiffs here have their judgment, and the contest was to see who would get the money coming from the Cowards' judgment, but this man Segler had promised he would let Dr. Timmerman have that money before the judgment was obtained, and in the contest Timmerman is perfectly innocent. He had nothing to do with it. It was his attorneys trying to collect a debt which a man had promised to pay. There was nothing wrong in it. That was a contest, simply a race between creditors, and Timmerman got the start and kept it. I think he is entitled to the money. Besides, Mr. Segler had a right to prefer his creditors." And he thereupon passed the following order:

This was a rule to show cause served on the defendant and T. W. Coward, G. G. Coward, and M. T. Holley, sheriff, to show cause why the money due on a judgment obtained by the said G. P. Segler v. G. G. Coward and T. W. Coward should not be paid by said G. G. Coward and T. W. Coward over to the plaintiffs *on their judgment which they held against the defendant. After hearing the evidence herein and also after hearing argument in support of said rule by Messrs. Henderson Bros., and Messrs. Croft & Dunlap, and O. C. Jordan, contra, and after consideration I am of the opinion, as the case presents itself, that it was a race between two creditors as to who would realize the money coming from the Coward judgment. Timmerman held a valid and an honest judgment against Segler, and Segler had agreed that the Coward judgment as soon as obtained should be transferred to Timmerman in part payment (as far as he could realize thereon) of the judgment that he held against Segler. This Segler had a right to do having done so without notice of the rule herein. The assignment to Timmerman must stand.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the rule herein be discharged with ten dollars cost to be paid by the plaintiffs, Robertson, Taylor & Co., and that the defendant have leave to enter up judgment therefor.

From this order the plaintiffs appealed and asked for a reversal upon the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in dismissing the rule to show cause and ordering the money paid to W. H. Timmerman, whereas he should have made the rule absolute and directed the money paid to the plaintiffs.

2. Because his honor should have held the Timmerman assignment void, because the testimony showed that Segler, the assignor, had notice sufficient to have put him upon inquiry of the injunction order when he signed the assignment, and because said assignment had not been delivered when the injunction order was served on Segler.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. [Omitting the statement made of the above facts.] It will be observed that there was no question below as to the validity of the assignment, on the ground of its being a fraudulent preference, nor did the Circuit Judge make any ruling on that question. Nor is that question involved in the appeal. The judge regarded the matter as a race between creditors and he decided it upon the legal rights of the parties, the turning point being whether Segler, when he made the assignment, knew that the rule and injunction had been issued.

The issuance of the rule and injunction was upon an ex parte proceeding. It was dated on May 7, the same day on which the assignment was dated. Judge Aldrich has found as matter of fact that Segler did not know that the rule had been issued when he executed the assignment. It was not served until May 8, the day after it was signed by the judge and the day of the execution of the assignment. We think the evidence sustains the finding of the judge. In fact, this seems to be admitted in appellant's argument, and also in his ground of appeal; because the exception is not that Segler knew of the rule, but that he had notice sufficient to have put him upon the inquiry. So that the case before us is narrowed down to the point whether Segler did have sufficient notice to put him upon inquiry, and, if so, whether on that account the judgment below should be reversed. The first is a question of fact. The Circuit Judge does not seem to have found in terms on that point, nor does it clearly appear that it was made before him. He said (speaking of the assignment), "This Segler had the right to do, having done so without notice of the rule herein. The assignment to Timmerman must stand." But we suppose that he considered the whole question, both as to actual notice and also constructive. Be that as it may, however, was there sufficient evidence of notice, such as should have put Segler upon the inquiry, and would the inquiry have disclosed to Segler the existence of the rule in advance of service upon him?

The whole matter up to the service of the rule seems to have been a contest between attorneys, each cautious as to the movement of the other. Segler's attorney, it is true, suspected something, but exactly what was being done he did not know, and *Segler himself was thirteen miles away in the country during all the preliminary proceedings and knew nothing about them. It is true it is not absolutely necessary for actual service of the rule and injunction to be made upon the party in order to make him amenable for its violation. If he obtains a knowledge of its contents, and of its having been granted, no matter how he gets his information, he is as much amenable as if the writ had been actually served upon him. See numerous cases cited in note to Farnsworth v. Fowler [1 Swan (Tenn.) 1] (55 Am. Dec., 722), and especially Skip v. Harwood (3 Atk., 564), in which Lord Hardwicke delivered the opinion, where he held that the attendance of a party in court when the injunction was ordered was sufficient notice. This doctrine was further enlarged by Lord Eldon in Osborne v. Tennant (14 Ves., 136), where he held that presence in court when the motion for the injunction was made, though the party was not present when the motion was granted and the order pronounced, was still sufficient notice, and this last seems to be the doctrine in this country. Hull v. Thomas (3 Edw. Ch. [N. Y.], 236). We do not think that the facts of the case before the court bring it under even the enlarged rule supra. That rule requires either actual notice by service or information derived in some other way of facts showing that the rule had been issued.

But assuming the law to be as contended for by appellant to wit: that notice of facts sufficient to put the party on the inquiry is as effectual as actual notice or knowledge, and that here there was such notice, would that have required the Circuit Judge to vacate the assignment and to order the Cowards to pay the plaintiff in this proceeding? It is said in Farnsworth v. Fowler, supra, a case relied on by appellant, that "an injunction writ is a writ in personam and renders it unlawful in the party to whom it is directed to do the thing therein prohibited," &c. The act being unlawful, it is deemed ineffectual and unavailable as to the purposes intended as though it had not been done. Or if that may not be, on account of the intervention of the rights of innocent persons, who had no knowledge or information of the injunction, the defendant is liable to make indemnity for his unlawful act to the party injured.

Now, the judge has found as matter of fact that the judgment *of Dr. Timmerman was a valid and honest judgment and that he at least was an innocent party, whatever may be the facts as to Segler. Segler, on account of his knowledge, if he had such knowledge, may possibly be in contempt and amenable to the court for such contempt. But the proceeding below was not in that direction; it was really a contest between Dr. Timmerman and the plaintiff. Dr. Timmerman held a paper which upon its face transferred the Coward judgment to him. On its face a legal title was conveyed. It was good until vacated, or at least it was prima facie good. The judge found no facts sufficient to set it aside. He therefore held that it should stand, and his discharge of the rule was the logical and legal result.

We think there was sufficient evidence of the delivery of the assignment.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

24 S. C. 392

BACOT v. LOWNDES.

[1. Venue ¶5.]

An action against executrix, devisees, and others, to subject real estate devised or descended to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, and to vacate deeds of transfer made by the devisees and heirs to third parties, is an action "for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination of such right or interest," and must be tried in the county where the lands are located; the Circuit Court of any other county is without jurisdiction.

2. This case distinguished from Jordan v. Moses, 10 S. C. 431.

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

Under the ruling in the case of Jordan v. Moses (10 S. C., 431), an action may be brought in any county where the personal representatives of the deceased reside for an account, injunction, and to marshal the assets, and for this purpose a sale may be ordered of lands situated in any other county. In the case before the court, there would seem to be no doubt of the jurisdiction under these proceedings to sell these lands in Colleton and Greenville Counties, if there had been no conveyance or alienation by the devisees of these lands before action brought, real estate having been made "liable to and chargeable with just debts," * * "and made assets for the satisfaction thereof," and "subject to like remedies, &c., * * as personal estates." Gen. Stat., § 1983; 5 Geo. 2, C. 7, and 3 and 4, W. & M., C. 14.

I am unwilling to extend the privilege of the heir or devisee to alien the real estates and put them beyond the reach of creditors further than warranted by the cases on this subject. Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C., 9; Smith v. Grant, 15 Id., 136; Stackhouse v. Wheeler, 17 Id., 91. I infer from these cases, where the heir or devisee transfers his whole interest in fee in the land, even if in payment of his own debt, and with a knowledge on his part that the estate of the ancestor is insolvent, the rights of the creditor are transferred from the land to a personal claim on the heir or devisee, or perhaps to an equity to follow the fund which was produced by the sale. These are, perhaps some of the very questions the plaintiff desires to raise in these proceedings.

The complaint, however (and I can only look to the allegations there made), does not show any complete transfer of title of these lands to C. C. Pinckney. The conveyance to him does not seem to have been more than a life estate, as his heirs are not named. If his heirs had been named, the conveyance was only for a special purpose and a limited time, until out of the rents and profits certain debts were paid, and then he was to hold for the "benefit and behoof" of the devisees. This seems to be such a use as would be executed by the statute, and that, if the fee was out of them at all, it was only for an instant, as in the case of a conveyance of land and an immediate mortgage for the payment of the purchase money, and by which even the right of dower and the liens of existing judgments would be excluded. If this view of the legal estate is not correct, these parties have, under these deeds to Pinckney, an equitable interest in themselves carved out of the estate of the testator.

This interest, whether legal or equitable, has been subsequently mortgaged by the devisees to C. C. Pinckney, to secure other bonds for advances made to them; and there is no allegation that *the mortgagors are out of possession, or that title has been perfected under it in any way. Warren v. Raymond, supra. These devisees, therefore, still have in themselves the equity of redemption, in the view I have above taken of it: still a part of the estate of William Henry Lowndes, which has never been out of them, whatever view may be taken of the mortgages as alienations to the extent of the mortgage debts. The allegations, that the plaintiff has been misled as to the property of the estate, and other statements in the complaint, seem to call in question the bona fides of these transactions, and, on the whole, I am inclined to the opinion, and hold, that there does not appear, by the statements in the complaint, to have been such an alienation of these lands as to deprive the creditors of the right to have some interest in them subjected to the payment of their demands.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the demurrers be overruled, and that the parties demurring have until the first day of February next to file their answers and pay the costs of the demurrers. The motion to dissolve the injunction is refused and dismissed.

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, for appellants.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The main question in this appeal is whether the action below was brought "for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination of certain rights and interests therein." If so, it is conceded that the appeal must be sustained, as the action is brought in Charleston County, when the real estate in question is located in Colleton County, such action not being permitted under the code except in the county where the land is located.

To see clearly the application of this provision of the code to the case, a short statement of the facts, as alleged in the complaint, must be stated. It appears that the late William Henry Lowndes was indebted in his life time to Charles E. Miller in a large amount, evidenced by bond dated in 1844, which was secured *by mortgage on certain real estate situate in Colleton County; that Miller assigned this bond and mortgage to the late Daniel Huger, who died in 1858, leaving a will, of which the plaintiff is executor; that William Henry Lowndes, who died in 1865, left a will, in which his wife, the defendant, Mary E. Lowndes, was appointed executrix (this will, however, was not set up and admitted to probate until 1883); that the plaintiff, as executor of Daniel Huger, deceased, in 1876, filed his complaint against Mary E. Lowndes, Harriet Minott and husband, John C. Minott and Mary A. Elliott and husband, Henry D. Elliott, and E. M. Speights, lessee, the former being heirs at law and distributees of the said W. H. Lowndes, for the foreclosure of said mortgage, which was accomplished by sale of the property, no judgment being asked for the deficiency on the bond. In that proceeding, the defendants, heirs at law, prayed that the balance due on said bond, after application of the proceeds of the land, be accurately ascertained, which was done, the amount being $6,002.22, November, 1876. It was provided in the decree for foreclosure, and adjudged, that the said defendants "should be discharged from any liability for or by reason of the said bond of the said W. H. Lowndes, deceased, set forth in the pleadings."

The complaint further alleged, that at the time of the said foreclosure action, and at the time of the decree therein, he was informed by the defendants (which information, it is alleged, subsequent events have shown to have been mistaken), that the estate of W. H. Lowndes was insolvent, and that there was no other property belonging to said estate: that on that account no administration was applied for, and also the portion of the decree discharging the defendants was incorporated: that plaintiff, however, since said decree had learned that W. H. Lowndes owned at his death lands located in Colleton and Greenville Counties, when the plaintiff notified the defendant, Mary E. Lowndes, that he would claim the balance due on his bond, and would claim to administer if she did not; that, thereupon, Mrs. Lowndes produced the will of her deceased husband and qualified as executrix: that soon thereafter, to wit, in 1884, the plaintiff brought action on said bond against the executrix: that since said action was commenced, the defendant, Mary

E. Lowndes, executrix, had *allowed judgment to go against her by default in favor of the defendant, C. C. Pinckney, Jr., trustee, in the sum of $6,000; that before said action was begun, to wit, in 1883, the defendants conveyed and aliened, or attempted to do so, four several tracts of land, situate, respectively, in Greenville and Colleton Counties, which, in the will of the said W. H. Lowndes, had been devised to them, of which they had been in the exclusive possession since the death of the said W. H. Lowndes, the conveyance being in trust to pay the said C. C. Pinckney certain debts due to him, and then to hold for the defendants, and afterwards certain mortgages were executed to the said Pinckney of the interests of the defendants, and that under these deeds, C. C. Pinckney, Jr., trustee, had been in possession, removing phosphate rock, digging, &c. And upon these alleged facts, the plaintiff demanded judgment, that creditors be called in; that C. C. Pinckney be enjoined from enforcing his judgment; that the conveyances, mortgages, &c., to him be set aside; that all parties be enjoined from digging phosphate rock, &c.; and that the real estate mentioned be sold, the proceeds to be applied to the debts of the deceased, &c.

To this complaint, the defendants demurred "on the ground that the action was for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, and for the determination of certain rights and interests in said property, and for injuries to real property; and it appears upon the face of the complaint, that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action, or any part thereof."

The demurrer was overruled by his honor, Judge Fraser, and the defendants now renew said demurrer by appeal.

The Circuit Judge, in overruling the demurrer, relied upon the case of Jordan v. Moses (10 S. C., 431). That case, however, differs from this in the fact, that there the title to the real estate sought to be sold was admitted to be in the deceased at his death, and no change had taken place since his death. That case was an ordinary case to marshal assets, and to sell real estate of the deceased to pay his debts. The real estate in question was located, it is true, in a different county from that in which the action was brought; but the action was not intended to recover *this real estate or any interest therein, or to determine any right or interest therein, of any party. It was understood to belong to the deceased, and the purpose was to sell it and apply the proceeds to the debts. The court, therefore, very properly held that the action in no aspect fell within the provisions of the section of the code referred to.

But, here the action, while its purpose, as expressed in the complaint, is to reach real estate alleged to have belonged to the decedent, yet facts are stated in said complaint which show that in order to accomplish this purpose, the rights and interests of other parties must be determined therein, and one of the main prayers is that certain deeds and papers under which C. C. Pinckney, jr., claims an interest, and by which he is in possession, digging and mining phosphate rock, shall be vacated and set aside. Besides, the action is nothing more than an action to subject real estate, descended or devised to heirs at law or devisees, to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, and before this can be done, the interest and rights of said heirs at law and devisees, in connection with their transfers to C. C. Pinckney, jr., must be determined and adjudicated. These are issues raised in the complaint, and they are questions which determine the jurisdiction of the court, and it will not do to hold in advance of the trial that these questions will be decided against the defendants, and, therefore, they have no right to demand that the action shall be brought in Colleton County, for the reason that they have the right, under the imperative terms of the code ("must be tried"), to have those questions tried in the county where the land lies, and no adjudication of them elsewhere is competent without their consent.

We think, therefore, that his honor was in error in overruling the demurrer. Several other questions have been discussed before us, for instance, whether the deeds and other papers to Pinckney should be vacated, and whether, if not, they constitute such an alienation by the heirs as would put the land beyond the reach of the plaintiff, and also, whether the former decree had not released the defendants; but these questions did not properly arise under the demurrer, and they are not now ripe for adjudication.

*It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

[2. Judgment ⇨489.]

A judgment is void as to parties not within the jurisdiction of the court; and when the jurisdictional defect appears on the face of the record, the judgment may be disregarded as a nullity in any proceeding, direct or collateral.

But where it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the parties have, by proper service, been brought within the jurisdiction of the court, the judgment cannot be attacked collaterally or disproved by parol testimony, but can be avoided only by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose by the party claiming not to have been served, in the court and in the case where the judgment was rendered.

Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, March, 1885.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, and J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

March 17, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for the recovery of a tract of land, 347 acres. Both parties claimed under one Edmond Cooley, jr., who lived on the land until his death intestate, about ten years ago. He left as his heirs and distributees a widow, Emeline, and five children, viz., John S. B. Cooley, Caroline Kimbrell, Teresa Oliver, Martha Jane Kimbrell, and Jefferson D. Cooley. The plaintiff claimed that the ancestor, Edmond Cooley, about 1864, made a deed of gift of the land to his wife, Emeline, which was not at the time probated or recorded; but about 1874, without a new deed, the old one, as claimed, was re-delivered and recorded. The plaintiff then introduced a deed from Emeline Cooley to the plaintiff, George S. Turner, bearing date September 17, 1877. This deed is not in the "Brief," and, therefore, the consideration does not appear, but Mrs. Cooley, who was examined as a witness, testified that she received only $15 for her share of the proceeds of sale. Plaintiff rested.

The defendant answered the case made by offering in evidence the full record of proceedings in the Probate Court of Spartanburg, in the case entitled Ralph K. Carson, as administrator of Edmond Cooley, deceased, v. Emeline Cooley, John S. B. Cooley, Caroline Kimbrell, Martha Jane Kimbrell, et al., which was a petition on the part of Carson, administrator of Edmond Cooley, deceased, to sell this tract of land as his intestate property for the payment of his debts, one of which for a small amount was in judgment.

The record on its face was entirely regular. It represented that there were debts of the intestate unpaid; that the personalty was insufficient to pay the debts; and prayed that the land might be sold in aid of the personalty. All the heirs were named as parties in the summons; one was a minor, and he had a guardian ad litem appointed. The summons was entered May 8, 1877, in the sheriff's office, and had upon it the affidavit of the deputy sheriff, C. W. Mitchell, "that he had served the summons and complaint in this action on the defendants by delivery to them personally, and leaving with them copies of the same, on the 14th and 15th May, A. D. 1877, and that he knows the persons so served to be the ones mentioned and described in the summons as Emeline, John S. B., and Jefferson D. Cooley, M. J. and C. Kimbrell, and Teresa Oliver, the defendants therein." &c. All the parties made default, and, after the proper time, George N. Nichols, Esq., probate judge, on July 13, 1877, after stating in his judgment "that the persons named as defendants had been duly served and made default," ordered the land to be sold for the purposes aforesaid; and being offered for sale on October 1, 1877, was bid off by one William Bush for $210, which was paid and applied to the debts of the intestate. The sheriff executed title to F. M. Trimmer and William Bush, who afterwards made a conveyance to the defendant, Alfred Malone.

*In reply, the plaintiff proposed to show by the testimony of Martha Jane Kimbrell, one of the children of Edmond Cooley, that she was never personally served with summons in the aforesaid proceeding in the Probate Court, under which the land was sold. Objection was made that the record, regular in form, could not be contradicted in a collateral manner. The testimony was admitted, and Mrs. Kimbrell testified that, "so far as she could recollect, she was never served with any papers." The plaintiff, also against the protest of defendant, was allowed to offer in evidence the sheriff's book, which had opposite the name of Mrs. Kimbrell the word "left." The plaintiff was also allowed, in reply, to offer a deed to himself from M. J. Kimbrell and other children of Edmond Cooley, bearing date after the land was ordered to be sold by the probate judge, viz., September 17, 1877—to which defendant excepted.

Upon the charge of the judge, the jury found for "the plaintiff 2-15 of the land in dispute." The defendant appeals to this court on various grounds, which need not be set out here, for the reason that they are all substantially covered by the requests to charge, which were refused. The defendant made the following requests to charge:

I. "That the judgment record from the Probate Court is conclusive upon the parties and their privies of every fact therein adjudicated.

II. "That said record establishes conclusively that Edmond Cooley died seized and possessed of the said land.

III. "That the title of Mrs. Emeline Cooley and the children of Edmond Cooley was taken away by said decree and vested in the purchaser at the sale.

IV. "That Mrs. Emeline Cooley and the other parties in said probate record could not convey any right or title to said land to George Turner, after said judgment was rendered."

The judge charged the jury that the original deed of Edmond Cooley to his wife in 1864 was void under the law as it then stood. And as to the record of the judgment from the Probate Court in the case of Carson, administrator, v. Emeline Cooley et al., he charged that all the parties, who were legally summoned in that proceeding, were bound by the judgment and sale under *it, and had not the right afterwards to sell and convey the land; that the record of that proceeding, regular in form, raised a presumption that all the defendants were legally summoned, and if so, although they made default, they were in effect before the court and bound by the judgment; that presumption was not, however, conclusive, but might be rebutted, and it was for them to say, under the proof, whether Mrs. Martha Jane Kimbrell was legally summoned, and if not, the judgment was not binding on her, and her deed afterwards made carried her interest as distributee in the land to the plaintiff.

There is really but one question in the case, and that is as to the force and effect of the judgment and order of sale in the Probate Court. If the judge was correct in his charge upon that subject, the verdict was right; if he was in error, there will have to be a new trial.

Although the Court of Probate is one of limited jurisdiction, the law has given it very large powers, and expressly made it "a court of record;" and we suppose that, in reference to proceedings clearly within the jurisdiction given, it is not to be considered as in the category of inferior courts, in respect to the dignity of its records. Thomas v. Poole, 19 S. C., 336.

There seems to be some want of clearness and uniformity in regard to the distinction between void and voidable judgments, and especially as to what is a collateral, as distinguished from a direct, impeachment. There is no doubt that a void judgment, order, or decree, in whatever tribunal it may be entered, is, in legal effect, nothing. "All acts performed under it, and all claims flowing out of it, are void. Hence, a sale based on such a judgment has no foundation in law." It is equally certain that judicial proceedings are void, when the court, in which they are taken, is acting without jurisdiction. If it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but not of the parties, the judgment quoad such parties is void.

It is not, however, always so clear how that want of jurisdiction should be made to appear. If the jurisdictional infirmity appears in the record itself, that is, no doubt, conclusive, and the judgment may be disregarded as a nullity whenever and wherever it is encountered, in any proceeding direct or collateral, as in the cases of Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strob., 1; Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C., 355; and Clark v. Melton, 19 Id., 498. But when the record exhibits no such defect, but is regular on its face, showing all the elements of jurisdiction, and the alleged infirmity lies below the surface, and proof is necessary to disprove the record—when can that be done, between what parties, and how? As Mr.

Freeman says: "How and in what circumstances this fact may be made to appear, are questions to which diverse answers may be found in the authorities. Undoubtedly the records of the court may be inspected, and if they show the fact, they are competent evidence of their own invalidity." Void Jud. Sales, § 34.

If the alleged infirmity does not touch the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment, we take it as clear that it is entirely exempt from impeachment by any persons who are strangers to the record, for the reason that in such case, the court having jurisdiction must be considered to have adjudged every question, including the service of parties, involved in the case. It is to all intents and purposes res adjudicata, and may not be again stirred. As Judge Campbell said, in the case of Beauregard v. City of New Orleans, 18 How., 503 [15 L. Ed. 469]: "This court has contributed its share to that stability which results from a respect for things adjudicated. It is the settled doctrine of this court, that when the proceedings of a court of justice are collaterally drawn in question, and it appears from the face of them that the subject-matter was within its jurisdiction, they cannot be impeached for error or irregularity; that if a court has jurisdiction, its decision upon all the questions that arise regularly in the case are binding upon all other courts until they are reversed." &c. But, it seems to us, this assumes that the court had jurisdiction. There can be no adjudication until there is a case, and there can be no case without parties.

So that the question recurs, what is to be done where the alleged hidden infirmity goes to the jurisdiction itself, as, for example, denying summons or notice by the parties in the judgment? If there is such hidden jurisdictional infirmity, doubtless it may be made to appear in some way. But by whom, and how can it be done? Is it allowable, in an action between third parties, to overthrow by parol proof a judgment apparently good and *valid, and under which, and upon faith in the court and its judgments, rights have been acquired? That is to say, can the record be contradicted in any suit where the judgment is offered in evidence as the foundation of rights? The books are full of declarations, that a judgment, regular in form and pronounced by a competent court having jurisdiction, is conclusive—an absolute verity. It would seem that a judgment should be considered as something more than an ordinary fact, liable to be overthrown by parol proof; that there is in its favor more than a presumption of correctness, which may be rebutted; that there is a legal presumption, conclusive in its character, which gives it immunity from impeachment in any collateral proceeding.

There is however great conflict of authority upon the subject in the different States. Mr. Freeman states what he considers the most approved view, as follows: "It has often been said that a judgment is void whenever the court which pronounced it had not jurisdiction of the parties to the judgment or of the subject matter in controversy. This is undoubtedly true everywhere, provided the want of jurisdiction is not controverted or is manifest from an inspection of the record. It is also true in some of the States even though the jurisdictional facts are asserted in the record. The weight of adjudged cases, however, sustains the proposition that the judgment of a domestic court of general jurisdiction is not void except where the court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit; or where, having such jurisdiction over the subject matter, it is shown by the record to have had no jurisdiction over the judgment defendant. * * * The word 'void' can with no propriety be applied to a thing which appears to be sound, and which, while in existence, can command and enforce respect and whose infirmity cannot be made manifest. A judgment rendered without in fact bringing the defendants into court, unless the want of authority over them appears in the record, is no more void than if it were founded upon a mere misconception of some matter of law or of fact occurring in the exercise of an unquestionable jurisdiction. In either case the judgment can be avoided and made functus officio by some appropriate proceeding instituted for that purpose, but *if not so avoided must be respected and enforced." Freem. Judg., § 116.

It seems that, in respect to impeachment, a judgment may be either "void" where the record shows the fatal defect without proof, or "voidable" where there is a hidden infirmity which can only be made to appear by proof, or "avoided" where such infirmity has been already properly established. In the case of a judgment merely "voidable," where proof is necessary, it seems that the infirmity cannot be shown in a collateral manner, but only in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose; and until that is done the judgment must be respected as such. As we understand it what is meant by a direct proceeding is a proceeding by the party injured, claiming to have the judgment formally avoided by order in the court and in the case in which it was rendered. A collateral attack upon a judgment has been defined to be "one in an action other than that in which it was rendered." Rap. & Law. Dict., title, "Collateral Impeachment." Darby & Co. v. Shannon, 19 S. C., 527.

Now apply these principles to this case. The Probate Court undoubtedly had jurisdiction of the subject matter, its proceedings were in due form, and its judgment and order of sale entirely regular. But it was alleged that, fair as they might be on their face, they covered a hidden jurisdictional infirmity as to one of the parties, which that party, notwithstanding acquiescence for years, had the right to show by testimony in contradiction of the record, and thereby then and there avoid the judgment and all that had been done under it, so far as that party was concerned. The action in which this testimony was offered was between strangers to the judgment. Neither of them were parties to it or had any connection with it, except that the defendant offered in evidence the record as the authority for the sale under which he claimed as an innocent purchaser at a judicial sale. When for the first time at the trial it was proposed to avoid that judgment as to one of the parties to it by parol proof tending to show, in contradiction of the statements in the record and the decree of the court, that such party was not legally summoned in the proceedings in which the decree was rendered, that certainly was an impeachment without notice of the judge.

ment to that extent; and, *as it seems to us, it was collateral in its character and as such not allowable: that the judgment was not "void" for the reason that the record did not show it, nor had it been so declared in a proceeding between the proper parties instituted for that purpose, and even in the view that it was "voidable" should have been "respected and enforced."

It was urged, however, that the rule has been settled otherwise in this State, and that here "a void judgment may be attacked collaterally whenever it comes in issue before the court." This proposition as announced is true, when considered with reference to the distinction between "void" and "voidable." The whole record is always admissible in any proceeding, and if that discloses a jurisdictional infirmity, the judgment is absolutely "void"; but, as we understand it, where that infirmity can only be made to appear by proof contradicting the record, the judgment cannot be properly said to be "void," but is "voidable merely," and can only be impeached by a direct proceeding. We think the cases cited are reconcilable on this view.

Gregg v. Bigham, 1 Hill, 302 [26 Am. Dec. 181]. At first view this case might be taken as authority for the proposition that a judgment may be impeached whenever it may be introduced as a link in a chain of title even if it can only be done by parol proof. But we think when examined closely it will be found to be an authority on the other side. The action was trover for negroes. Gregg had judgments against his mother under which he had the negroes sold and purchased them himself. Afterwards, disregarding the purchase by Gregg, the negroes were sold under other judgments and purchased by Bigham. Thereupon Gregg sued Bigham for the negroes, and he, Bigham, offered to show that the judgments of Gregg under which he held were fraudulent and void. The court held that he might do so, for the reason that he purchased under his own judgments, and he should not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong or to reap the fruits of a fraud perpetrated through a judgment any more than if it had been a fraudulent deed from his mother. In delivering the opinion of the court, Judge O'Neill said: "It would seem to be clear that the judgments of the plaintiff against his mother, so far as he sets them up for the purpose of acquiring title to his mother's *slaves, may be shown by the defendant to be fraudulent and therefore, void." But he goes on immediately to add: "For all other purposes, such as a justification to the sheriff for a levy and sale under them, or as part of a stranger's title who purchased under them, they would be good. Simms et al. v. Slacum, 3 Cranch, 300 [2 L. Ed. 446]." Here is a distinct declaration which goes so far as to say that when a stranger purchases under a judgment his title cannot be defeated even by showing that the judgment under which he purchased was, as between the parties to it, fraudulent and void.

Lyles v. Bolles (8 S. C., 258) was not at all analogous to this case. That was an action on sheriff's bond for neglect in not taking bond in bail trover in the case of Lyles v. Tully. It appeared from the record that the judgment in the case was given by the judge at chambers, and therefore it was held to be void and the plaintiff was non-suited. No testimony was offered by the defendant, and the case clearly belongs to that class where the mere exhibition of the record disclosed the fatal infirmity which made the judgment void.

Finley v. Robertson (17 S. C., 438) was in some respects like this case, but in regard to the very point under consideration it was very different. In that case the judgment of the probate court was sustained as to the adults and only avoided as to the infants, for the reason that the record itself showed that they were made parties by acceptance of service, which it was held could not be done. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Hudson said: "The record of this inferior court fails to show that the law has been complied with in that action, either in making the infants parties or in the appointment of guardians ad litem; on the contrary, it shows that the proper steps were not taken." It is true, the judge went on to add something about the testimony of Thomas R. Finley which had been ruled out by the Circuit Judge, but that was merely supplementary. There was no proof offered which contradicted the record, and this case also may be considered as coming within the category of those where the mere exhibition of the record disclosed the fatal infirmity, and, to that extent, made the judgment void.

did not involve the *point made here, although some expressions in the opinion of the court seem to look in that direction. The judgment offered in that case came from a trial justice court, and there being no record or presumption of jurisdiction in favor of an inferior court not of record, the plaintiff was allowed to prove by parol that, at the time the suit was brought by the trial justice, two of the parties named as defendants were actually dead. In that there was no contradiction of a record of a judgment regularly obtained in a court of record against persons then living.

Feeling the importance of having a settled and clear rule upon a subject which seems to us to be somewhat obscure, and as to which the cases are certainly not in accord, we have taken the occasion to review the authorities upon the subject in the hope of contributing something to that end.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as the parties may be advised.

McLAURIN v. RION.

An administratrix filed her petition in the Court of Probate to sell the lands of her intestate in aid of assets, making the brothers of intestate, his heirs at law, defendants. They answered, denying title of this intestate and claiming title in their father, who was also deceased. Upon this issue the cause by consent was transferred to the docket of the Circuit Court, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff and the land ordered to be sold, which was accordingly done and to plaintiff's attorney. On appeal afterwards heard, this judgment was reversed and the claim of defendants sustained. Subsequently, this attorney conveyed to the plaintiff in that cause, and she to the plaintiff here, and afterwards the land was sold under executions against the executor of the father and purchased by defendant here, who took possession. In action to recover this land, held: Under its jurisdiction in matters of administration the Court of Probate could have sold only the interest of the intestate in this land, its decree operating in the nature of a proceeding in rem and not transferring the rights of the parties before it as heirs of another party; and the proceedings had in the Court of Common Pleas, upon the transfer of the cause, being a continuation of *those in the Probate Court—only in which aspect, under the allegations in this case, a Court of Equity would have had jurisdiction of the action—the sale under the order of the Circuit Court was in the nature of a probate sale, and passed the title only of the brother, which has proved to be no title at all.

Before Wallace, J., Kershaw, February, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Trautman & Winkler, and J. T. Hay, for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy and W. H. R. Workman, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was for the recovery of a plantation, "Buck Hill." Both parties claim under deeds from the sheriff of Kershaw County. Abram D. Jones and James G. Jones were father and son. The plaintiff claims the land as derived from James G., the son, and the defendant from Abram D., the father.

Plaintiff's claim. James G. Jones died intestate without wife or children. Mary E. Shaw, his administratrix, instituted proceedings in the probate court to sell "Buck Hill" in aid of the personalty to enable her to pay the debts of the estate. In that proceeding the heirs at law of the intestate (brothers and sisters) were of course made parties, and they, being also heirs at law of Abram D., the father then dead, claimed that the father's deed to "Buck Hill" was never delivered to the son, and that as heirs of the father they had title to the land. Upon this claim of title being made the case was transferred to the Court of Common Pleas by consent. The issue there was, whether the deed conveying Buck Hill had ever been delivered by the father to the son. Judge Carpenter (1876) decided that the deed had been delivered, and went on and ordered the land sold as the property of James G. An appeal was taken and he made a supplemental order that pending the appeal the sale might be stayed by giving bond, &c. It happened that this bond was not tendered within the time prescribed and on salesday in January, 1877, the sheriff offered the land for sale and it was bid off for $500, greatly below *its value, by W. L. DePass, the attorney of the plaintiff, Mrs. Shaw. He took sheriff's title and subsequently executed to Mrs. Shaw a deed of three-fourths of the land, retaining the other fourth for his fee. This deed, however, DePass left with his wife not to be delivered until after his death, and it was delivered in the spring of 1882 to Mrs. Shaw. She executed a deed June 9, 1882, to the plaintiff, McLaurin, and he brought this action for the land.

Defendant's claim. Notwithstanding the aforesaid sale by the sheriff to DePass the appeal from Judge Carpenter's order of sale was prosecuted and the Supreme Court, March 1, 1878, reversed the decree and ordered an issue to try the question as to the delivery of the deed. See Shaw v. Cunningham, 9 S. C., 273. Upon that issue it was decided that the deed never was delivered and James G. never had title, and Judge Mackey ordered restitution of the land sold as aforesaid pending the appeal. On May 7, 1882, this judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. See 16 S. C., 631. The land was afterwards sold under judgments against the executor of Abram D. Jones and purchased by the defendant, James H. Rion, attorney, who took sheriff's title for the same.

It was referred to the master to report his conclusions of law and fact, and he reported that the plaintiff is not entitled to the possession of Buck Hill plantation, not being the legal owner of the same or any part thereof. The cause was heard by Judge Wallace who confirmed the report and dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appeals upon the grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in overruling plaintiff's exceptions to the master's report and in sustaining said report upon the ground that only the interest of James G. Jones was sold by the sheriff under the decree of Judge Carpenter. II. Because his honor erred in that he did not decide that the entire title to the land in dispute passed at said sale."

There has been much discussion in the courts as to what acts done under a judgment appealed from and afterwards reversed will be held good notwithstanding the reversal, and especially as to what persons such acts will not be sustained; but we do not think it necessary in this case to enter upon that subject. A controversy existed as to whether the plantation Buck Hill belonged to Abram D. Jones, the father, or to his son, James G., under deed from his father. This controversy was finally ended on May 7, 1882, when it was decided by the court of last resort that the deed was never delivered by the father to the son, and that the latter, James G., never owned the plantation. Both father and son were dead at that time, but the plantation was sold under judgment against the executor of Abram D., the true owner, and purchased by the defendant, James H. Rion, who took sheriff's title for the same, and is the legal owner thereof unless the title of the testator, Abram, had previously passed to the plaintiff or those under whom he holds.

It is claimed for the plaintiff that the title of Abram D. did pass by the force and effect of the sale of Buck Hill ordered by Judge Carpenter in the case of Shaw v. Cunningham, although that order was afterwards reversed and restitution of the land ordered—in the view that pending the appeal from the order of sale and before reversal that order, regular on its face and not stayed, was valid and effective to the extent of not only carrying the supposed title of James G., but also the real title of Abram D.; on the principle that as a rule a judgment is binding upon all the interests of all parties to the record, and the heirs of Abram D. were before the court in that case. Whether that principle is properly applicable to this case must depend to a large extent upon the true character of the order of sale made by Judge Carpenter. Under the constitution the probate court has jurisdiction "in all matters testamentary and of administration." Power has been conferred by statute upon that court to order the sale of real estate of a deceased person whose personal property is not sufficient to pay his debts. The case of Shaw v. Cunningham was originally filed in the probate court by Mrs. Shaw as the administratrix of James G. Jones to sell Buck Hill plantation as the property of her intestate, James G., for the purpose of paying his debts. That proceeding was purely a matter of administration, under the statute, in probate. McNamee v. Waterbury, 4 S. C., 168. It suggested no difficulty about the title to Buck Hill, but it was necessary to make the heirs of her intestate parties, and it so happened that these persons were also heirs of Abram D. Jones. They claimed that the land belonged to their father and never was the property of their brother, James G. Jones.

Now, if the judge of probate had then decided the matter, and ordered the land sold as the property of James G. to pay his debts, we suppose that, although the defendants were also the heirs of Abram D., the purchaser at that sale would have taken no more than the title that James G. had, which as it turned out was nothing. Upon what principle? Simply for the reason that it was a probate proceeding under the statute to sell a particular tract of land of a particular person to pay his debts, which is in the nature of a proceeding in rem where there is, in the ordinary sense, no adverse parties litigant, but the rights of these persons previously interested in the property are transferred from the property to the fund produced by the sale. The power of the court is over the property or thing before it without regard to the parties who may have an interest in it. All the world are parties and the estate passes by operation of law. In such case the order operates not on the person of the heirs, but on the title of the decedent, on which the debts, so to speak, operate as an implied lien. Under such an order the sale of land not the property of the decedent simply conveys nothing. Rorer Jud. Sales, §§ 222, 260; Beauregard v. New Orleans, 18 How., 497 [15 L. Ed. 469]; Florentine v. Barton, 2 Wall., 216 [17 L. Ed. 783]. In the last case cited, Judge Grier said: "The petition of the administrator, setting forth that the personal property of the deceased is insufficient to pay such debts, and praying the court for an order of sale, brought the case fully within the jurisdiction of the court. It became a case of judicial cognizance, and the proceedings are jujudicial. The court has power over the subject matter and the parties. It is true, in such proceedings there are no adversary parties, because the proceeding is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in which the estate is represented by the administrator, and, as in a proceeding in rem in admiralty, all the world are parties."

But it is said that the sale was not ordered by the judge of probate; that when the question of title was raised in the probate court the proceedings of Shaw v. Cunningham, ham, were, by consent, transferred to the Court of Common Pleas; that the whole character of the proceedings was then changed; and that Judge Carpenter's order of sale was made in the exercise of the general equity jurisdiction of that court. It would seem strange if the character of an order made for precisely the same purposes could be essentially changed simply because it was made in a different court. We think that cannot be the result here. The proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas must be considered as a continuation of those in the probate court. That was the view taken by Judge Carpenter in his original judgment (1876). He said that "the petition was originally brought in the probate court, but by consent transferred to the calendar of this court." In the first opinion of the Supreme Court (1878) Judge McIver carefully made the same statement, and it was repeated in the last opinion (1882).

The truth is, the proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas could only be sustained on that ground, in connection with the issue as to title, which went of necessity to that court. As an original proceeding on the equity side of the Court of Common Pleas it was not, as we think, within the jurisdiction of that court. The paper filed in that court when the transfer was made was in the nature of a complaint by Mary E. Shaw, as administratrix of the estate of James G. Jones, stating that her intestate was largely indebted principally to herself as administratrix of her deceased husband; that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts, but that at the time of his death he was the owner of the Buck Hill plantation, which was in the possession of the defendants; and praying that they be required to deliver up the possession of the said plantation, and that it may be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts "in a due course of administration." This could not surely be considered a creditors' bill asking the court to take charge of an insolvent estate, to sell the lands, call in creditors, and marshal the assets. Some general reference was made to "other creditors," but none of them were named or made parties, and it was not expressly suggested that the estate was insolvent, "even were that sufficient." Eno v.

Calder, 14 Rich. Eq., 158. It seems to us that the petition was substantially a repetition of that in the probate court; a petition in probate of the administratrix to have certain lands of her intestate sold to enable her to pay the debts "in due course of administration." If it was not that, it could be no more than an equitable action for the recovery of lands. Considered as an original proceeding on the equity side of the Court of Common Pleas, it was not properly within the jurisdiction of that court, and Judge Carpenter's order of sale was ab initio void. But if as heretofore we are to regard it as a continuance of or as auxiliary to those first instituted in the probate court, then we concur with the master and Circuit Judge, that the sale under the order of Judge Carpenter was in the nature of a probate sale and passed only the title of James G. Jones, deceased.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., York, March, 1885.

The facts of the case and the decretal order of Judge Fraser are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. The decree of Judge Wallace was as follows:

Hugh Nichols died intestate, leaving real and personal estate, and Andrew G. Floyd was duly appointed administrator. This action was commenced to subject lands which were of Nichols in his life-time, and now in the possession of his heirs as such, to the payment of intestate's debts. The heirs set up independent title to the lands. This issue was heard and decided by Judge Fraser, who held that the land in controversy was the property of Hugh Nichols at the time of his death. At that hearing, it was developed that the creditors of Hugh Nichols had executed some sort of an instrument to his administrator, in relation to the personal assets, and in his decree, after deciding the question as to the title to the land, as stated above, Judge Fraser allowed the defendants to amend their answer, and set up this instrument; and then referred all undetermined issues to a referee.

The referee has taken much testimony, and made an elaborate and interesting report. The present issues between the parties relate to and arise out of the instrument above referred to, and which is as follows:

"South Carolina.—York County. We, the undersigned creditors of Hugh Nichols, late of York County, deceased, holding sealed obligations as evidences of our debts, for value received, hereby transfer, assign, and set over to Andrew G. Floyd, administrator of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the estate of the said Hugh Nichols, deceased, all our rights, titles, and interests of, in, and to all and singular the notes and accounts due and payable to the said Hugh Nichols, or payable to the said A. G. Floyd, administrator as aforesaid, which are now in the hands of the said A. G. Floyd. And we hereby bind ourselves to receipt the said A. G. Floyd, administrator as aforesaid, on final settlement of said estate before *the judge of probate of York County, in full of all we may be entitled to, arising from and by virtue of said notes and accounts, which we have hereby transferred and assigned. Given under our hands and seals, this the 15th April, 1869,

It is insisted by the defendants that the instrument is a release, operating as a discharge of the administrator, so far as the personal assets were concerned, and that from that date the trusteeship of the administrator ended, and the statute of limitations began to run in his favor, and that the claim of plaintiff is now barred, more than six years having elapsed between the date of the instrument and the commencement of this action; and that as the claims are barred as against the administrator, they are also barred as against the defendants as heirs.

Whether that instrument would bind those who signed it, need not be considered, as they do not seek to escape from its terms. It is obvious, from an inspection of the instrument, that it is not in terms a release. It is, upon its face, an assignment for value to the administrator individually, or as administrator, of all the interest in the personal assets of Hugh Nichols' estate. It was not a discharge of the estate, and whatever the amount of the interest may have been, the heirs are entitled to have it ratably applied to the demands of the assignors, in reduction of their liabilities as holders of land descended. The personal assets were wholly insufficient to pay and discharge the debts of the assignors, as will appear from the evidence. The assignment for value of their interest in the notes and accounts, was only payment pro tanto. They still held their demands, and afterwards received from the administrator a dividend of eight per cent.—all going to show that it was not the understanding of any of the parties to the transaction that the administrator had renounced his trust.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the statute of limitations has not commenced to run in favor of the estate, by any renunciation of the trust by the administrator. The notes set up here were all sealed instruments, and were not barred by presumption of payment from lapse of twenty years' time from their date to the commencement of this action.

The finding of the referee as to the amount of personal estate *in the hands of the administrator is confirmed. The amount must be credited ratably upon the demands set up in this action. The plaintiff here, however, is not entitled to receive any portion of that, but has agreed, for value, to receipt for it. I am inclined to think that this assignment was intended for the benefit of the administrator, and that he is entitled to retain the pro rata share of the fund in his hands of the creditors who assigned their interests to him.

Judge Fraser having already decided that the land in the possession of the heirs of Hugh Nichols, which they hold by descent, is liable for the debts of the ancestor, I have nothing to do with that question. It is manifest that the personal assets are insufficient to pay the debts of the estate, and the land, therefore, must be sold and the proceeds applied to their payment.

I do not see why the administrator should pay his own costs. The referee does not hold him to blame for not collecting any more of the notes, and was satisfied that due diligence was used by him, and in this he is supported by the testimony. The funds in the hands of the administrator were not paid out, because he held them as his own by assignment. So far as I see, his duties were performed.

It is therefore adjudged, that the land be sold upon such terms as may be set out in an order hereafter made at the foot of this decree, and the proceeds applied to the payment of debts standing against the estate of Hugh Nichols, according to their legal rank and priority, and that the costs of this action be first paid from the proceeds of said sale.

From this decree the defendants, Mrs. Curry and Hugh Nichols, appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. To the interlocutory order: Because of error in adjudging that the possessory title of the defendants, Curry and Nichols, who had jointly occupied and used the real estate in question for sixteen years prior to action brought, could not be sustained because one of them (Mrs. Curry) had allowed proceedings to set apart a homestead to be instituted in her name.

II. To the decree: 1. Because of error in failing to adjudge that the plaintiff (the only creditor proving a debt) was barred of his action against the heirs for real estate descended, by reason *of the fact that he executed a release to the administrator "of all interest in the personal assets of Hugh Nichols" (the intestate's) estate" more than six years prior to the commencement of this action.

2. Because of error in holding, in effect, that inasmuch as the release to the administrator by the plaintiff and other creditors was not competent to discharge him generally as to his trusteeship of the estate, it was not a bar to the plaintiff and the other creditors who had executed it.

3. Because it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to set aside the conclusion of the referee (to whom all the issues had been referred) that "this release was such a renunciation of the trusteeship by the administrator as would set the statute to running from its date, against those who were privy to it"—no exception having been taken to such conclusion; and it was error to hold the heirs bound for the same debt, after the bar was complete in favor of the administrator of the estate.

4. Because of error in holding that the administrator could retain the balance of the personal estate in his hands, transferred to him by creditors, and the lands be sold and the whole proceeds applied to the plaintiff's debt.

5. Because the decrees should, in any event, have found the value of the assets descended at the time of intestate's death, and directed payment by the heirs of such sum, less the amount in the administrator's hands, as shown by the accounting herein; and a sale of the lands should only have been ordered as an alternative of non-payment.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellants.

March 18, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. One Hugh Nichols, late of York County, the husband of the defendant, Mrs. Emma F. Faulkner (now Curry), and the father of Hugh Nichols, departed this life intestate in 1866. At the time of his death, he was indebted to the plaintiff in the several notes mentioned in the *complaint. The defendant Floyd administered on his estate, and the tract of land sought to be sold descended to his widow and son above named, who have been in possession ever since, a period of sixteen years before the action below was commenced. It is alleged in the complaint, that the personal estate in the hands of the administrator was insignificant and did not amount to the excess of plaintiff's sealed demands over one thousand dollars. Wherefore plaintiff demanded judgment, that the real estate in possession of the heirs at law, defendants, be sold; that creditors be called in; that the administrator be required to account, &c., and in the event that the land may not be sold, that plaintiff have judgment against the heirs at law for the sum of $1,000, and costs, the value of said land, &c.

The defendants answered separately. The administrator plead full administration of the estate, a release from further accounting by the creditors, including the plaintiff, in April, 1869, and the statute of limitations as a bar to any further accounting. The other defendants plead title to the land by their long possession, and denied title in the deceased; also, that the demand of plaintiff was stale, and that they were in no way liable therefor by reason of assets descended; also, as to Hugh Nichols, that he was under age; and finally, that the plaintiff had released the administrator from liability in 1869, notwithstanding he had personal assets sufficient to pay the debts, which, they contended, estopped the plaintiff from subjecting the real estate to his claims, specially pleading the lapse of six years since said release as a bar to this action against them as heirs at law.

The case was heard first by his honor, Judge Fraser, upon the pleadings and evidence taken before him, upon which evidence he held that title to the land was in the intestate at his death, and that the defendants, his heirs at law, could not dispute that title, especially as the widow had claimed a homestead in the land after the death of her husband as against his debts; and he adjudged the land liable for the debts of the deceased. But before ordering sale, he thought the administrator should account for the personal assets, with leave to the defendants to set up the release mentioned, and the statute of limitations, &c.; and to this end he ordered the case to a special referee, who reported the amount due the plaintiff, upon such of his notes as were not presumed paid by the lapse of twenty years, also the amount of personal assets in the hands of the administrator, &c.

This report was heard by his honor, Judge Wallace, who, construing the paper mentioned and set up as a release to be more in the nature of an assignment by the creditors of their pro rata share in said assets to the administrator, and not a discharge of the estate or a satisfaction of their claims, adjudged that it could not avail the defendants, except so far as the claims of the creditors should be credited with their respective pro rata shares in said assets, the administrator, however, being entitled to hold said pro rata shares to himself under said assignment; also finding that the personal assets, when thus applied as a credit upon the claims of creditors, were manifestly insufficient to pay said claims. And inasmuch as Judge Fraser had decreed title to the land to have been in the intestate at his death, and liable for the debts of the ancestor in the hands of the heirs, he further adjudged and ordered the same to be sold, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of the claims established, exonerating the administrator from any liability, the funds in his hands being his own under the assignment.

The main question involved in the appeal of defendants is the doctrine of liability of heirs for the debt of the ancestor on account of lands descended or devised. Under the English statute of George II., that doctrine, as established in this State, succinctly stated, seems to be as follows: While it is true that the heir is generally liable for the debts of the ancestor, sealed or unsealed, to the extent of lands descended or devised, yet the land so descended or devised cannot be sold under a judgment obtained against the administrator or executor, obtained in an action to which the heir is not a party, if at the time of such judgment the heir is in the exclusive possession of the land asserting the right of possession and enjoying its rents and profits. In such case, the heir can only be made liable by direct action against him or them, in which, if judgment is obtained, the land can be levied upon, provided it has not been transferred before action brought. See the case of Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq., 252, and the cases there cited; and Jones v.

Wightman, 2 Hill, 579. It is further the law, that the heir cannot acquire title to the land descended as against the debts of the ancestor, by a claim of adverse possession, as against the title descended; though it may be, that where the heir claims in his own right, and his possession may be considered adverse, that such possession, if thus continued for ten years, would divest the lien of a judgment obtained against the ancestor in his life-time. Drayton v. Marshall, Rice Eq., 374 [33 Am. Dec. 84]; McRae v. Smith, 2 Bay, 339; Cholet v. Hart, 2 Bay, 156.

Now, in the case before the court, the title to the land in question was adjudged below to have descended to the defendants, widow and son of the deceased, as heirs at law, and we think the evidence sustains that finding. We must regard that question, therefore, as settled. The important question left then for our consideration is, has the plaintiff established a claim against these heirs on account of a debt of the ancestor? Several of the notes set up by the plaintiff, being past due for over twenty years, were properly excluded under the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time. Several of the other notes, however, have been established, as the presumption could not be applied to them, twenty years not having intervened since they became due.

But the defendants have relied upon the paper from the creditors to the administrator, given in 1869, which they contend was a release of the estate, and, therefore, a release to them also. And that six years having intervened since its execution, that the statute of limitations is a bar. This, we think, would be a good and perfect defence, if the paper in question was a release. But his honor, Judge Wallace, has construed it to be no release. He has held it, in effect, to be an assignment of the creditors' pro rata share in the personal assets to the administrator himself, and it operated as a credit upon the claims of the assigning creditors to the extent of their said pro rata share, leaving the balance unpaid, and still a debt against the ancestor. Was this a proper construction? The paper will be found in the "Case," and we think there is no doubt that the construction of his honor is correct. In fact, the terms of the instrument are so pointed and plain, that we cannot see how any other interpretation than that given by his honor could be suggested.

to be, that the debt of the plaintiff, as established, must first be credited with the plaintiff's pro rata share of the assets in the hands of the administrator, and that the heirs are liable only for the balance of the debt, and that the duty of the administrator had been performed, and, therefore, no costs should be taxed against him. We understand, further, that the exceptions involving the administrator have been abandoned.

This case is different from the case of Gilliland and Howell v. Caldwell, 1 S. C., 198. In that case, the claim of the creditor was upon a promissory note, and although it had been established against the administrator, or at least against the estate in a creditor's bill in 1817, and received its pro rata of the personal assets, yet the heirs who were in possession of the real estate, and remained in possession until 1863, when the creditor exhibited his bill against them to subject the real estate to the payment of so much of the debt as remained unpaid, was allowed to plead the statute, and it was held that the bill was barred by the statute. The heirs not being bound by the establishment of the debt previously, and the note upon which the debt was founded being a promissory note, the heirs, when they were sued, had the right to meet it by the statute. Such would be the law here if the notes of the plaintiff were promissory notes, but they are sealed notes, and twenty years have not elapsed, giving rise to the presumption of payment.

The case of Mobley v. Cureton (2 S. C., 140) is more like this. There, a creditor attempted to subject lands in the possession of the heirs to his debt represented by sealed note of the ancestor. The administrator had been sued on this note and judgment obtained in 1860. Thirteen years afterwards, the heirs being in possession all this time, the proceeding to subject this land to the payment of his debt was instituted; held, that the plaintiff was barred by his laches of his remedy in equity, and the bill was dismissed without prejudice to plaintiff's right to pursue the heirs at law. The decision, however, was based principally upon the ground that the creditor, by his laches, had not exhausted the personal assets, which the court held was the primary fund for the payment of the debts, and which, by the delay of the creditor, has been lost in the hands of the administrator. Here, the credi*tor has, by the decree of Judge Wallace, been ordered to accept as a credit on his notes his pro rata of the assets in the administrator's hands. It was further held in that case, that the statute of limitations being inapplicable to an action at law against the heirs of an intestate to recover a specialty debt of the intestate, it cannot be pleaded to a bill in equity against the heirs to subject real estate descended to the payment of a debt due on a sealed note. If, however, the plaintiff in such a bill has been guilty of laches, the court may refuse him its aid, and bar the equitable remedy at a period short of that which would raise the presumption of payment.

In the case of Cleveland v. Mills (9 S. C., 130), the court held that the statute of limitations applies to an action against heirs to subject real estate in their possession to the payment of the debts of the ancestor. That was a case, however, of a suit on a guaranty, and four years not having elapsed when the ancestor died, and the creditor having commenced his action within the four years, deducting the nine months allowed the executor, it was held not barred.

The complaint below seems to have been regarded by his honor, Judge Fraser, as framed in a double aspect, to wit, both at law and in equity. Admitting this to be so, still it cannot avail the defendants, heirs at law. In the law aspect, we find the notes sued on sealed notes, and within the twenty years necessary to presume payment; and, on the equity side, the Circuit Judge has not found such laches on the part of the creditor as would bar his equity under the cases supra.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

DARBY v. STRIBLING,

[Guardian and Ward 58.]

Where a guardian used his own Confederate money—not the funds of his ward, nor raised by him for the special purpose from collections of his own ante bellum assets or otherwise—in paying a judgment against his ward's estate, he can, on accounting with his wards, claim credit for *so much only as Confederate money was worth at the time of his payment.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, April, 1885.

In this case, Mr. Justice McGowan having been of counsel, did not sit. These were three actions heard together—E. J. Darby against J. V. Stribling, as administrator of James C. Willard, deceased; M. A. Murphy against the same, and N. J. Wiley against the same. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, who were wards of the defendant's intestate, one J. C. Willard, guardian, sought an accounting for their estate in the hands of said guardian. The estate consisted of a note for $900. In 1874 the guardian received $300 on this note in full, the note having been given in the purchase of slaves, and the Circuit Court having scaled the note to that amount. On appeal this court held that the guardian should account for the full amount of the note under the facts, and the master was required to state the accounts. See 22 S. C., 243.

Upon this accounting it appeared that the guardian had paid off a judgment against his wards amounting to $138.89, $46.29 for each of his three wards. This payment was made in 1863 with Confederate money, not collected on the note but out of the guardian's own Confederate money. On the accounting the defendant claimed that he should have a credit for the full sum paid as above with interest, which was allowed by the master. Upon exception to the Circuit Court, his honor Judge Pressley presiding, sustained the exception and recommitted the report with instructions that the payment

"be scaled to the true value of lawful money with interest." The appeal here involves the correctness of this ruling of the Circuit Judge.

It is a well established principle that a trustee cannot make profit or advantage to himself in the management of a trust estate. Here it is admitted that the guardian did not make the payment in question with money which he had collected on the note of his wards, Confederate or otherwise, for he had collected none; but he made it with Confederate money of his own with no evidence or claim that this money was raised by the guardian by collection of ante-war notes belonging to him; or in any way except at its depreciated value, still holding the note in full. Such being the fact, to allow him a credit for the face of the payment as against the wards, with the right to reimburse himself out of the note for that amount in lawful currency, would be a clear violation of the principle above referred to. There was no error, therefore, in the decree of the Circuit Judge, under the facts of the case, ordering a reaccounting with instructions that the payment made be scaled to the value of the Confederate money used.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

This was an action by I. H. Cantrell against William Fowler and S. T. McCravy, for the recovery of a lot of land, commenced September 15, 1883. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant, upon the first points considered by this court, cited Code, § 88, ¶ 8; Chev., 6; Pen. (N. J.), 106; 3 Id., 621; 13 Wend., 85; 29 Barb., 524; 2 Wait Prac., 373, 563; 3 Ibid., 563; Freem. Judg., 160, 338; 20 S. C., 460; 21 Id., 26; 2 Cold., 298; 33 Cal., 322; 14 S. C., 166. Upon the question of the lien of the judgment upon lands exempt from levy and sale, counsel cited Code, § 310; Const., Art. II., § 32; 27 Miss., 481; 15 S. C., 30; Murf. Sher., §§ 485, 600; Freem. Exec., §§ 138, 218, 249, 250, 355; Thomp. Hom., § 733; 20 Amer. Rep., 150; 39 Ibid., 1; 5 S. C., 75; 20 Id., 523; 16 Conn., 147; 19 S. C., 244; 21 Ill., 104; 15 Ala., 828; 2 B. Mon., 19; 3 Strob., 193; 4 Id., 364.

Messrs. Boho & Carlisle, contra, upon the question of the validity of the trial justice's judgment, cited Freem. Judg., §§ 487, 524, 531; 20 Johns., 208; 1 Bail., 457; 19 S. C., 575; 18 Id., 327; 21 Id., 83; 15 Id., 66. The land was not exempt from levy and sale as a homestead, 19 S. C., 242; 20 Id., 248; 21 Id., 137.

March 20, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover possession of a house and lot in the city of Spartanburg, both parties claiming from a common source of title, W. B. Ravan—the plaintiff, claiming under a deed from said Ravan bearing date November 30, 1882, and the defendants claiming as purchasers at sheriff's sale under an alleged judgment and execution against said Ravan. There was evidence introduced to the effect that the property in question was exempt under the homestead laws of this State from levy and sale under execution, the same being the family residence of Ravan, who was the head of a family and not worth more than three hundred dollars.

*The judgment under which the defendants claimed was recovered in a trial justice's court on December 22, 1881, and a transcript thereof filed in the Court of Common Pleas on October 31, 1882, on an account for $32.50 in favor of Fowler, Robison & Co. against W. B. Ravan, and the summons was issued in the name of that firm and personally served on said Ravan, who failing to appear, judgment by default was rendered against him "in favor of the plaintiffs," but the transcript filed in the Court of Common Pleas was of a judgment in favor of Fowler & Robison, and not Fowler, Robison & Co., against said W. B. Ravan. How the case became converted from one in favor of Fowler, Robison & Co. to one in favor of Fowler & Robison does not appear, though it does appear that there were two firms, one composed of Fowler, Sr., Wm. Fowler, and R. A. Robison, which was styled Fowler, Robison & Co., and the other composed of Wm. Fowler and R. A. Robison and styled Fowler & Robison. The property in question was levied on under said judgment on June 16, 1883, and sold by the sheriff on September 3, 1883, to the defendants, who received a sheriff's title therefor. It did not appear on the record or in the evidence that any proof of the account sued on was offered before the trial justice.

The Circuit Judge charged the jury in substance that the trial justice having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and having obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendants, they might presume that there was evidence offered at the trial to prove the account sued upon and to show that the same was really due to Fowler & Robison instead of to Fowler, Robison & Co. upon the principle that public officers, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, are presumed to have done their duty. He also instructed the jury that the question of homestead had nothing to do with the case, and when requested to charge the following propositions: "1. That if the real estate in question was such property as, under the law, was not liable to levy and sale for Ravan's debts, then the judgment created no lien upon said property and a purchaser from Ravan could not be disturbed by this judgment. 2. Under our act no property is liable to levy and sale which the defendant could lawfully claim as exempt, whether such exempted property was set off to him or not under "legal proceedings," his reply was: "Those are true, Mr Foreman, but they have no application to this case." The jury having rendered a verdict for the defendants, and judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals upon numerous grounds, which, from the view we take of the case, need not be considered seriatim.

We agree with the Circuit Judge that when it appeared that the trial justice had acquired jurisdiction there is a presumption, upon the principle stated by him, that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, everything else was regular and proper, and hence the jury might presume that the account sued on was properly proved as required by law even though such proof may not appear upon the record. But we cannot agree that there was any presumption that the account which the defendant was called upon to answer was properly proved to have been really due to Fowler & Robison and not to Fowler, Robison & Co., so as to authorize a judgment in favor of the former. In the eye of the law those two firms were distinct and different persons, and although it may have appeared that W. B. Ravan had been made a party to an action brought by one person in law (Fowler, Robison & Co.), there was nothing whatever to show that he had ever been made a party to an action brought by another person in law (Fowler & Robison); and this being a jurisdictional fact cannot be presumed, but must appear on the proceedings in the trial justice's court. Barron v. Dent, 17 S. C., 80, and cases there cited.

Where a person is summoned before a trial justice to answer the complaint of one person and makes default, no judgment can be rendered against him in favor of another person, for he cannot be said to be a party to an action in favor of such person. For all that we know, Ravan might have had no defence to an action brought by Fowler, Robison & Co., and hence when summoned to answer a complaint made by them he made default; but he may have had a defence by counterclaim or otherwise to an action brought by Fowler & Robison, and if he had been required to answer a complaint made by them, he would have had the opportunity to appear and make his defence. Be that as it may, however, we think it clear that a person summoned to answer a claim *of A. cannot be bound by a judgment upon such summons rendered in favor of B., especially when such judgment is rendered by default; to be bound he must be made a party to the action in which the judgment was rendered. This view renders it unnecessary to consider the various other objections made to the judgment, and, being fatal to the judgment under which defendants claim, is also fatal to their title.

The remaining inquiry is as to the effect of the homestead laws. Under the code, as originally adopted, final judgments were not a lien on real estate until levied, and when by the act of November 25, 1873, the code was amended by making them a lien for a limited period, it was expressly provided: "That this section shall not be so construed as to make final judgments in any case a lien on the real property of the judgment debtor exempt from attachment, levy, and sale under the constitution." It seems to us clear that, under this express provision of the statute law, the judgment under which defendants claim, even if valid, could have had no lien upon any property of the judgment debtor which was exempt from levy and sale under the homestead laws; and if, as the evidence tended to show, the property here in question was so exempt, the judgment was no lien upon it, and there could be no valid levy or sale of it under execution.

Now, if the judgment was no lien upon this property while it was in the possession of Ravan, because it was exempt under the homestead laws, and if, as has been held, a judgment debtor can sell or mortgage his homestead, then it follows that the judgment never could be a lien upon the property in dispute, for as soon as it was conveyed to the plaintiff it became his property, and as such of course not subject to the lien of a judgment against another person; for if, as we have seen, there was no lien upon it at the time of the sale to the plaintiff, then, of course, the plaintiff took his title free from any lien. The fact that the homestead had not been admeasured and set off, is a matter of no consequence. That is intended merely to designate what is exempt, and does not affect the right of exemption, which is guaranteed by the constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof. Any other view would render the right of a debtor to sell his homestead absolutely valueless and have the effect of tying him down to one particular spot; for if his creditors can follow the property exempted while in his hands after it gets into the hands of a purchaser, it is not likely that he would ever be able to find a purchaser. These views are fully supported by the principles established by the case of Elliot v. Mackorell, 19 S. C., 238, and the cases therein cited.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the Circuit Judge erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested in reference to the effect of the provisions of the homestead laws.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur except as to what is said upon the subject of homestead, but as to that I dissent. From press of engagements I cannot now give fully my reasons, but I hope to do so at some future time.

It seems to me that the law does not compel any one to claim homestead or impress upon his land the character of homestead without any agency of his, merely upon his general right to claim it; that it is optional with the debtor, and until he claims it and has set it off and located he may sell it unincumbered with the vague general right. But when he claims it, and it is set off on a particular piece of land, that identical land is then dedicated as homestead; which, as I understand it, is a habitation, a home for the family, necessarily fixed, and may not be sold by the creditors nor by the debtor himself except in the manner provided by the law, which under certain circumstances allows a sale for the purpose of exchange. See Gen. Stat., § 1994.

The homestead provision does not contemplate a mere money benefit to the debtor, but a local, fixed shelter for the family. This is implied in the very use of the word "homestead." This is the only ground upon which the law of homestead is defensible; for it would not, upon any principle, be allowable to take money from the creditor and make a donation of it to the debtor. If the debtor at his pleasure has the right to sell the homestead set apart for his family, I do not clearly see why he could not contract other debts, purchase other land, and claim homestead a second or third time. The view contended for, as it seems to me, is contrary to the spirit of the constitution, the proper construction of the acts upon the subject, tends to endless confusion, and practically defeats the very purpose of homestead; for by turning the exemption into a mere money donation to the debtor, the family is certainly turned out of doors.

*Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, March, 1885.

This was an action by A. Z. Demarest, Henry Boylston, and A. J. Haltiwanger, constituting the firm of Crane, Boylston & Co., of Atlanta, against M. C. Lipscomb. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. On December 13, 1884, the plaintiffs commenced three separate actions on three notes under seal against the defendant, the complaints in all the cases being identical in form except as to the amounts and time of maturity of the several notes, and, therefore, it will be sufficient for the purposes of this case to set out the allegations in the first complaint. The complaints were served on December 13, 1884, but the answers were not served until January 3, 1885, when they were returned as being served too late. "They were, however, again received by the plaintiffs' attorney on said January 3, and were after that again returned on January 5."

The allegation in the complaint was that the defendant "made his promissory note in writing, bearing date the 12th day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, whereby he promised to pay, ninety days thereafter, to the plaintiffs, * * the sum of ($500) five hundred dollars; and although the said note became due and payable before the commencement of this action, to wit, Sept. 10, 1884, yet the defendant has not paid the same. And the plaintiffs further say that they are now the lawful owners and holders of the said note, and that the defendant is justly indebted to them thereupon in the sum of ($500) five hundred dollars principal, together with interest thereon, from date, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, together with 10 per cent. on the principal and interest as attorney's fees." Wherefore judgment was demanded for the said principal sum and interest, together with 10 per cent. thereon as attorney's fees, and the costs of the action.

*The defendant in his answers says: "I, That formerly he gave a note to one Crane, Boylston & Co., but of the exact date of said note, and terms thereof, this defendant is unable to say and does not know, and demands strict proof thereof. II. Denies each and every allegation of the complaint not herein expressly admitted."

The cases were docketed by plaintiffs' attorney on calendar 3, whereupon defendant's attorney served notice of a motion for an order adjudging that the answers were served duly, and, failing in that, for leave to answer; and also gave notice of a motion to consolidate the several actions. Thereupon the plaintiffs obtained an ex parte order from the Circuit Judge, requiring the defendant to appear before a referee and make an affidavit to be used in opposing defendant's motion; and the defendant gave notice of a motion to rescind said order. The dates of these notices and the said order do not appear, but it is stated in the "Case" that "the whole matter was brought before the court on March 23, 1885, and his honor thereupon made the following order," the date of which is not given. The order was to the effect, "that the several causes above entitled be, and are hereby, consolidated into one action in this court, and that the several statements of the causes of actions in the respective complaints stand as the consolidated complaint in said consolidated action;" and, further, it was ordered "that the answers served on January 3, on plaintiffs' attorney, which were not served within the time required by law, stand as the consolidated answer of defendant, and that the case should stand for trial out of its order during that week, in conformity with order signed March 31, 1885."

From this last provision, it would seem that the above order must have been granted on or after March 31, 1885, and yet in the next paragraph of the "Case" it is stated, "the case was called for trial on March 27, 1885." Further on in the "Case," we find an order bearing date March 31, 1885, to the effect, "that the defendant have leave to answer herein, and that the answer heretofore, to wit, January 3, 1885, served on the plaintiffs' attorney, be deemed his answer herein, and that the cause be tried on March 26, 1885, at 6 o'clock p. m." This much of the order is recited to be on the motion of defendant's attorney, though the *whole order is represented to have been presented by the plaintiffs' attorney. The order then proceeds, on motion of the plaintiffs' attorney, to provide "that the costs of this motion be not allowed to either party, but it appearing that plaintiffs having disbursed the sum of ($1.80) one and 80-100 dollars in resisting this motion, to wit, by having the sheriff to serve papers, ordered, further, that the plaintiffs recover said sum of the defendant, to be included in their judgment obtained against the defendant at this term."

We have been thus particular in making the foregoing statement, because it is contended by respondents in argument here, that the provision requiring the defendant to pay the sheriff's costs above referred to, was, in fact, announced by the court as one of the conditions upon which defendant was allowed to answer before the trial, though not formally incorporated in the written order until after the trial, to wit, on March 31, 1885, and this is stoutly contested by the appellant. It is very manifest that, owing to the absence of some dates and the confusion in others, it is not clear what was the exact order of the several motions and orders in the court below, and hence we take occasion again to impress upon the bar the importance of giving in the "Case," as prepared for argument here, the dates of the several steps in any proceeding which they desire this court to review.

At the trial the plaintiffs offered evidence to prove their partnership, and of the execution of the several notes sued upon by the defendant, which are in the following form: "$220. Thickety, S. C., June 12, 1881. Thirty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Crane, Boylston & Co., two hundred and twenty dollars, at Spartanburg bank, Spartanburg, S. C., with exchange and collection charges, including ten per cent. attorney's fees, value received, with interest at rate of 10 per cent. per annum after maturity. Given under my hand and seal. (Signed) M. C. Lipscomb, [L. S.]; and closed their case. The defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground of variance between the allegations in the complaint and the proof, there being no sufficient allegation as to the ten per cent. attorney's fees. This motion was refused, but the court suggested to the plaintiffs' attorney that he might amend by adding copies of the notes in the allegations of *the complaint. To this, defendant's attorney objected upon the ground that his client was not present, and that he could not answer the complaint, as thus amended, instantly. The court ruled that the amendment should be allowed, and that it was not necessary for the defendant to be allowed to answer, as he must be presumed to be familiar with the contents of the notes. To this ruling the defendant duly excepted.

The defendant offering no testimony, the jury were directed to find a verdict for the amount of each note "upon the several complaints." The jury thereupon rendered three several verdicts, for the several amounts stated in the "Case." Thereupon the defendant moved for a new trial upon the following grounds: "I. That the verdict is excessive, and more than is asked for in the pleadings. II. Because the ten per cent. counsel fees should not be allowed on either the principal or interest of the debt. III. Because there was no testimony that the attorneys' fees herein amounted to ten per cent. IV. Defendant also moved for costs of this motion, and for such other and further relief as may be just."

It appearing to the court that an error had been committed in computing the amount due on the notes of eleven 17-100 dollars, it was ordered that a new trial be granted unless a remittitur for said sum be entered on the record, in which event the new trial was refused. The remittitur as directed was immediately entered on one of the complaints. Thereupon, and against the objection of defendant, duly made before the clerk, the plaintiffs entered three several judgments against the defendant, upon the several verdicts as found by the jury.

The defendant appeals, alleging error as follows: "I. In requiring defendant to go to trial before the cause was regularly reached on the docket. II. In not ruling that defendant's answer was properly put in, or that he should be allowed to answer without terms. III. In not granting a non-suit. IV. In allowing plaintiffs to amend their consolidated complaint, and not allowing defendant to answer the same. V. In instructing the jury to find for the plaintiffs the amounts they did find, and instructing them to find a verdict for each amount upon the several complaints. VI. In refusing a new trial. VII.

In not granting a new trial *except in case the ten per cent. attorney's fees were not remitted. VIII. In ruling that the said ten per cent. should be allowed upon interest of the notes as well as the principal. IX. In giving costs against defendant in the matter of plaintiffs' attempt to procure the affidavit of defendant. X. Because the plaintiffs had no right to enter up three separate judgments. XI. Because, under the order of the court, two of said verdicts were set aside, and no judgments could be entered thereon."

The first, second, and ninth grounds of appeal, imputing error in the order granting leave to defendant to answer upon the terms imposed, will be considered together. There is no doubt of the fact that the answers were not served within the time required, and hence it was discretionary with the judge whether he should allow them to come in at all, and if so, upon what terms. The statement made in the "Case," that, after the answers were first served and immediately returned as being served too late, they were again "received by plaintiffs' attorney on said January 3, and were after that again returned on January 5," is not very clear. Whether the word "received" was used in the sense of accepted, or simply to indicate that the answers were again sent to the plaintiffs' attorney on the same day, we have no means of ascertaining; but, at all events, they were practically returned the very next day, inasmuch as the 4th was Sunday—dies non—and we cannot see that there was any error on the part of the Circuit Judge in ruling that the answers were not served in time, and if so, then it followed necessarily that he had a right to impose such terms, as conditions of being allowed to answer, as he might think just.

It is insisted by appellant's attorney, that the payment of the costs incurred by plaintiffs in their effort to resist defendant's motion to be allowed to answer was not one of the terms imposed, while plaintiffs' attorney insist that it was. As will be seen from the statement which we have attempted to make of this case, it is not very clear what was the precise order of the several proceedings in the Circuit Court, owing to the absence of some dates and the confusion in others; and as it is incumbent upon the appellant to show the error which he alleges, and as we can very well understand that the payment of these costs might have been *a very proper condition to impose, we cannot assume that there was any error in this respect on the part of the Circuit Judge.

As to the third ground, we see no error in refusing the non-suit, for the plaintiffs certainly offered evidence to establish a part, at least, of their claim, and even granting that there were no sufficient allegations in the complaint as to another part of their claim, that would constitute no ground for a non-suit.

As to the fifth ground, which embraces two separate and distinct matters—first, alleging error in instructing the jury to find for the plaintiffs the amounts they did find; second, in instructing the jury to find a verdict for each amount upon the several complaints. As to the first matter, it is entirely too indefinite to enable us to determine exactly what was the particular error designed to be alleged. The instruction was not given exactly in the form stated. The notes having been proved, and no defence offered, and no request made for any instructions, and the plaintiffs' attorneys having "made a calculation of the different amounts due on the notes," his honor simply directed the jury to verify the calculations and find accordingly. In this we see no error. If, however, the purpose of this branch of this assignment of error was to raise the question as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover the ten per cent. attorney's fees, then there should have been a request to charge as to this matter, which was not done.

As to the second branch of the fifth ground of appeal, it seems to us to present more a mere matter of form rather than of substance. While, perhaps, after the cases had been consolidated, and it had been ordered "that the several statements of the causes of actions in the respective complaints stand as the complaint in said consolidated action," it would have been more regular to have attached the three complaints together as one complaint, and have had the verdict for the whole amount of the three notes written on the complaint so consolidated, we cannot say that there was any error of law in pursuing the course which was adopted.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds will be considered together, as they all seem to relate to the claim of ten per cent. attorney's fees. As we have said, there was no request to instruct the jury as to this claim on the part of the plaintiffs, and no question raised as to it, except in regard to the amendment *allowed, until the motion for a new trial, and even then no distinct point made as to the charge of this per cent. on the interest, as contradistinguished from the principal. Assuming for the present that the amendment was properly allowed (which, however, will hereinafter be considered), then the Circuit Judge had nothing before him but the fact that the defendant had promised to pay the ten per cent. attorney's fees, about which no question had been made during the trial, and there was nothing, therefore, to show that he had committed any error on the trial which rendered it necessary for him to grant a new trial. While, therefore, we are not to be understood as determining anything, either one way or the other, as to the important and interesting questions as to the validity or effect of such stipulations in a note, we do not think these grounds of appeal well taken in this particular case.

The tenth ground of appeal imputes no error to the Circuit Court, but only to the clerk of that court, and if error there be in his action, the proper mode of rectifying it is by application to the court of which he is the clerk, and not directly to this court.

The eleventh ground is so manifestly untenable as to require no discussion, for it is too plain for argument that the order of the Circuit Court cannot bear the construction sought to be placed upon it by this ground.

The only remaining inquiry is that presented by the fourth ground. It will be observed that the amendment allowed the introduction of two additional contracts, and two additional and different causes of action, to the contract which it was alleged in the original complaint the defendant had made. For in the original complaint the only promise which it was alleged the defendant had made, was a promise to pay a specific sum of money at a specified period, while the purpose and effect of the amendment allowed was to incorporate allegations that the defendant had made two additional and different promises—one to pay interest on said specified sum at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, and the other to pay 10 per cent. attorney's fees. The statement made in the complaint, "that the defendant is justly indebted to them thereupon (that is, upon the promise evidenced by the note previously alleged) in the sum of ($500) five hundred dollars, *principal, together with interest thereon from date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, together with 10 per cent. on the principal and interest as attorney's fees," is rather a conclusion of law, and an incorrect one, too, than an allegation of fact; for, without a promise in writing to that effect, the rate of interest, as matter of law, would not be ten, but seven, per cent., and certainly there is no conclusion of law, from a promise to pay a given sum at a given time, that the promisor agrees to pay ten or any other per cent. for collection fees.

It seems to us clear, therefore, that the purpose and effect of the amendment, which was allowed, was to permit the plaintiffs, not merely to state more definitely, or put in proper shape, the contract or promise which they alleged defendant had made, but to incorporate into the complaint two additional, distinct, and different promises or contracts, which defendant had no opportunity to plead to, and as to which he was precluded from raising by his pleading any issue of law or fact. Whether such an amendment is allowable at all under the code, is not made a question by this appeal, and is not, therefore, considered or determined, but certainly the defendant was entitled to the usual time allowed for answering the amendment. Cleveland v. Cohrs, 13 S. C., 397; Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C., 491.

The case now under consideration differs from the case of S. C. R. R. Co. v. Barrett (12 S. C., 173), for there the majority of the court manifestly regarded the amendment allowed as not incorporating a new and additional contract, but as simply a different statement of the same contract originally sued on; indeed, they held that no amendment was really necessary. We do not see how the fact, that, in the case now under consideration, the notes were received in evidence without objection, which was relied upon in Barrett's case as an important circumstance, can affect the question, for the notes here could not be objected to, as they were undoubtedly competent evidence to prove the promise which was alleged in the complaint; while in Barrett's case the bond which was offered in evidence was not competent evidence of the promise alleged in the complaint in that case.

porate any new or additional promise. *for both had relation to the same thing, the only change being from an implied to an express promise; a change in form merely and not in substance. In addition to this, it is said in that case that it did not appear that time to answer was asked for when the amendment was allowed, as was done in Coleman v. Heller, supra, and, we add, as was done here. We think, therefore, that there was error in refusing to allow the defendant time to plead to the complaint as amended, and upon this ground the case must go back.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. BUNDY.

[1. Criminal Law §570.]

In order to make out the defence of insanity to the charge of murder, there must be sufficient proof to overcome by the preponderance of evidence, the presumption of sanity and any other proof by the State upon this issue, so as to show a want of sanity with reasonable certainty; this degree of evidence on the part of the defendant satisfies the requirement that the State must establish every element of the crime charged "beyond a reasonable doubt."

The evidence in this case does not prove that the defendant was in a state of temporary intoxication when he committed the crime; but if it did, this would not be a defence, as voluntary drunkenness of whatever degree is no excuse for crime committed under its influence.

The difficulty is great, if not insuperable, of establishing by satisfactory proof whether an impulse was or was not uncontrollable. But there was nothing in this case requiring the Circuit Judge to enter upon this subject.

[4. Criminal Law ⚭46.]

The Circuit Judge correctly charged the jury as follows: "In order to relieve himself from responsibility for a criminal act by reason of mental unsoundness, the prisoner must show that he was under a mental delusion by reason of mental disease and that at the time of the act he did not know that the act he committed was wrong, or criminal, or punishable, either the one or the other. Because, notwithstanding his mind may be diseased, if he is still capable of forming a correct judgment as to the nature of the act as to its being morally or legally wrong, he is still responsible for his act and punishable as if no mental disease existed at all."

*Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, June, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. Stanyarne Wilson, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant, Edward Bundy, was indicted for the murder of Annie Heckman, at Spartanburg, on March 5, 1885. The facts do not appear in the brief, but we infer from the charge of the judge, which is reported in full, and from the exceptions, that no question was made as to the fact of killing, and that the only defence was that the defendant, when he committed the act, was non compos mentis and not criminally responsible. It is stated that there was evidence that the defendant had some liquor on the evening of the homicide, which occurred about half-past 8 o'clock at night, but there was no evidence whatever of any previous habit of gross intemperance of the defendant or consequences affecting his health or mind resulting therefrom. It is also stated that soon after the killing the defendant made efforts to take his own life.

The jury rendered a verdict of guilty and the defendant was sentenced to be executed August 7, 1886. From this sentence the defendant appeals, on the following grounds:

Because his honor erred in charging:

1. "That the presumption that a man is sane is a presumption of the truth of the fact beyond a reasonable doubt.

2. "That in order for a defendant to relieve himself from responsibility for a criminal act by reason of mental unsoundness, he must show that he was under a mental delusion by reason of mental disease, and that at the time of the act he did not know that the act he committed was wrong, or criminal, or punishable, either the one or the other.

3. "That when a man is charged with crime, the fact that he was drunk at the time of its commission does not discharge him from the responsibility of a sober man.

4. "That if by insulting words or abusive epithets a man is *thrown into a tumult of excitement, and sudden heat and passion induced by such a cause, and human life is taken, that is not manslaughter; that is murder.

5. "That the law requires a defendant to establish that he was insane by the preponderance of the testimony."

Because his honor refused the defendant's requests to charge:

6. "That if upon the whole evidence the jury believe that the accused at the time of the act was under the influence of a mind diseased, either intellectually or morally, and was unconscious that he was committing a crime, he should be acquitted.

7. "That if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that at the time of the act the prisoner was laboring under mental derangement, whether partial or general, of a degree sufficient to have controlled his will and to have taken from him freedom of action, the verdict of the jury should be 'not guilty.'

8. "That if by reason of mental derangement at the time of the act the prisoner had not power to control the disposition or impulse to commit the deed, he should be acquitted.

9. "That if the jury believe that there was an attempt of the defendant to kill himself soon after the commission of the act, this is a fact that should be considered in weighing the evidence as to insanity.

10. "That intoxication can be looked to in determining whether the killing was done with premeditation and deliberation. If the jury believe that at the time of the act he was by reason of intoxication or any other cause in such a condition as to render him incapable of a deliberate and premeditated purpose, they should find him guilty of manslaughter.

11. "That drunkenness is not an excuse for crime: but as in all cases where a jury find a defendant guilty of homicide, it becomes necessary for them to inquire as to the state of mind under which he acted, and in the prosecution of such an inquiry his condition, as drunk or sober, is proper to be considered. The degree of the offence depends entirely upon the question whether the killing was wilful, deliberate, and premeditated: and upon that question it is proper for the jury to consider evidence of intoxication, if such there be, not upon the ground that drunkenness renders a criminal act less criminal or can be received in extenuation or excuse, but upon the ground that the condition of the defendant's mind at the time the act was committed must be inquired after in order to justly determine the question as to whether his mind was capable of that deliberation or premeditation which, according as they were present or absent, determine whether the killing was murder or manslaughter.

12. "That if the jury believe that the purpose to take life had its inception and was carried into effect while the defendant was in a state of mental confusion, whether from drink or other cause, which rendered him incapable of calm reflection or of forming a deliberate design to take life, the offence committed cannot be murder."

Exceptions 1 and 5 allege that the judge committed error in charging that the presumption that a man is sane is a presumption of the truth of the fact beyond all reasonable doubt, and the law requires a defendant to establish that he was insane by the preponderance of testimony. It is argued that when the prisoner's sanity is questioned and put "in issue" by him, the State must establish sanity, like any other fact, "beyond all reasonable doubt." When crime is charged, it must of course be proved, for the double reason that every man is presumed to be innocent and he who alleges must prove. In criminal proceedings, which touch the life or liberty of the citizen, this rule is so exacting as to require the proof to be clear "beyond a reasonable doubt," otherwise it is considered better that the accused should escape. There is no doubt that an indictment for murder substantially alleges not only the fact of homicide, but also a criminal intent, which pre-supposes reason.

But as the usual condition of men is that of sanity, there is a presumption that the accused is sane, which certainly in the first instance affords proof of the fact. State v. Coleman, 20 S. C., 454. If the killing and nothing more appears, this presumption, without other proof upon the point of sanity, is sufficient to support a conviction, and, as the State must prove every element of the crime charged "beyond a reasonable doubt," it follows that this presumption affords such proof. This presumption, however, may be overthrown. It may be shown on the part of the accused that the criminal intent did not exist at the time the act was committed. This being exceptional is a defence, and, like other defences, must be made out by the party claiming the benefit of it. "The positive existence of that degree and kind of insanity that shall work a dispensation to the prisoner in a case of established homicide, is a fact to be proved as it is affirmed by him." State v. Stark, 1 Strobl., 506.

What, then, is necessary to make out this defence? It surely cannot be sufficient merely to allege insanity to put his sanity "in issue." That is merely a pleading, a denial, and ineffectual without proof. In order to make out such defence, as it seems to us, sufficient proof must be shown to overcome in the first place the presumption of sanity and then any other proof that may be offered. This need not be done "beyond a reasonable doubt," for that would be a misapplication of the rule, which only applies to the evidence to sustain the charge on the part of the State, but by "the preponderance of evidence," showing want of sanity with reasonable certainty: this degree of evidence on the part of the defendant answering to and satisfying the requirement that the State must establish every element of the crime charged "beyond a reasonable doubt." "Where the State fully proves a prima facie case, and a special defence, such as insanity, alibi, &c., is interposed, it must be established only by such a preponderance of evidence as will satisfy the jury that the charge is not sustained 'beyond all reasonable doubt.'" State v. Paulk, 18 S. C., 515; Lawson's Insanity, 418.

Exceptions 3, 10, 11, and 12 complain that it was error in the judge to charge that voluntary drunkenness is no excuse for crime in the sense that the jury, in considering the question of malice, may not look to the unnaturally excited condition of the mind produced by temporary intoxication. We do not see that the facts of this case as stated can be considered as properly raising the question as to the effect of drunkenness in one who commits a homicide under its influence. There was no effort to prove any permanent disease of the mind resulting from long habits of gross intemperance, nor even a temporary fit of drunkenness at the time the act was committed. The only proof upon the subject, as stated, being that the prisoner

*But if that meagre proof is regarded as sufficient to raise the question, and the prisoner must be assumed to have been in a state of temporary intoxication when he committed the homicide, that would not excuse the crime. We do not think that our case of State v. McCants (1 Speers, 336) holds peculiar doctrines on this subject. Some cases may be found which suggest limitations of the rule, especially as to reducing murder to manslaughter by the indulgence extended to the natural weakness of "sudden heat and passion." But we think that the broad current of modern opinion holds the wise old doctrine that voluntary drunkenness of whatever degree is no excuse for crime committed under its influence. Any other principle would be destructive to the peace and order of society. Every murderer would soak himself in liquor for the double purpose of nerving himself for the act and of sheltering his intended crime. Sir Matthew Hale, in his "History of the Pleas of the Crown," says: "The third kind of dementia is that which is dementia affectata, namely, drunkenness. This vice doth deprive men of the use of reason, and puts many more into a perfect but temporary phrenzy. But by the laws of England such a person shall have no privilege by his voluntarily contracted madness."

Exceptions 2, 6, 7, and 8 complain that the judge erred in not charging that, as insanity is a disease of the intellectual or moral faculties, one or both, the test of criminality was not whether the party had knowledge of right and wrong, but whether he had the power to refrain from doing what was known to be wrong. As was said in the case of State v. Stark, supra, the subject of the mind and its influence upon the body is very difficult and obscure even to the most learned. The books of medical jurisprudence contain much controversy as to what infirmities of the mind should exempt from criminality. Since the famous cases of Haffield, who under an insane delusion shot at the king, and of McNaghten for killing Mr. Drummond by mistake for Sir Robert Peel, these discussions for the most part have been directed towards what has been called insane delusion, moral insanity, or uncontrollable impulse. (See chapter 19 of Sir James Stephen's History of the Criminal Law.) On a subject so intangible and of which so little can be clearly known we would not, in the *spirit of dogmatism, undertake to say that there was no moral as distinguished from intellectual insanity. It seems to us, however, that in the view suggested the difficulty would be great, if not insuperable, of establishing by satisfactory proof whether an impulse was or was not "uncontrollable."

But we see nothing in this case which required the Circuit Judge to enter upon the subject. As he stated, he was not called upon to charge abstract propositions that the evidence did not make necessary. "It is only proper that I should charge you in regard to such legal principles as arise out of the evidence." As applicable to the facts of the case, he instructed the jury as follows: "In order to relieve himself from responsibility for a criminal act by reason of mental unsoundness, he (the prisoner) must show that he was under a mental delusion by reason of mental disease, and that at the time of the act he did not know that the act he committed was wrong, or criminal, or punishable, either the one or the other. Because, notwithstanding his mind may be diseased, if he is still capable of forming a correct judgment as to the nature of the act, as to its being morally or legally wrong, he is still responsible for his act and punishable as if no mental disease existed at all."

We cannot say that this was error of law. The test here given to the jury was, as we understand it, the ordinary test in such cases; the test authorized by the opinion of all the judges of England in answer to the questions of the House of Lords growing out of McNaghten's Case; the test applied in the case of the United States v. Guiteau [1 Mackey (D. C.) 498, 47 Am. Rep. 247] for shooting President Garfield, and in many other cases in most of the States. See Lawson on Insanity as a Defence to Crime, 270, and following pages.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of enabling that court to assign a new day for the execution of the sentence before imposed.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, April, 1885.
The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. Sometime in the year 1866, Mary A. Martin executed a mortgage to J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin on a tract of land containing 1,900 acres, and on March 9, 1876, J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin executed a mortgage to James Evans on 300 acres of said tract, and on March 5, 1877, W. B. Martin executed a mortgage to T. A. Hudgens on his half of the 1,900 acre tract. On June 4, 1877, J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin conveyed to the plaintiff 315 acres of the 1,900 acre tract, and on June 28, 1880, Mary A. Martin executed a conveyance of the same 315 acres to the plaintiff. On January 23, 1883, J. C. Martin conveyed his half interest in the 1,900 acre tract to his wife, the defendant, Ina H. Martin, and on the same day assigned to her his half interest in the mortgage given by Mary *A. Martin to J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin; but exactly how the said J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin acquired title to the 1,900 acre tract, does not appear in the "Case."

On January 25, 1883, the said Ina H. Martin commenced an action against Mary A. Martin and W. B. Martin to foreclose the mortgage on said 1,900 acre tract, and to adjust matters between herself as assignee of J. C. Martin and the defendant, W. B. Martin, the co-owner of said mortgage. In that action, an order was granted for the sale of the mortgaged premises "in the following parcels or plantations, to wit: 1st. The home tract, containing twelve hundred acres, more or less, bounded, &c. 2d. The mill tract, containing four hundred acres, more or less, bounded, &c. 3d. The Stark Martin tract, containing three hundred acres, more or less, bounded," &c. The Stark Martin tract is understood to be the 315 acres conveyed to the plaintiff, as above stated. The order of sale directed that the master should "satisfy out of the share belonging to Ina H. Martin any judgments or liens upon or against the share of J. Campbell Martin prior to his assignment of his interest or share to his wife, Ina H. Martin."

The mortgaged premises having been advertised for sale, in accordance with said order, this action was commenced by the plaintiff to enjoin the sale of the 315 acre tract conveyed to her, as above stated, "until it is ascertained whether the residue of the said 1,900 acres of land is sufficient to pay all debts secured by liens on said land prior to the conveyance to this plaintiff," and "that the mortgages of James Evans and Thomas A. Hudgens be paid by the master out of the proceeds of the residue of the said 1,900 acres of land, and the title of this plaintiff be relieved from said liens." The defendants, Evans and Hudgens, consented that the prayer of the complaint be granted, but the defendant, Ina H. Martin, put in an answer setting up defences, which will be hereinafter stated. A temporary restraining order was granted in conformity to the prayer of the complaint, and the residue of the 1,900 acre tract was sold, and out of the proceeds the mortgage debts of Evans and Hudgens, who had, in the meantime, recovered judgments of foreclosure, have been fully paid and satisfied.

*The defendant, Ina H. Martin, in her answer, contests generally the claim of the plaintiff, and, as a further defence, alleges that the conveyance of the 315 acres to the plaintiff by J. C. Martin and W. B. Martin was made in pursuance of an agreement that the plaintiff would pay certain notes of one J. T. Hill against them; that the plaintiff failed to pay said notes, and in consequence thereof she "surrendered to J. C. Martin all her right, title, interest, and possession of 200 acres of said land, bounded * *, in payment, satisfaction, and discharge of J. C. Martin's claim against her for failure to perform her part of the first mentioned agreement. That for several years J. C. Martin has been in possession of 200 acres of said land from the time of said second agreement, and so remained until he sold his interest in said 1,900 acres of land to his wife, Ina H. Martin, who is now the rightful owner and possessor of said 200 acres of land."

All the issues of law and fact were referred to the master to hear and determine the same, and at the reference the plaintiff offered testimony to meet the special defence above set out in regard to the 200 acres of land, tending to show that the true nature of the agreement between J. C. Martin and the plaintiff, through Stark Martin, her husband and agent, was that the 200 acres were rented to J. C. Martin, and that the rents and profits received by him were more than sufficient to pay the notes to J. T. Hill. It was also argued before the master that the Evans mortgage having been paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the land of Mrs. Ina H. Martin, which was not covered by the lien of said mortgage, she was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Evans against the 315 acres which, it was alleged, was covered by his mortgage. This position was not sustained by the master, because, as he says, "In the first place, this Evans debt was a debt of Mrs. Ina H. Martin's alienor before the alienation, and in the second place, there is no evidence before me that the mortgage of Evans covered only the 315 acres of land; on the contrary, that mortgage is on 300 acres of land, and the boundaries therein described do not tally with those of the 315 acres." This is quite true, as appears from the descriptions of the two parcels, as set out in the "Case," which seem to be entirely different; but the plaintiff alleged in her complaint that she "is informed *and believes that the said mortgage given to James Evans covers the land conveyed to her by the said J. Campbell Martin and William B. Martin," and this allegation is admitted in Mrs. Ina H. Martin's answer. So that it must be assumed that the Evans mortgage covered the 315 acres, though it may, possibly, be true also that it covers more of the 1,900 acre tract than that conveyed to plaintiff. Under the view, however, which we take of the case, this will not be material.

The master found as matter of fact: "I. That the land, to wit, the 200 acres, has been paid for by the rents and profits thereof, under the agreement of J. Campbell Martin and Stark Martin. II. That the proceeds of the sale of the residue of the land were sufficient to pay the claims mentioned in the complaint, and that they have been paid therefrom." And as conclusions of law he found: "I. That plaintiff is entitled to have the injunction made perpetual. II. That plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the land. III. That Ina H. Martin is not subrogated to the rights of James Evans in the mortgage debt."

To this report the defendant, Ina H. Martin, filed the following exceptions: "I. Because said master erred in findings of fact, as to the agreement with J. C. Martin. II. Because said master erred in his finding of fact, as to the payments made by Stark and Julia A. Martin. III. Because said master erred in his finding of fact, that the Evans debt was a debt of Ina H. Martin. IV. Because said master erred in his finding of fact, that the Evans mortgage did not cover the 315 acres of land known as the Stark Martin tract. V. Because said master erred in his finding of fact, that the land, to wit, the 200 acres, has been paid for by the rents and profits thereof, under the agreement of J. C. Martin and Stark Martin. VI. Because said master erred in his conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to have the injunction made perpetual. VII. Because said master erred in his conclusion of law, that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the land. VIII. Because said master erred in his conclusion of law, that Ina H. Martin is not subrogated to the rights of James Evans in the mortgage debt."

The Circuit Judge overruled these exceptions, and ordered that the report be confirmed and the injunction made perpetual.

*From this judgment the defendant, Ina H. Martin, appeals upon precisely the same grounds as those taken in the exceptions to the master's report, though the appellant has, in strict conformity to the rule of this court, repeated the exceptions in her grounds of appeal.

The first, second, and fifth exceptions, relating to the same subject, will be considered together. They raise questions of fact only, and having been determined adversely to the appellant by both the master and the Circuit Judge, their finding must be regarded, under the well settled rule, as conclusive, unless the appellant has been able to show that they are without any evidence to support them, or are manifestly against the weight of the evidence. There certainly is evidence to support these findings in the testimony of Stark Martin, supported by that of Martin Thomas, and the only evidence to the contrary is that derived from the declarations of the plaintiff, that she had paid J. C. Martin nothing. This was strictly true, and may be reconciled with the testimony on the part of the plaintiff, for she had not, in fact, made any payments, but still J. C. Martin may have been reimbursed by being allowed to retain the rents and profits of the 200 acres for several years. But in addition to this, she denies having said what was attributed to her, and it is not for us to weigh the testimony critically and determine which of the witnesses have given the correct version of a transaction. At all events, we certainly cannot say that the conclusion reached by the master was manifestly against the weight of the evidence, and, on the contrary, we think his conclusion may well be supported under the testimony.

The third exception is taken under a misapprehension. We are unable to discover where the master found that the Evans debt was a debt of Ina H. Martin. On the contrary, he says distinctly that "this Evans debt was a debt of Mrs. Ina H. Martin's alienor before the alienation"—not the debt of Mrs. Martin; and this is strictly true.

So, too, the fourth exception does not correctly represent the master. We do not see that he made any distinct finding as to the matter therein referred to. He does state in the body of his report that "there is no evidence before me that the mortgage of *Evans covered only the 315 acres." But, as we have said, we do not regard this as material, and will assume that the Evans mortgage did cover the 315 acres.

The sixth exception is somewhat general in its terms, but, as we understand it, the point intended to be raised is that the plaintiff has shown no equity to which she is entitled, calling for the remedy by injunction. It must be borne in mind that the defendant, Ina H. Martin, as assignee of J. C. Martin, can claim only such rights as her assignor could, and after it has been determined that the plaintiff has bought from J. C. Martin the land in question, and paid for the same, and has received, as she has, his warranty title, it must be manifest that a Court of Equity could not allow him to sell the same land under his mortgage; for if he did so, she would then, under his warranty, have immediate recourse upon him, and this circuity of action a Court of Equity would avoid, and, having all parties interested before it, would render such decree as would settle all the rights of the parties in the one action; and certainly J. C. Martin would not be allowed to sell land under his mortgage to pay a debt due to himself, after he had sold and conveyed the same land to a third person with warranty and received the purchase money. If this be so, then he could transfer to his assignee, Ina H. Martin, no higher or better rights than he himself had, and the plaintiff has a plain equity to restrain the defendant, Ina H. Martin, as his assignee, from selling this land to pay a debt due to plaintiff's grantor and warrantor, even though the mortgage does cover the land.

The case of Wilson v. Hyatt, McBurney & Co. (4 S. C., 369), relied on by appellant, was very different from this. There the plaintiff sought to enjoin a judgment creditor of a third person from selling her land, upon the ground that the judgment had no lien upon the land proposed to be sold, and presented a controversy purely as to strict legal right, involving no feature of equitable cognizance. If, as the plaintiff claimed, the judgment was not a lien on the land, its sale under such judgment could do no harm, as the purchaser at such sale would get nothing, and there was, therefore, no reason why the extraordinary power of the Court of Equity should have been invoked for the protection of the plaintiff in that case, as she needed no such protection. Here, *however, the land in question was undoubtedly covered by the lien of the mortgage, and, therefore, unquestionably liable to sale under it, but for the equities growing out of the other transactions between the plaintiff in this case and the assignor of the defendant, Ina H. Martin.

In connection with this, we will consider next the eighth exception, as to the claim of the appellant to be subrogated to the rights of Evans, whose mortgage, as we have assumed, does cover the land in question. Here, too, we must bear in mind that the appellant, as assignee of J. C. Martin, can only claim the rights of her assignor, and certainly he could not throw the payment of his own debt to Evans upon land which he had sold and conveyed with warranty to the plaintiff, before he had assigned the mortgage to appellant. What rights Evans may have had, it is not important to consider, as he raises no question, and in fact has consented that the prayer of the plaintiff in her complaint should be granted.

The only remaining exception is the seventh, which, it seems to us, comes too late. After the appellant has in her answer tendered the issue of title to, and right to, the possession of the land in question, and after all the issues of law and fact raised in the case have been referred to the master for determination, by the consent of the appellant, as we are obliged to assume, we think it is now too late to raise the question as to the right of the court without a jury to determine such a question, which seems to be the point made on this exception in the argument. And it is very clear from the findings of fact by the master, concurred in by the Circuit Judge, that the plaintiff has a right to the possession of the land.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Trusts ⇨257.]

Where land is devised to trustees to divide the same equally and deliver possession to four children of testator, the trust is not executed until these duties are performed; and even after division, until delivery of *possession is actually made. The trustees alone, therefore, are the proper plaintiffs in an action to recover a part of the land so devised.

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, April, 1885.

This was an action by R. E. Bowen and Jane E. Cauble, as trustees, under the will of Henry A. Cauble, of the four children of said Henry, against Harriet M. Humphreys, to recover the possession of a lot of land in the city of Greenville. The case came to this court from an order of non-suit, and upon the following exceptions:

I. Because the action having been brought in the name of the trustees, and they having proved that the legal title to the property in dispute was vested in them, the presiding judge should not have granted a non-suit.

II. Because the presiding judge erred in granting a non-suit after it was shown by the testimony in the case that the cestui que trust, who is in being, had no legal title to the property in dispute.

III. Because the presiding judge erred in granting a non-suit, for if the cestui que trust did have a naked right to the possession of the property under the proof, she had no legal title and had never been put in actual possession of the property.

IV. Because the presiding judge erred in granting a non-suit in this case, for if the cestui que trust did have a naked right of possession, if she had been joined with the plaintiff in this action, there would have been a mis-joinder of parties.

V. Because the presiding judge erred in granting a non-suit in this case, for if the action had been brought in the name of the cestui que trust, she not having the legal title in her, the same would have failed, and therefore the action was properly brought.

VI. Because the plaintiffs being trustees of an express trust could maintain the action in their own names, and the presiding judge therefore erred in granting a non-suit in the case.

*Mr. M. F. Ansel, for appellants.
Messrs. Blythe & Mayfield, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiffs bring this action to recover possession of a certain lot of land in the city of Greenville, now in the possession of the defendant, the plaintiffs claiming title under the will of Henry A. Cauble. The entire will is not set out in the "Case," but only the eighth and ninth clauses thereof, which read as follows:

"Item VIII. I will and devise all the rest and residue of my real estate, wherever situated, unto my friend, Col. Robert E. Bowen, and my beloved wife, Jane E. Cauble, in trust for the sole and separate use of my four children, Bettie A. Gibson, Mattie L. Gilreath, James Oliver Cauble, and William H. Cauble, for and during the term of their natural lives, and after their death to such child or children as they may have living at the time of their death, their heirs and assigns forever.

"Item IX. I will and devise that my executor and executrix herein named, as soon after my death as they may think best, do have the said real estate mentioned and devised in item VIII. of this my will, divided into four equal shares, delivering possession of one share to each of my said children, except the storehouses and lots on the corner of Main and Coffee streets and now known as the Cauble block, the same being brick stores and running as far up Coffee street as Laurens, which storehouses and lots I desire to be kept together and not divided; the rents and profits therefrom, however, to be equally divided between my said four children. I also desire that my tanyard be run by my executor and executrix herein named until all the bark on hand at my death may be used up."

It seems that the persons appointed trustees as above were the same persons as those named as executor and executrix in the will, and that soon after the death of the testator they had the real estate appraised and divided as directed by the will, and that certain portions thereof designated in the "Case" were assigned to Mrs. Mattie L. Gilreath as her share, which includes the lot in controversy in this case, and that she gave to the plaintiffs a receipt as follows: "Received, Greenville, S. C., January 2, 1883, of R. E. Bowen, executor, and Jane E. Cauble, executrix, *of the estate of Henry A. Cauble, deceased, the possession of the following described real estate," &c., going on to describe the property so assigned to her, but in fact she never did receive possession of the lot in controversy, the same being withheld by the defendant under a claim of title thereto.

At the close of the testimony the Circuit Judge granted a non-suit upon the ground, as seems to be assumed in the argument here, both on the part of the appellants and respondent, that the trustees having executed their trust they could not maintain the action, the legal title having passed to Mrs. Gilreath by virtue of the statute of uses. The only question, therefore, raised by this appeal is whether there was error in granting the non-suit upon that ground.

There is no doubt that the statute will not execute the use as long as there is anything remaining for the trustee to do, which renders it necessary that he should retain the legal title in order fully to perform the duties imposed upon him by the trust. Bristow v. McCall, 16 S. C., 545, and the cases therein cited. So that the practical inquiry in this case is, whether there was any duty remaining for the trustees to perform in order fully to carry into effect the objects of the trust. The first object of the trust was to hold the property, the legal title to which was directly devised to the trustees for the sole and separate use of the four children of the testator, two of whom appear to be married women, for and during the term of their natural lives and after their death to such child or children as they may have living at the time of their death; the next was to divide all the real estate devised to them except the brick stores known as the Cauble block into four equal shares, delivering possession of one share to each of said children, and the next to divide the rents and profits of the Cauble block equally amongst the four children.

Whether it was necessary for the legal title to remain in the trustees in order to effect the first object of the trust since the change in the law with respect to the separate property of a married woman, and whether the remainders to the children were vested or contingent, and if the latter whether it was necessary for the legal title to remain in the trustees to preserve such remainders, since the passage of the act of December 22, 1883 *(18 Stat., 430), are questions which were not raised in the case, and will not be considered here. But it certainly was necessary that the trustees should retain the legal title in order to effect the second object of the trust—to divide the property and deliver possession of the several shares to the several children. It is true that a portion of this object seems to have been accomplished in part at least by the appraisalment of the property and apportionment made by the appraisers called in for that purpose, but what was equally necessary to be done in order fully to carry into effect the object of the trust—the delivery of possession—was certainly not done, for a portion of the property assigned to one of the children was then and is yet in the possession of the defendant claiming title thereto and refusing to surrender possession thereof. Until, therefore, this controversy is determined, it is manifest not only that the trustees have not but cannot fully perform the duties imposed upon them by the trust; and the object of this action is to enable them to perform those duties.

The fact that Mrs. Gilreath has, by her receipt above mentioned, acknowledged that she has received possession of the lot in question, amounts to nothing; for it is well settled that a receipt is always open to explanation, and it is conceded in this case that she never did in fact receive possession of said lot, because the defendant is now and was at the time of the division in possession and refused to surrender the same. Indeed, until the title to the lot here in controversy is finally determined, it may well be doubted whether the trustees could properly make any division of the property. The terms of the trust require that the property shall be divided equally, and if it should turn out that the defendant in this action shall be able to establish a superior title to the testator so far as this lot is concerned, then the division which the trustees have attempted to make would not be an equal division, and the terms of the trust would not have been performed.

It seems to us clear, therefore, that there was error in granting the non-suit upon the ground that the trust being fully executed the title and the right to possession passed to Mrs. Gilreath by virtue of the statute of uses, and therefore that the action could not be maintained by the trustees. On the contrary, we think *that the purpose and object of this action was to effect such a result as would be necessary to enable the trustees to perform fully the duties of the trust, and hence that the action is maintainable in their names.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, April, 1885.
The opinion states the cases.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellants.
Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving similar questions, were heard and will be considered together. On *February 18, 1885, the attorney for the defendants in each of above cases was served with a notice signed by the clerk, and not by the attorneys for the plaintiff, that the costs in said cases would be adjusted at his office on February 20, 1885, "in accordance with the taxation herein made;" and each notice was accompanied with an itemized bill of costs due to plaintiff's attorneys, clerk, and sheriff, together with an affidavit in each case of one of the attorneys for the plaintiff that he had paid the sums therein specified for printing arguments for the Supreme Court. On the same day defendants' attorney served the clerk and the attorneys for the plaintiff with the following exceptions: "1st. Because the proposed taxation of costs herein is excessive in amount. 2d. Because the costs are not itemized and sworn to in accordance with the provisions of the code of procedure. 3d. Because the notice of taxation of costs is irregular and not according to law, and the defendants will move the Circuit Court to set aside the same." The defendants' attorney, however, failed to appear at the clerk's office at the time appointed and no further objection being made, other than the exceptions above set out, the clerk adjusted the costs in the one case at the sum of $141.30 and in the other at $145.05.

After hearing argument of counsel the Circuit Judge granted an order affirming the taxation of costs as made by the clerk, "except the two items of ten dollars (one in each case) inserted by the clerk for motion for judgment." From this order defendants appeal, upon the following grounds: "I. Because the presiding judge ruled that the notice of taxation before the clerk was sufficient. II. Because the presiding judge ruled that costs and disbursements need not to have been more particularly itemized or verified than appeared in the notice served on defendants' attorneys. III. Because the taxation of costs by the clerk, affirmed by the presiding judge, was in excess of the amounts allowed by law; for instance, in charge for reference on costs, and others, as will appear on inspection of notice of taxation of costs. IV. Because the clerk's and sheriff's costs are not even certified to by these officers respectively."

The first ground is based upon the idea that the notice of the adjustment of costs should have been given by the attorneys and *not by the clerk. Section 326 of the Code simply requires that the notice shall be given, but does not specify by whom; and in the absence of any such provision in the statute we cannot say that there was any error in the clerk signing the notice. The object designed was attained, as is shown by the fact that the defendants' attorney filed exceptions on the day appointed by the notice, although he did not see proper to appear and support his exceptions.

The second and fourth grounds may be considered together. From an inspection of the bills of costs as set out in the "Case," it appears that nothing was charged therein as disbursements, strictly speaking, except the amount paid for printing argument for Supreme Court, which was verified by the oath of the attorney who paid the same, and the amount (twenty-five cents) paid express charge on settlement of case, which does not seem to have been verified. All the other items appear to be items of costs, due to the several officers of court, fixed by law, and which could not be properly charged as disbursements unless paid out by plaintiff, and which could not be verified as such. When charged as due to the several officers there can be no necessity for any verification, as the amounts are fixed by law, and their correctness can better be determined by a comparison of the record with the items as fixed by the statute than by an affidavit which could only state the facts as there found.

It is true that the theory of the law is that the fees of the clerk and sheriff are paid by the party who calls their services into requisition at the time the services are performed, and when that is done the fact of such payment should be verified by affidavit, as these fees then become disbursements, strictly speaking. But when this is not done, as is very often the case, then the fact of such payment could not be verified, and these fees cannot properly be classed as disbursements, but may be taxed as costs due to the several officers. Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C., 58. Nor do we see any necessity in such a case that these fees should be "certified to" by these officers, and we know of no law requiring such certificate. There is nothing, therefore, in either of these grounds except as to the small item of twenty-five cents above *referred to, which could not be allowed as a disbursement without verification and which must, therefore, be disallowed.

The only remaining ground is the third, which is of such a general character, except in one particular, that it cannot be considered. The province of this court is simply to consider such errors of law as are specified in exceptions properly taken. It will be observed that both in the exceptions filed with the clerk and in the grounds of appeal there is a singular absence of any specifications of error except in the single instance of the charge for reference on costs. Respondent has a right to be advertised of the specific errors alleged by appellant in order that he may come prepared to meet them, and unless this is done this court cannot undertake to consider them. A mere general charge that the taxation of costs "was in excess of the amounts allowed by law" is certainly insufficient, for that indicates no specific error and would involve the necessity of going over the bill of costs, item by item, to ascertain whether the charge was well founded. The fact that counsel for appellant has, in his argument, undertaken to supply this defect in his exceptions cannot avail him, for the argument, as we have had occasion frequently to say, can only be based upon the record as prepared for argument here. As we have said, however, there is one specification of error in the third ground of appeal which is properly before us for consideration, and that is as to the charge for a reference on costs. This charge cannot be allowed. The adjustment of costs by the clerk is not a reference, and no charge for it as such can be allowed.

The judgment of this court is, that the order appealed from, except as herein modified, by disallowing the charge of twenty-five cents for express charges on settlement of the case in the second case, and the charge for reference on costs in both of the cases, be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, October, 1885.

This was an action commenced in March, 1885, by C. C. Habenicht against Rawls & Wilhalf, John Agnew, jr., and Jennie Agnew, upon three promissory notes bearing date January 24, 1883, given to plaintiff by Rawls & Wilhalf (a mercantile firm composed of J. S. Rawls, C. H. Wilhalf, and John Agnew, jr.), and endorsed by said John Agnew, jr., and Jennie Agnew, his wife. Mrs. Agnew was at that time, and at the time of the trial, possessed of a separate estate.

Mrs. Agnew answered, alleging, among other defences, that she was a mere surety, and that at the time she signed the note she was a married woman, and still was such. The evidence showed the facts stated in this answer to be true.

The plaintiff requested the judge to charge the jury:

1. That a married woman has a capacity to contract debts as if unmarried, restricted only to their collection from her separate property.

2. If the foregoing be refused, we would ask the court to charge: That it is a matter of evidence whether Mrs. Agnew intended to charge her separate estate with the payment of the notes, although she did not, in express terms, so charge it; and that it is for the jury to determine, from the evidence and the circumstances, whether she so intended.

The principal question in this case is as to the power of a married woman to bind her separate estate by her contracts, and as to that my instructions to you will probably determine this case: for, as you are the judges of the facts, I am the sole judge of the law, and you are bound to take it as I give it to you. If I commit error, there is a tribunal in which these gentlemen can have me corrected.

A married woman can make no contract, except such as is expressly authorized by law, and she cannot bind herself except in one manner, and that is declared by the statute. She may "contract and be contracted with as to her separate property." The contract must be as to her separate property, must have reference to her separate property, must concern her separate property. A married woman who undertakes to enter into a contract of endorsement or suretyship, or to make a joint note with others, cannot bind herself thereby unless it is expressed upon the face of the instrument that she intends to bind her separate property, or the inherent nature of the contract must show that it concerned her separate property, or it must be proved aliunde that her intention was to bind her separate property. The simply endorsement of a promissory note, the joint making of a note, or other contract of suretyship, and nothing more, cannot bind a married woman.

As to the point whether John Agnew, jr., and Mrs. Jennie Agnew are endorsers of these notes, or joint makers with Rawls & Wilhaff, I am bound to charge you that when one signs his name across the back of a promissory note, payable to the order of a third party, and before the signature or endorsement by said third party, and no proof going to show to the contrary, he is bound with the principal as an original promisor and maker of the note.

His honor, the presiding judge, here read the plaintiff's requests to charge, and then proceeded: The first of these requests I refuse, gentlemen. The second is correct, with the modification that there must be some evidence besides the fact of signing, some evidence aliunde to show her intention to bind her separate property, and in this case, gentlemen, there is none.

*The form of your verdict should be: "We find for the defendant, Jennie Agnew;" and if you should find for the plaintiff, against the other defendants, you should so state, with the amount of your verdict written out.

The jury found the following verdict: We find for the defendant, Jennie Agnew, and we find for the plaintiff, as against Rawls & Wilhaff and John Agnew, jr., three hundred and ten dollars and forty-six cents.

The plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor charged the jury that "a married woman, who undertakes to enter into a contract of endorsement or suretyship, or to make a joint note with others, cannot bind herself thereby, unless it is expressed upon the face of the instrument that she intends to bind her separate property, or the inherent nature of the contract must show that it concerned her separate property, or it must be proved aliunde that her intention was to bind her separate property. The simple endorsement of a promissory note, or other contract of suretyship, and nothing more, cannot bind a married woman."

II. Because his honor charged the jury that there was no evidence in this case of an intention on the part of Mrs. Jennie Agnew to contract as to her separate estate.

III. Because his honor refused plaintiff's first request to charge.

IV. Because his honor refused plaintiff's second request to charge without modification.

V. Because his honor charged the jury, in effect, that they must find for the defendant, Mrs. Agnew.

Mr. Justice MELVER. On January 24, 1883, the defendants, Rawls & Wilhaff, made the notes sued on payable to the plaintiff, and before their delivery to him they were endorsed by the other two defendants, Jennie Agnew then and now being a married woman. The notes were given in discharge of a lien held by the plaintiff on the stock of goods belonging to Rawls & Wilhaff. Mrs. Agnew had no interest in the stock of goods, and received no consideration for her endorsement. She was, therefore, practically, a mere surety for the debt of another; and the sole question raised by this appeal is whether she, being a married woman, was capable of making such a contract.

At common law, there is no doubt that she had no such capacity, and, therefore, the inquiry is whether she has, by statute, been endowed with the power to make such a contract. That the act of 1870, incorporated in chapter C. of the General Statutes of 1872, page 482, section 3, did confer upon a married woman the power to make any contract which a feme sole could make, even to the extent of becoming surety for her husband, was settled by the cases of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell, 15 S. C., 581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], and Clinkscales v. Hall, 15 S. C., 602. But at the very next session of the general assembly, which convened only a very few days after the decisions in the cases just recited were rendered, the law which had been thus construed in those cases was altered so as to limit the power of a married woman to contract, and the question is as to the extent and effect of that limitation.

By the law, as it formerly stood, it was declared that "a married woman shall have the right * * to contract and be contracted with in the same manner as if she were unmarried"; but by the law as it stood at the date of the alleged contract here in question, and still stands, it is declared that "a married woman shall have the right * * to contract and be contracted with, as to her separate property, in the same manner as if she were unmarried"; the five words italicized having been inserted as an amendment to the law as it formerly stood; so that the question raised by this appeal is narrowed down to the inquiry as to the effect of those five words. It seems to us that the most natural and the proper construction of the terms of this act, as amended, is that adopted by the Circuit Judge: that the contract which a married woman is therein authorized to make is "as to her separate property, must have reference to her separate property, must concern her separate property."

It will be observed that the question is as to what contracts a married woman may make, and not as to their effect after they have been made. If a given contract is one that the law authorizes a married woman to make, then its effect is, and must necessarily be, the same as that of a contract of a person not laboring under any disability. It is very clear that the legislature intended to make some alteration in the law as it formerly stood, and we think it equally clear that the intention was to limit the power of a married woman as to the kind of contracts which she was permitted to make, viz., to those in relation to her separate property. As we have seen, prior to the amendment a married woman could make any kind of contract which a person sui juris could make, and the intention undoubtedly was to alter this, and hence her general power to contract was qualified by the words constituting the amendment, so that, while formerly she had the unlimited power to contract, now she can only make contracts "as to her separate property."

We are unable to discover anything in the act which indicates that the intention of the legislature was simply to confine her liability on any contract, which she might choose to make, to her separate estate, as is contended for by appellant. There is nothing in the act which shows that the attention of the legislature was directed to the kind of property which could be held liable for the performance of a married woman's contract; and, on the contrary, the language used shows that the legislative mind was directed to the kind of contract which she was to be permitted to make, and not to the kind of property which could be resorted to in case of a breach of the contract. Very recently, before the law was amended, it had been determined, as we have seen, although there was no little contrariety of opinion upon the subject, as is well known, that a married woman had the same capacity to make any kind of contract as any other person, and the irresistible inference is that it was this that the legislature intended to alter, so as to confine the contracting power of a married woman to a certain class of contracts, to wit, those which were made as to her separate estate.

We are not aware that any controversy had arisen or any adjudication had been made as to the kind of property which could be made liable for the breach of a married woman's contract, and, therefore, no occasion had arisen for an alteration of the law in that respect. Indeed, we do not see how such a controversy could have arisen, for the old code, as well as the code of 1882, expressly provided that damages recovered against a married woman could only be collected out of her separate estate. Section 298 of the old Code, which is in this respect the same as section 296 of the amended Code, provides that "in an action brought by or against a married woman, judgment may be given against her as well for costs as for damages, or both for such costs and for such damages, in the same manner as against other persons, to be levied and collected of her separate estate, and not otherwise." And in section 310 of the old Code, the provision was that "an execution may issue against a married woman, and it shall direct the levy and collection of the amount of the judgment against her from her separate estate and not otherwise;" and the same provision is found in section 307 of the present Code. So that it is very clear that the construction contended for by the appellant, to wit, that the amendment now under consideration was simply designed to limit the liability of a married woman on her contracts to her separate estate, cannot be the correct one; for such a construction would make the amendment in question wholly unnecessary, as that was the law before.

We are therefore of opinion that the object of the amendment was not to indicate the kind of property which could be made liable for the breach of a married woman's contract, but to limit her right to contract, so that she could only make such contracts as, at the time they were made, related to or concerned her separate property. Hence, before a married woman can be made liable for the breach of a contract alleged to have been made by her, it must be made to appear, either from the inherent nature of the contract or otherwise, that the contract was made in relation to or concerned her separate property. Even if she declares in express terms her intention to bind her separate estate, that alone will not be sufficient to render the contract valid, for the question is as to her power, which is to be determined by the nature of the contract itself, and not as to her intention to bind her separate property. If, therefore a wife should sign a note as surety for her husband, or indeed for any other person, and should declare in the note in express terms her intention to bind her separate estate, that would not make the contract valid as to her unless it was made to appear that the contract, though executed by her as surety, was designed to benefit her separate property or in some other way related to or concerned such property.

We have not deemed it necessary to go into a consideration of the very numerous cases elsewhere upon questions similar to the one now before us; for while the statutes of the various States are somewhat like our own, yet they differ sometimes very materially in their phraseology, and in the very great conflict of authority abroad we have thought it more likely that we would reach a correct solution of the question by confining our attention to the terms of our own statutes, viewed in the light of our own past legislation and adjudications.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr Justice MCGOWAN. I concur in the result. As the purpose of the act manifestly was to confer upon a married woman powers beyond what she possessed before, I cannot suppose that by the insertion of the words, "as to her separate estate," it was intended to defeat that object entirely as to contracts. The same act, in conformity to the constitution, confers the powers "to bequeath, devise, and convey her separate estate in the same manner and to the same extent as if she were unmarried," and in order to harmonize the different provisions I incline to think that the intention of the amendment was to limit the power of a married woman to such contracts as express an intention to bind *her separate property—such as are made with express reference to—that is to say, "as to her separate property."

Judgment affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Abbeville, June, 1885. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

March 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. In December, 1874, one Jacob Kurz, under a contract to purchase from one Joel S. Perrin, went into possession of a lot of land, containing twenty acres, more or less, known as the Westfield lot. The purchase money not having been paid, the administrator of Perrin, who in the meantime had *died, on July 29, 1878, commenced an action against Kurz to enforce compliance with the terms of said contract or for a sale of the premises, and on September 13, 1878, obtained judgment for the amount due on the purchase money, and "that the premises described in the complaint, as hereinafter set forth, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to raise the amount reported to be due to the plaintiff for principal, interest, and costs, be sold with due regard to the interests of the parties concerned." No steps appear to have been taken to enforce this judgment, for the reason probably that payments were made from time to time thereon, leaving a balance due thereon of eight hundred dollars, on March 14, 1882, when the said judgment was assigned to Wm. H. Parker and W. C. McGowan.

On January 31, 1885, Jacob Kurz died intestate, leaving a widow, the appellant herein, and an infant son living with her in the dwelling house on said lot of land. On March 2, 1885, the widow filed her petition before the master praying that a homestead be assigned to her out of said lot, as well as the exemption provided by law out of the personal property of which intestate died possessed. On the same day the master published the usual notice to creditors and others interested of this application for homestead, and on March 18, 1885, W. H. Parker and W. C. McGowan filed with the master a notice of the judgment which had been assigned to them as above stated, in which they "insist that homestead in the said real estate be not set off to C. E. Kurz, petitioner, absolutely, but subject to the rights under the decree in the above stated cause of the undersigned creditors in the event that there be not sufficient proceeds from said property, outside of the homestead, to pay the balance of said decree and costs." On April 4, 1885, the master granted an order appointing appraisers to lay off the homestead subject to the rights of said Parker and McGowan, in which, amongst other things, he recites that no objection to the same was filed in his office except the notice of Parker and McGowan above referred to.

On April 4, 1885, the appraisers made their return, allotting to the petitioner out of said Westfield lot as her homestead "the dwelling house in which she resides and in which Jacob Kurz resided at his death," together with the land on which it stood *and adjoined, supposed to contain not exceeding one and one-half acres, describing the same by metes and bounds; and also set off to her personal property to the amount of five hundred dollars. On April 16, 1885, exceptions to the assignment of the homestead proper were filed by two judgment creditors of the intestate, Jacob Kurz, one of the judgments having been entered on September 6, 1878, and the other on June 6, 1879, substantially upon the grounds: 1st. That the petitioner is not entitled to homestead in the premises. 2d. That if she is, the same is first liable to the judgment of Parker and McGowan before any portion of the land outside of that assigned to her as homestead can be applied to said judgment.

On April 14, 1885, the administrator of Jacob Kurz filed a creditors' bill, to which the widow and her infant son as well as the judgment and other creditors of Jacob Kurz are parties, in which, amongst other things, the administrator asked that all of the real estate of said Kurz except that assigned to the widow as homestead be sold to pay debts in aid of the personality, and an order of sale was granted as prayed for; and it is admitted that since the hearing of the exceptions to the assignment of homestead all of the real estate except that portion assigned to the widow as her homestead has been sold by the master, under said order, for an amount more than sufficient to pay the balance due on the judgment held by Parker and McGowan.

The case was heard by Judge Cothran, who rendered a decree holding that the general creditors had an equity to force the holders of the judgment for the unpaid purchase money first to exhaust the homestead before they could go upon the land outside of it, and that the objection urged by the petitioner, that the creditors should have filed their exceptions before the master to the issuing of the order appointing appraisers to lay off the homestead, and this not having been done the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction except to order a new appraisement, could not be sustained. He therefore rendered judgment confirming the return of the appraisers so far as the exemption of personal property was concerned, no objection having been made thereto, but set aside so much as assigned the homestead in the real estate, and dismissed the petition with costs.

*From this judgment the petitioner appealed upon the several grounds set out in the "Case," which, however, need not be set out here as they make substantially but four questions: 1st. As to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court to determine the right to homestead in the absence of any exceptions before the master within the period designated for publication of the notice of the application. 2d. Whether the petitioner is entitled to homestead in the premises in question as against the general creditors. 3d. Whether the general creditors can compel the holders of the judgment for the unpaid purchase money first to exhaust the homestead. 4th. Whether there was error in dismissing the petition with costs.

As to the first question raised by the appeal, we agree with the Circuit Judge. The act (Gen. Stat., § 2002) does not provide for or require the filing of any exceptions until after the return of the appraisers appointed to lay off the homestead, and the exceptions having been filed in due time after such return was made, we see no reason why the Circuit Court could not proceed to adjudge the questions raised by the exceptions.

As to the second question, we think it is determined by the recent decision of this court in the case of Munro v. Jeter, ante, p. 29. While a homestead in a case like this cannot be claimed in land held under a contract to purchase until the purchase money has been fully paid, yet after it has been paid there is no obstacle in the way of such claim, even though the judgment debtor may not have acquired a formal legal title.

As to the third question, we cannot agree with the Circuit Judge in his application to this case of the well settled principle that where "there are two creditors of a common debtor, one of whom has access to two funds or sources of payment and the other has access to only one, the latter has an equity to require the former first to exhaust the fund which is not common to both of them." On the contrary, we do not think this was a case of two funds or sources of payment. Laying out of view the personal property, as to which there is no question in this case, there was but one fund or source of payment—the Westfield lot—to no part of which could the general creditors resort for payment of their claims until after the purchase money was fully paid. *They had no lien upon it and could not subject it to the payment of their debts by any proceeding until the judgment for the purchase money was fully satisfied, for until then it could not be known with any certainty whether the whole or a part only would be necessary for that purpose. It was an undivided lot, and by the very terms of the judgment for the purchase money only so much thereof was directed to be sold "as may be sufficient to raise the amount reported to be due to the plaintiff for principal, interest, and costs, * * * with due regard to the interests of the parties concerned." These latter words were doubtless inserted for the express purpose of preserving the dwelling house for the family of the debtor.

The general creditors having no lien upon this lot, and no means of subjecting it to the payment of their debts until after the purchase money was paid, and the judgment for the purchase money containing in effect a direction that the portion of the lot outside of what might be claimed as a homestead should be first sold, we do not see how it can be said that this was a case where there were two funds or sources of payment, to both of which the purchase money creditors could resort for payment of their debts, while the general creditors could only resort to one; for, even assuming for the sake of argument that there were two funds, the general creditors, as we have seen, could resort to neither until the purchase money creditors were satisfied and were out of the way—in which event one of the conditions of the rule invoked by the Circuit Judge would be absent, and the rule could not be applied.

This case differs materially from the case of Savings Bank v. Harbin (18 S. C., 425), relied on by the Circuit Judge. There the debtor had two separate and distinct pieces of property, one called the Bolt tract and the other the home tract, and were so treated by him in his dealings with his creditors. The senior mortgage covered both tracts, the next mortgage covered the Bolt tract only, then followed an intermediate judgment, which of course was a general lien on all his real estate liable to levy and sale, subject though to the liens of the antecedent mortgages, then there was a mortgage on both of said tracts, and finally there was another judgment having a general lien on all the real estate liable to levy and sale, subject of course to all antecedent liens. So that in that case there were clearly two funds or sources of payment to which all of the creditors could at the same time resort for payment of their debts, except that the judgment creditors could not resort to so much of the home tract as might be assigned to the debtor as a homestead, and the second mortgage could only resort to the Bolt tract after exhausting a note held as collateral security. The legal title to all of the real estate was in the debtor, and it could therefore be reached directly by his creditors. Here, however, there were not two funds or sources of payment, but only one, the Westfield lot, to which the debtor did not have the legal title, and which could not be reached by his general creditors until the claim for the purchase money was extinguished. The general creditors never did or could have access to this property for the payment of their debts until the purchase money is paid, and the moment that is done there are then no longer two creditors, one of whom has access to two funds and the other to one of those funds only, and the rule relied upon cannot apply.

We think, therefore, that there was error in holding that the general creditors have an equity to force the purchase money creditors to resort first to the homestead for payment of the balance due on their judgment; but, on the contrary, are of opinion that such balance should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of that portion of the lot outside of the portion assigned to the widow as her homestead, and that the balance of such proceeds, if any, be applied in due course of administration.

This view renders it unnecessary to consider the fourth question raised by the appeal, as the judgment below will be reversed, except in so far as it confirms the returns as to the personal property.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, except in so far as it confirms the return of the commissioners as to the personal property, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for the purpose of carrying out the views herein indicated.

*SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN.

[Pleading ⇨248.]

Plaintiff sued defendant for assault and slander, and defendant demurred for improper joinder of actions. Within twenty days thereafter, plaintiff served an amended complaint for assault and battery, as a substitute for the first complaint, and served a new summons and complaint for slander. Held—

1. That the plaintiff had a right to serve his amended complaint, and that the additional allegation of battery, even if a new cause of action, would not justify a dismissal of the complaint, which was good at least as to the assault.

That the defence of another action pending interposed in the slander suit could not avail unless proved; but there was no other action for slander then pending, as the substituted complaint was only for assault and battery.

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, April, 1885.
Action by Joseph W. Sullivan against Hewlett Sullivan. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Perry & Heyward, for appellant.
Mr. Geo. Westmoreland, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These cases were heard together. They were originally commenced as one with a "complaint for assault and for slander." The defendant demurred upon the ground that the causes of action were improperly united, and within twenty days after service of the demurrer the plaintiff voluntarily amended his complaint by dividing the action. On the new and separate complaint for "assault," which was regularly served on the defendant, there was endorsed a notice, "that the plaintiff serves the above complaint as a substitute by way of amendment to the complaint heretofore served upon you on the 24th day of December, 1884." This substitute contained allegations of a battery which did not appear in the original complaint, and the defendant moved to strike out the whole complaint, upon the ground that, being a new cause of action, it could not be set up in an amended pleading. The Circuit Judge refused the motion, and the appeal from that order is the first case stated.

A new and separate action was also brought and regularly served "for slander," to which the defendant answered with a general denial, and also setting up the defence, that "another action was pending for the same cause." When the case was reached on the calendar, the defendant's counsel moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground taken in his answer, that there was another action for the same cause pending. It does not appear that the original complaint, which had been divided, was before the court, or that there was any evidence upon the subject. The Circuit Judge also refused this motion, and the appeal from that order is the other case stated.

The defendant appeals, alleging error of law in refusing the motion in both the cases stated.

First. The demurrer to the original cause of action was under the fifth subdivision of section 165 of the Code, alleging that several causes of action were improperly united. By that section, it is provided that if the court sustains such a demurrer, it may, in its discretion, require the action to be divided into as many actions as may be thought necessary to their proper determination. In that case, the original action here would have been divided into two—one for "assault," and the other for "slander." The plaintiff, however, did not wait for the order of court sustaining the demurrer, but acquiesced in its correctness, and within twenty days, and before the period for answering it had expired, he chose to avail himself of the provision which allows as a matter of course voluntary amendments. This he did by dividing the original complaint, as the court hearing it would have done, which, we take it, he had the right to do, as it was not made to appear that it was done for delay, that being the only limit to the right by the terms of the section.

But it seems that in the action for "assault," the occasion was taken to add allegations also of a battery, which did not appear in the original complaint, and for that reason the defendant moved to strike out the whole complaint. The section (193) of the Code, *which, under certain conditions, allows voluntary amendments, does not in terms fix the character of the amendments thus allowed. But section 194, as to amendments by the court, does seem to indicate that under the form of amendment a wholly different cause of action cannot be substituted in place of the one which the party attempted to set up in the original pleading. See Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C., 316. But if it be assumed (as to which it is unnecessary to express any opinion here), that the same rule should apply to voluntary amendments as matter of course, necessarily made in the first stages of a case, we cannot say that an amended complaint, charging "assault and battery," was wholly different from one charging "assault" alone. To a certain extent it was the same, and in any view the amended complaint was good at least as to the assault; and, therefore, the Circuit Judge committed no error of law in refusing a motion to strike out and dismiss the whole complaint.

Second, as to the other case. The allegation in the answer of the defendant, that there was a former suit pending for the same cause of action, was, in effect, a plea of new matter, which, in the first place, could have no force until it was proved as new matter. There was no proof of the fact alleged, and, as we think, could not have been; for after the division of the original action, there was no other suit pending "for slander," of which the defendant was fully informed, by the written notice in the first case, that said complaint was served upon him "as a substitute by way of amendment to the complaint heretofore served on him December 24, 1884."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases stated in the caption, be affirmed.

PUDIGON v. GOBLET.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨ 719.]

Where an appeal is taken, but there are no grounds of error alleged, the appeal is not entitled to a hearing. This rule applied to this case, as the appeal was from an order refusing defendant's motion to vacate a judgment by default, for delay in docketing the cause, when such *delay was a courtesy extended at his own request, and where there was no claim of a bona fide defence.

[2. Trial ⚡9.]

Under the present practice, a plaintiff is not out of court for failing to docket the cause within a year and a day, as the defendant has a right to docket. Hagood v. Riley, 21 S. C., 143.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Chas. E. Carrere, for appellant.
Messrs. Smythe & Lee, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. On August 2, 1880, Francis Goblet duly filed his summons and complaint against Louis Pudigon to recover the amount due on certain notes bearing date July 1, 1876, set forth in the complaint. On August 4, 1880, the summons and complaint were duly served personally on Louis Pudigon, and on June 20, 1882, judgment by default in favor of the respondent against the appellant was duly entered. On May 19, 1885, a notice was served on the attorneys for Goblet that "on an affidavit, a copy of which is herewith annexed, and on the records of the court in this cause, and on the minutes and calendars of the court," a motion would be made to set aside said judgment and all subsequent proceedings therein; but upon what grounds, is not stated in the notice. The affidavit annexed was that of appellant to the effect that he was served with the summons and complaint on August 4, 1880, and that said case was not placed on the calendar of the court for trial until the June term of the court, 1882.

In behalf of the respondent, the affidavit of his attorney was submitted, to the effect that a few days after the service of the summons and complaint, he was notified by Messrs. Walker & Bacot that they had been retained as attorneys of the appellant, and requested an extension of time to answer, which request was acceded to by plaintiff's (respondent herein) attorney; that on October 25, 1880, defendant requested Messrs. Walker & Bacot to file the answer, and receiving no reply from them, he again *addressed a similar request to those gentlemen on November 19, 1880; that no answer was put in, and, on the contrary, further extension of time was asked for and obtained, pending frequent conferences between the counsel of the parties as to some settlement of the case; that no adjustment having been effected, deponent, on February 11, 1882, again wrote to the attorneys for appellant to put in their answer; that no answer having still been put in, deponent, on May 23, 1882, served upon the attorneys for appellant formal notice that on the first day of the ensuing term of the court, judgment by default would be asked, and in pursuance of such notice judgment was asked for and obtained as above stated. Deponent further stated that the delay in taking judgment arose solely from the action of the defendant, through his attorneys, in asking continued extensions of time to answer, which were granted as a favor and a courtesy to the defendant and his attorneys.

It is proper to state here that this motion to set aside the judgment was not made by Messrs. Walker & Bacot, but by another attorney, who does not seem to have had any previous connection with the case.

The motion was heard by Judge Pressley, and refused upon the ground that, while the rule is "that a case at law is out of court, if no step has been taken therein for a year and a day," yet he considered what had passed between the attorneys as sufficient to keep the case in court. From this judgment or order Francis Goblet appeals, in general terms, without stating any ground whatever, and without filing any exceptions designating any specific error in the order appealed from. This of itself is sufficient to warrant us in dismissing this appeal under the well settled rule of this court, and this certainly is a case very appropriate for the application of the rule. No excuse for, or explanation of, the delay occasioned by the courtesy extended to his attorneys is even suggested by the appellant, and it is not even intimated that he has a bona fide defence to the action in which the judgment he is seeking to set aside was recovered. There is nothing whatever in the case, as presented to us, calling for or even warranting any indulgence from the court, and, on the con*trary, everything seems to call for the strictest application of the rules.

But to avoid any misapprehension as to an important matter of practice, we may add that we do not think the appeal could be sustained, even if it had been taken in the most formal manner. The complaint was filed in due time, and the only ground of objection seems to be that the case was not docketed within a year and a day after service of the summons and complaint. The code provides that if the plaintiff fails to docket his case within the prescribed time, and the defendant desires that the case shall proceed, he may have it docketed and thus avoid any delay, but we do not understand that there is any provision of the code which declares that a failure to docket a case within the prescribed time puts the party out of court, and the rule, under the old practice, in reference to this matter, does not apply to the practice under the code. Hagood v. Riley, 21 S. C., 143.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WHALEY v. STEVENS.

[1. Judgment \S 585.]

A judgment dismissing a complaint, which alleged the obstruction of a road over which plaintiff had a right of way in gross, for lack of evidence to sustain a right of way in gross, is not an adjudication that will defeat a second action alleging the obstruction of this same road over which plaintiff had a right of way appurtenant or appurtenant.

[2. Judgment \S 570.]

A judgment dismissing a complaint for failure of evidence to sustain one of its material allegations, is a judgment of non-suit, which will not support a plea of res judicata.

Messrs. Inglesby & Miller, for appellant.
Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. In 1882 the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for obstructing his right of way and obtained a verdict. Upon appeal, this court held that the plaintiff, having alleged in his complaint that he was entitled to a right of way in gross and not a right of way appurtenant or appurtenant to his land, and there being confessedly no evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way in gross, he could not recover, even though he may have proved that he was entitled to a right of way appurtenant or appurtenant to his land described in the complaint, and that, as there were essential and marked distinctions between the two kinds of rights, the violation of these rights present different and distinct causes of action, which would have to be asserted and established by different and distinct allegations and proofs, the plaintiff's application for leave to amend could not be granted under the provisions of the code. Judgment was therefore rendered, dismissing the complaint. See 21 S. C., 221, for a more full statement of the former case.

In 1884 the present action was commenced, and the plaintiff, in his complaint, after alleging that he is the owner of a plantation on John's Island known as "Caneslatch" plantation, as the devisee of his father, the late Wm. S. Whaley, proceeds to allege: "That the said Wm. S. Whaley, during his life-time, and the said plaintiff, since the death of his said father, had a right of way, by prescription, on foot and with horses, mules, carts, and carriages and other vehicles, by means of a road beginning on the said Caneslatch plantation and appurtenant and appendant thereto, and leading from the dwelling house on said plantation, in an eastwardly direction, through land of the said plantation and over the piece of land known as the three hundred acres, originally belonging to the adjoining Seven Oaks plantation, but afterwards purchased by the said William S. Whaley, the father of the plaintiff, from the defendant, William S. Stevens, and now the property of the said plaintiff, out to and across the public road leading to John's Island Ferry, through, over, and upon the adjoining land of the said defendant, known as the Seven Oaks plantation, in a continued eastwardly direction to a creek leading into Stono River, which said creek plaintiff alleges, as advised, is a public

"highway, to wit, a navigable stream." &c.; and then alleges that defendant had obstructed said way.

The defendant pleaded res adjudicata and a general denial. The Circuit Judge sustained the plea of res adjudicata, and rendered judgment dismissing the complaint. From this judgment plaintiff appeals, and the sole question presented is whether the plea was properly sustained.

It is very manifest that the allegations in the complaints filed in the two actions were essentially different, and, as we think, it is equally manifest that the issues presented in the two actions were entirely different. It is true that the general object in both of the actions was the same—that is, to obtain damages for the same obstruction of what appears from the evidence to be substantially the same road, and an order of injunction to restrain defendant from continuing said obstruction. But to obtain the relief sought by the plaintiff, he was bound to establish the affirmative of two issues: 1st, whether he was entitled to a right of way, as alleged in his complaint; 2d, whether defendant had obstructed said way. Now, conceding that the second issue was the same in both of the cases, the first issue was certainly not. For, as this court held in the former case, the sole issue presented was whether the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way in gross over the land of defendant, while the issue presented in the present action is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a right of way appurtenant or appurtenant to his plantation known as "Caneslateh." As was held in the former case, "These two rights differ substantially, not in form merely, but in their nature and results. The violation of these rights present different and distinct causes of action, which would have to be asserted and established by different and distinct allegations and proofs;" and it was for this reason that leave to amend was refused. It follows, therefore, that it has already been adjudged that the causes of action in the two cases are not the same, and certainly a judgment obtained on one cause of action cannot be pleaded as res adjudicata to an action upon another cause of action; for in such a case one of the identities, "identity in the cause of action," necessary to a successful maintenance of such a plea, would be lacking, and *hence the plea could not be sustained. Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C., 576.

It seems to be supposed that the cause of action in both of the cases was the defendant's obstruction of the road, and, therefore, that it was the same in both cases. But this was only one of the elements going to make up the plaintiff's cause of action. As is said in Pomeroy on Remedies, section 519, pages 554-5: "Every action is based upon some primary right held by the plaintiff, and upon a duty resting upon the defendant corresponding to such right. By means of a wrongful act or omission of the defendant, this primary right and this duty are invaded and broken, and there immediately arises from the breach a new remedial right of the plaintiff, and a new remedial duty of the defendant. Finally, such remedial right and duty are consummated and satisfied by the remedy, which is obtained through means of the action, and which is its object. Now, it is very plain that, using the words according to their natural import and according to their technical legal import, the 'cause of action' is what gives rise to the remedial right, or the right of remedy, which is evidently the same as the term, 'right of action,' frequently used by judges and text-writers. This remedial right, or right of action, does not arise from the wrongful act or omission of the defendant, the delict, alone, nor from the plaintiff's primary right, and the defendant's corresponding primary duty alone, but from these two elements taken together. The 'cause of action,' therefore, must always consist of two factors, (1) the plaintiff's primary right and the defendant's corresponding primary duty, whatever be the subject to which they relate—person, character, property, or contract; and (2) the delict, or wrongful act or omission of the defendant, by which the primary right and duty have been violated," &c.

From this, it follows that the wrongful act of the defendant (if, indeed, it was wrongful), in obstructing the road in question, did not constitute the cause of action in either case, but would be only one of the elements of such cause in both cases, and could only in combination with the other necessary element, the plaintiff's primary right, constitute a cause of action; and as the nature of the plaintiff's right, as alleged in the first case, was essentially different from that alleged in the present action, it would seem to *follow that the causes of action in the two cases could not be the same.

But, in addition to this, we think the judgment in the former case was nothing more than a judgment of non-suit for failure of evidence to establish one of the material allegations of the complaint; and it certainly cannot be pretended that such a judgment, on such a ground, would support a plea of res adjudicata. The allegation being, as the court held, that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way in gross merely, and there being manifestly no evidence to support such an allegation, judgment necessarily followed that the complaint should be dismissed.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

GRAYDON v. STOKES.

[1. Work and Labor ⇨5.]

An attorney at law has a right to be paid for professional services rendered another attorney; where there is no express contract, the law will imply one. The fact that attorneys sometimes from courtesy render services gratuitously to their brother attorneys does not affect this legal right.

2. An exception unsupported by any evidence in the case, not sustained.

[3. Attorney and Client ⇨167.]

Whether the services were rendered, and their value, were matters of fact decided by the jury, and no appeal lies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. ⇨167.]

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, March, 1885. The opinion states the case.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Mr. G. G. Wells, contra.

March 27, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This action was brought by Ellis G. Graydon, of the Abbeville bar, against the defendant, who is also an attorney at law of Greenville, upon an open account of $400 for professional services rendered the defendant at Greenville, which was credited with $17.50 and the plaintiff's hotel bills at Greenville. The defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint in the manner and form stated, and also that any account had ever been presented for payment. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that there was any contract, express or implied, that any fee was to be paid for his services, beyond what might be given gratuitously by the defendant; and according to plaintiff's own testimony it appeared that he was in partnership with Mr. Armstead Burt, and the action was not brought in the name of Burt & Graydon, but in the name of Ellis G. Graydon alone, and must fail.

The presiding judge refused the motion, saying: "If the court understands the testimony of Mr. Graydon, such as Mr. Burt should earn outside the county (of Abbeville) was his, and such as Mr. Graydon gets outside the county is his; of course, they are not attorneys outside of the county, and when services are rendered an attorney has to be paid for it." The plaintiff had a verdict for $382.50. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground of subsequently discovered evidence, which was refused, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

I. "It is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in not granting a non-suit, inasmuch as the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses showed that the action should have been brought, if at all, in the name of Burt & Graydon, and not in the name of Graydon alone.

II. "Because his honor erred in not granting a new trial, when the affidavit of defendant showed that evidence had been discovered since the trial of the cause which made it clear that Ellis G. Graydon had no right to sue the defendant, and that only Burt & Graydon, or the survivor, should, under the circumstances, have brought the action.

III. "Because his honor erred in not granting a new trial upon the minutes of the court.

IV. "Because his honor erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint, ruling that the law and custom of South Carolina permitted one attorney at law to sue his brother attorney for services rendered in the line of his profession as attorney and counsellor.

V. "Because his honor erred in ruling that the testimony of defendant's witness, tending to show that the services of plaintiff's attorney were of little actual value, was incompetent.

VI. "Because the verdict was contrary to law and the testimony, the records in the cases upon which the complaint was based conflicting with and contradicting the testimony of plaintiff and one of plaintiff's witnesses.

VII. "Because the verdict was excessive in amount, being for $382.50, when it should not have been for more than $50, excluding what had been voluntarily contributed to plaintiff by defendant.

VIII. "Because his honor erred in not calling the attention of the jury to the letter of plaintiff to defendant, which was an implied admission that there was no cause of action in the claim of plaintiff.

IX. "Because his honor erred in not charging the jury that they should weigh very carefully and cautiously the testimony of C. M. Furman and T. Q. Donaldson, inasmuch as their prejudices might unconsciously bias their judgment, the former having testified that he did not admire the defendant, and the latter that he would not make a companion of him.

X. "Because the jury were totally incompetent to grapple with the nice points of law and professional etiquette and custom involved in the case, and blinded by prejudice and argument of counsel. Hence the defendant appeals and asks for reversal or a new trial."

We know of no principle which would exclude the professional services of an attorney from the benefit of the general rule, that services rendered by one at the instance of another should be paid for at their true value, and if there is no express contract to that effect, the law will imply one. Professional services are no less useful than others, whether we regard the preparation necessary to fit one to render them, the importance of the matters with which they are generally concerned, or their real value and importance to those who may engage them. Certainly since the cases of Duncan v. Breithaupt and Huger, as the Executors of Yancey, and William Harper v. C. E. Williamson, decided in 1821, and reported in 1 McCord, 149 and 156, it has been settled in this State, "that an attorney may rightfully and legitimately charge, by way of counsel fee, a sum proportioned to the value of the services, and which a jury of the country, upon evidence before them, are competent to ascertain and decide upon." This proceeds upon the principle above stated, that where one employs another to render him certain services, and the services are rendered, the law implies a contract on the part of the employer to pay their value.

While there does exist in certain localities at least a "courtesy" among gentlemen of the bar not to charge each other, but when requested by a brother lawyer to render him services in the line of their profession without fee or reward, yet where such "courtesy" exists, it does not touch the legal rights of the parties. The very fact that it is called a courtesy indicates that making no charge is exceptional, and that the general rule is to charge. Besides, even where such courtesy is generally practised, we have no doubt that there are certain well grounded exceptions to the rule, and certainly the moment the parties, from any cause whatever, stand upon their rights, there can be no such thing as courtesy in the case.

As to the exceptions which complain that the action was improperly brought in the name alone of Ellis G. Graydon, when it should have been in the name of "Burt & Graydon," partners in the practice of the law. The presiding Judge says that Mr. Graydon, the plaintiff, proved that he and Mr. Burt were partners in the practice of the law in and for Abbeville County alone; that each was authorized to practice for himself outside of the County of Abbeville, and of course to receive individually the income from such practice on the Circuit. We hear nothing in the case of the employment of Burt & Graydon, or of Mr. Burt, but only of the plaintiff, Mr. Graydon.

Whether the services rendered were valuable, and to what extent, was of course left to the jury, and there is no appeal from their verdict fixing the amount.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*WEBB v. CHISOLM.

[1. Specific Performance ¶95.]

A purchaser cannot be compelled to take a doubtful title, but the court acts on moral certainty, and a purchaser will not be permitted to object to a title on account of a bare possibility. Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq., 222, recognised and followed.

When an executrix and life tenant had full power under the will to sell the land devised and make titles therefor, provided the proceeds "be reinvested in bank or other stocks or other property," her deed made under this power carried a good title, and it was not the duty of the purchaser to see to the proper application of the purchase money, in the sense that a misapplication of the same could defeat his title. The same principle applied to another power in this case.

But the purchaser having given his bond and mortgage for the purchase money, and all of the adult remaindermen, except two, having released their interest therein to him, one of those two being largely indebted to the purchaser, and the other not heard from in twelve years, and the only infant having signed this release and not complained for six years after his majority—there was not any misapplication of the purchase money.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885.
The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. J. Bachman Chisolm, for appellant.
Messrs. Rutledge & Young, contra.

March 27, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On February 4, 1885, William L. Webb and William B. Chisolm entered into a written agreement by which the said Webb agreed to sell to the said Chisolm a lot of land in the city of Charleston, described in the complaint, for $2,000, to be paid one-fourth cash, and the remainder in two equal successive annual instalments, secured by a mortgage of the premises sold. Afterwards the purchaser,

Chisolm, declined *to pay the purchase money, on the ground that the said Webb could not make good titles to the same. Whereupon this action was brought by Webb for specific performance of the agreement, and the following is an agreed statement of the facts:

The lot in question was a part of a tract of land formerly the property of Daniel Cannon Webb, the father of the plaintiff, who died in 1850, leaving a will of which his widow, Eliza Ann Webb, was the sole qualified executrix. The tract of land, of which the lot in question was a part, passed under the residuary clause of his will, which declares, "that the whole of the residue of my estate, both real and personal, I give to my beloved wife, Eliza Ann Webb, for her natural life, and after her death I give the same to my beloved children, share and share alike. * * * But should my beloved wife (in whose prudence and good judgment I have for forty-three years placed implicit confidence) deem it expedient for her comfort or convenience, or the interest of herself and family, to sell any part of my estate, she is hereby authorized to make such sale in public or private, and to make good and sufficient titles for the same; provided, however, that the moneys arising from such sale be reinvested in bank or other stocks or other property, to be held by her during her life as aforesaid, and to go to my children as aforesaid at her death."

The children of the testator were John Webb, Thomas L. Webb, Martha C. Johnstone, and William L. Webb. On June 27, 1867, Mrs. Eliza A. Webb, the life-tenant with a power of sale, after reciting the terms of the power, and expressly in pursuance thereof, and in consideration of $9,000, sold and conveyed the aforesaid tract of land, of which the lot in question was a part, to her son, W. L. Webb, as trustee for his wife, Susan W. Webb and children. As to the terms of this conveyance we will speak more particularly hereafter. Contemporaneous with the execution of this deed to William L., as trustee, he executed a mortgage of the premises to secure his bond ($9,000) for the purchase money. In November, 1870, Mrs. Webb, the mortgagee, assigned the bond and mortgage "for value" to R. H. McDowell, and on February 12, 1885, he entered on the mortgage satisfaction as follows: "The bond secured by this mortgage *having been paid in full, I hereby declare said bond and mortgage forever satisfied and discharged."

By deed of July 23, 1873, the other devisees of the father, D. C. Webb, in consideration of moneys due by them to William L. Webb, the purchaser, released to him their interest in the bond and mortgage. This deed was duly executed by the widow and all the children of John Webb¹ and by the husband and all the children of Martha W. C. Johnstone (born Webb), and duly probated, except that the signature of F. W. Johnstone, son of Martha, although signed in the presence of two witnesses, was not proved by either of them. But on August 13, 1873, the said F. W. Johnstone went before James M. Watson, a notary public, in Wilmington, Delaware, "duly commissioned," and acknowledged the signature to the said release to be his free act and deed, and desired that it should be put on record. George² and Charles Webb, children of John Webb, deceased, were not of age in 1873; Charles executed the release when a minor for valuable consideration, and came of age in 1879, and makes no objection. Thomas L. Webb mortgaged his interest to his brother, Wm. L.

² George duly executed a release after he came of age. No question was made about George's interest.—REPORTER.

Webb, in July, 1871, for "a sum greatly in excess of his interest in the property," left the State unmarried, and has not been heard from since 1874, and is considered by his family dead.

As before intimated, the deed of Mrs. Eliza A. Webb to her son, William L. Webb, in execution of the power of sale in the will of her husband, D. C. Webb, was in trust for his wife, Susan W. Webb, and children, and itself contained another power of sale on his part. The trusts are long and somewhat complicated, and may be found in the brief. Among other things, the power is given to W. L. Webb to dispose of the land by will, substantially for his wife during her life, and after her death for his chil*dren, absolutely, who may be living at the time of her death. The children are two daughters, both of age. In addition, the trust deed to William L. contained a power of sale in the following words: "Provided always, furthermore, that the said W. L. Webb shall, from time to time, and at all times, have full power to sell, barter, exchange, alien, or otherwise dispose of all and singular the aforesaid property, or any other property representing the same: Provided, however, that the proceeds of such sale, barter, exchange, alienation, or other disposition, shall be reinvested in such securities, real or personal, or both, as to the said trustee shall seem fit; and held by him, subject to the trusts hereinbefore declared of and concerning the same; and should the said property not consist in a house, whereby a house can actually be provided as aforesaid, then the annual proceeds arising therefrom shall be applied in such a way as substantially, and as near as possible, to carry out the above said trusts, by applying the annual proceeds thereof to such as would be entitled to a home in any house representing the said property as aforesaid." In February, 1883, William L. Webb, trustee, his wife and two daughters, under this power mortgaged the land to Gourdin, Matthiessen & Co., which mortgage was substituted by another in July, 1884, to secure said Gourdin, Matthiessen & Co. against certain endorsements made by them for Mr. W. L. Webb, but the lien of this mortgage has been lifted from so much of the land as the lot bargained to be sold as aforesaid to Chisolm. The deed tendered to Chisolm by W. L. Webb, trustee, was also executed under this power.

The cause came on to be heard by Judge Pressley, who decreed "that the defendant do comply with his purchase and accept the deed tendered to him in compliance with the contract of sale and purchase, and that each party pay his own costs."

From this decree, the defendant appeals upon the following grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in holding that William L. Webb, trustee, 'has sufficient interest in the land to enable him to give good title to the portion sold to defendant'; whereas his honor should have held that the plaintiff did not have a good marketable and unencumbered title to the premises. II. Because his honor erred in ordering the defendant to comply with his *purchase, and accept the deed tendered to him in compliance with the contract of sale and purchase. III. Because his honor erred in ordering 'that each party pay his own costs'; whereas he should have ordered that plaintiff pay all the costs."

In considering the question as to whether agreements for the sale and purchase of lands shall be enforced by the order of the court, the following rule seems to have been adopted: "A purchaser cannot be compelled to take a doubtful title. But on this subject the court acts on moral certainty, and a purchaser will not be permitted to object to a title on account of a bare possibility." Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq., 222, and authorities there cited. Taking this rule as our guide, let us see how this case stands. First, as to the devisees under the will of D. C. Webb. This land was given to the widow, Eliza A., for life with limitation over to his children, who were four in number, viz., John, Thomas L., Martha C. Johnstone, and William L. Webb. The life tenant was also executrix, and had, under the will, a very full power "to sell in public or private, and to make good and sufficient title for the same." &c., provided that the moneys arising from said sale be invested in stocks or property upon the same trusts. Under this power Mrs. Webb sold and conveyed the land to her son, William L. Webb, as trustee, and received the purchase money.

We cannot doubt that her conveyance carried the legal title to William L. Webb, and that it was not his duty to look after the proper application of the purchase money, in the sense that a misapplication of the same could defeat his title. See Lining v. Peyton, 2 Desaus., 378, and notes; Spencer v. Bank, Bail. Eq., 472; Redheimer v. Pylon, Speers Eq., 140, and Jones v. Hudson, 23 S. C., 494. But if this were not so, and the title of William L. Webb from his mother depended upon the proper application of the purchase money, we think it appears to a moral certainty that there was no misapplication as to the devisees of D. C. Webb. The parties themselves or their representatives have in effect admitted its proper application. In 1873, all the remaindermen (with the exception hereafter stated), "in consideration of moneys advanced and paid to them"

It is said, however, that the signature of F. W. Johnstone, one of the children of Martha, was never formally proved by the affidavit of the subscribing witnesses. There is nothing in that. It is not denied that he signed it, and went before a notary public in the State of Delaware and declared that it was his act and deed, and he desired it recorded. The release binds him whether it was recorded or not.

Then it is said Charles, one of the children of John, was a minor when he signed with his family. It appears that it was for more than full consideration, and it was not void but voidable. He came of age in 1879, and has made no claim for his share of the purchase money, and we do not think it at all probable that he will ever claim that there was a misapplication of the purchase money, to the extent of his very small share; and if he does, he will not succeed.

But it is still further objected that Thomas L. did not sign the release. That is true; he was not in the State in 1873, when the release was executed. He was a young man without family, and in 1871 he executed a mortgage to his brother, William L. Webb, of all his interest in his father's estate, for a debt largely in excess of his interest in the property, and then left the country. He has never been heard from since 1874, and is presumed to be dead; but if he is not dead in fact, his mortgage is at least evidence that there was no misapplication of the purchase money to the extent of his share.

Second. Then as to the rights of the wife and two daughters of W. L. Webb under the trusts of the deed from Eliza A. Webb to the said William L., as trustee. That deed carried the legal title to William L. Webb, and also gave him full power to sell; and it was under this power that the agreement was made by him to sell part of the premises to the defendant, William B. Chisolm. We know of no reason why the authorities above cited as to the sale and conveyance of Eliza A. Webb to her son, William L., under the power in her husband's will, should not be applicable to the sale and tender of title by the said William L., under the power in the deed to him from his mother, Eliza A. Webb.

The *children of William L. Webb are of full age. If William L. Webb, acting under the said power, and with the consent of the cestuis que trust, had the right to execute a valid mortgage to Gourdin, Matthiessen & Co., we think he may certainly make a valid sale and conveyance to the defendant, Chisolm. We can not see that there is anything in the view suggested that said mortgage was executed before formal satisfaction was entered on the original mortgage given by William L. Webb to his mother. That mortgage, as we have seen, is now undoubtedly satisfied, and that of Gourdin, Matthiessen & Co. has been released to the extent of the lot now in question. We agree with the Circuit Judge, that the deed tendered to the dependant, Chisolm, carried a good marketable title.

As to the third exception, in relation to so much of the decree as required "each party to pay his own costs." This was a suit in equity for specific performance, and it was within the discretion of the Circuit Judge to direct the payment of the costs, "as a part of the relief given on the final disposition of the cause;" and we see no good reason for interfering in the matter.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

ARNOLD v. BAILEY.

SAME v. SAME.

[1. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ◊ 342.]

It is too late for a creditor, after having accepted an assignment and received his pro rata share of the proceeds, to raise any question as to the validity of the assignment itself, growing out of the provision that all creditors who did not accept should be excluded from its benefit, and the surplus, if any, returned to the assignor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. § 1044; Dec. Dig. ◊ 342.]

[2. Accord and Satisfaction ◊ 7.]

The rule, that the acceptance of a part of a debt does not operate as a discharge of the whole, applies only to cases where money is paid. The acceptance in writing of the terms of an assignment, and especially a receipt of a portion of the proceeds of the assigned estate, is a sufficient consideration to support the agreement to accept in full, and neither the written acceptance nor the receipt need be under seal.

creditors and the acceptance of its terms are both in writing, parol evidence is inadmissible in behalf of an accepting creditor, to show that its terms have been modified in his favor.

A debtor having made an assignment, wrote to one of his creditors, saying: "I promised to pay you one-half of the amount due you, and intended to do so. In order to close my business, I made an assignment of all my effects to pay my debts. All my effects are placed in the hands of B. [the assignee], who will settle all my business as soon as it can be done. Your debt will be paid. Your debt will be paid as soon as the money can be made." Held, that this letter was not a promise by the debtor to pay this creditor in full, but referred to an expected payment out of the assigned estate.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, February, 1885.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN having been of counsel in the case, his seat in this court was occupied by Judge FRASER of the Third Circuit.

James Bailey, the defendant, having made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors on January 14, 1867, wrote to Francis Arnold, the plaintiff, one of his creditors, the following letter, as printed in the brief:

Madison C. H., Fla., Feb. 2, 1867.

Mr. Francis Arnold:

I have yours of 19th January. I intended to pay you one-half of the amount due you, and intended to do so. I sold my own property at a sacrifice conditionally to get money to pay you my part of my obligation, parties failed to comply with their engagements. I done all I could do. I could not remain at home any longer. I was compelled to come here to get my hands fixed and arrangements made. Consequently, in order to close my business in South Carolina, I made an assignment of all my effects to pay my debts. All my effects is placed in the hands of Mr. S. P. Boozer, who will settle all my business as soon as it can be done. Your debt will be paid. Remember this is not a debt of my own. I am not the only party. Your debt will be paid as soon as the money can be made. I regret the delay and disappointment to you, but it is not in my power to prevent it.

Your obedient servant,

(Signed) J. Bailey.

Having received this letter, and, as plaintiff alleges, on the faith of it, plaintiff accepted the assignment, and afterwards, in *January, 1870, received his dividends on the two notes held by him against said Bailey. This action was commenced in August, 1883, to recover the balance on these two notes. Verdict was for plaintiff. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lee & Blake, and Ellis G. Graydon, for appellants.

Messrs. Parker & McGowan, contra.

March 29, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. These cases were tried together. The cases come to this court on exceptions to the admission of testimony, and also to the charge of the presiding judge. Defendant appeals. Only so much of the facts will be here stated as will be necessary to explain the questions presented to this court.

On September 19, 1856, Bailey & Co. gave to plaintiff a sealed note, payable at one day, for $1,771.43, and on July 1, 1859, Bailey & Connor gave to plaintiff a sealed note, payable at one day, for $2,800. The defendant, James Bailey, was a member of each of these firms, but in some way, not material to this case, it had been agreed that he was liable for only one-half of these notes. On January 14, 1867, defendant executed under seal an assignment to S. P. Boozer, in trust for his creditors. The plaintiff accepted this assignment in writing on February 12, 1867, within the time limited by the assignment for acceptance of its terms. This acceptance was not under seal. On February 2, 1867, between the date of the assignment and the acceptance by the plaintiff, a letter was written by defendant from Madison, Florida, to plaintiff in reference to this indebtedness. On January 25, 1870, plaintiff gave his receipt to the trustee under the deed of assignment for the sum of $2,238.37. This amount being credited on the two notes, left unpaid on defendant's half of these notes, respectively, the sums of $544.59 and $764.19. It is claimed that this amount and interest is still due by him, and the action is brought on these notes to recover the amounts. The deed of assignment with the schedules, the acceptance by plaintiff, the Florida letter, and the receipt given by plaintiff to the trustee, will be found in the "Case," and will be referred to when necessary.

*It will be observed that the action has been brought on the original notes, and not on any new promise to revive an old debt.

It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider how far the existence of a balance of a debt left unpaid by the proceeds of an assignment like this will be a sufficient consideration for the new promise, or what will be a sufficient promise, or in what way it may be proved. The actions are on the original notes, and by the terms of the assignment it was provided that "every accepting creditor shall receive the sum which may be apportioned to him in full satisfaction of his claim against the said James Bailey." The questions, therefore, raised by the exceptions are these: 1. Was there a valid acceptance by the plaintiff of this assignment? 2. Can parol testimony be admitted to show that there was any condition attached to the acceptance other than those contained in the assignment? 3. Was it the duty of the presiding judge to construe the Florida letter? 4. Does that letter so modify the acceptance as to leave the balance on these notes a valid claim against the defendant? An analysis of the various exceptions will show that these are the material questions raised by this appeal, and the only ones necessary to be considered.

It is too late for the plaintiff, after having accepted the assignment and received his pro rata share of the proceeds, to raise any question as to the validity of the assignment itself, growing out of the provision that all creditors who should not accept should be excluded from its benefits, and the surplus, if any, returned to the debtor, James Bailey. The general rule is that the acceptance of a part of the money due on a note, even if stated to be in full, will not operate as a discharge of the debt unless the receipt or release is under seal. Mills v. Starr, 2 Bail., 360; Eve v. Mosely, 2 Strob., 203; Boulware v. Harrison, 4 Rich. Eq., 317. "If the release is under seal, it implies a consideration, otherwise if it is not under seal and the consideration must be proved." [Corbett v. Lucas & Dotterer] 4 McCord, 323.

It is now the well understood law that the rule that the acceptance of a part does not operate as a discharge of the whole unless under seal, applies only to cases where money is paid. Any other valid consideration which can support an agreement, if paid and accepted in good faith, however small it may be, will discharge the debt, and the evidence of its acceptance in full need not be under seal. The acceptance in writing of the terms of an assignment, and especially a receipt of a portion of the proceeds of the assigned estate, is a sufficient consideration to support the agreement to accept in full, and neither the acceptance nor the receipt need to be under seal. Tennant v. Stoney, 1 Rich. Eq., 222 [44 Am. Dec. 213]; Aiken v. Price, Dudley, 50; Fitch v. Sutton, 5 East., 230; Pierce Butler & Co. v. Jones, 8 S. C., 273 [28 Am. Rep. 288]. If the plaintiff accepted the terms of the assignment and received his pro rata share, he is bound by the terms of the assignment, unless it was in some way legally modified so as not to extinguish his notes except to the extent of actual payment.

Was parol testimony admissible to show that there was any such modification? The doctrine laid down on this subject is that "parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a valid written instrument," and this applies not only to writings under seal, but to simple contracts in writing as well. Greenl. Evid., 275, 276. See also Miller v. Edwards, 18 S. C., 600. All the parol testimony, therefore, which was introduced to show that the terms of the assignment were modified as to these notes was inadmissible.

It was the duty of the presiding judge to have construed the Florida letter, and it would have been error to have referred its construction to the jury. Mowry v. Stogner, 3 S. C., 253; Bank v. Heyward, 15 Id., 296; Russell v. Arthur, 17 Id., 480; Hammond v.

A. & P. R. R. Co., 15 Id., 10; DeCamps v. Carpin, 19 Id., 124. The original letter has been examined by the court, and the printed letter in the "Case" corresponds with it except the word "intended" in the first line of the letter in the "Case" is written "promised" in the original. The defendant says, I "promised" to pay, and "intended to do so," both in the past tense. He then says, "In order to close my business in South Carolina, I made an assignment of all my effects to pay my debts. All my effects is placed in the hands of S. P. Boozer, who will settle all my business as soon as it can be done. Your debt will be paid." If S. P. Boozer had all the effects and was to settle all his business in South Carolina, there is no room for the inference that any one else was to do it, or that the defendant *himself would do so. He might have gone on to say that in case S. P. Boozer did not pay, he himself would do so. After saying that S. P. Boozer would "settle all his business as soon as it can be done," the words "your debt will be paid" and "your debt will be paid as soon as the money can be made," refer to the expressions going just before, "as soon as the money can be made" and "as soon as it can be done". They seem to refer to the same subject matter, i. e., making the money out of the assigned effects by the trustee. This court, therefore, cannot concur with the Circuit Judge in holding that this letter was a promise to pay plaintiff's debt in full.

Having reached this conclusion as to the construction of this letter, it is not necessary, and perhaps it would not be proper, to consider how far a promise to pay these notes in full, if contained in a letter written under these circumstances, would have been binding on the defendant, either by continuing the liability on the original notes or as the foundation of an action on the new promise itself.

This court holds that it was error to admit in an action on these notes parol testimony to show that the acceptance of the assignment and a pro rata share under its provisions was not in full payment, as provided in the assignment. The court also holds that the Florida letter, whether construed by itself or in connection with the assignment and the acceptance, is not an agreement either to exempt these notes from the conditions of the assignment or sufficient evidence of any new and distinct promise to pay them. What may be a sufficient new promise, and how far the Florida letter and parol testimony are sufficient to establish it, are questions not now before the court.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

*Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, March, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and W. S. Thomason, for appellants.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff brought the action below to recover a certain tract of land in the possession of the defendant. The plaintiff claimed under a deed from her father, Larkin Ballenger, dated March 31, 1855, and the defendant, through a deed from the sheriff of Spartanburg, who had sold the land under execution against the said Ballenger, at which sale one Elizabeth White was the purchaser, and from whom, by successive conveyances, the land reached the defendant. So that both parties claimed from a common source; the question was, which had the better title? There was no doubt as to the execution of the plaintiff's deed, but the defendant alleged that at the time of the execution of this deed there were judgments against Larkin Ballenger under which the land had been sold by the sheriff; and, further, that the conveyance from said Ballenger to his daughter (the plaintiff) was a voluntary conveyance, made to hinder and delay creditors, and therefore was fraudulent and void.

The jury found for the defendant. The appeal questions the admission of certain testimony, and assigns error to the charge of his honor, Judge Cothran, who tried the case, and to his refusal to charge certain requests. The exceptions in which these alleged errors are assigned will be disposed of in the order in which they are presented in the "Case."

The 1st complains that a judgment roll and execution in the case of William White v. Larkin Ballenger was admitted in testimony. It is stated in the "Case" that the defendant put in testimony judgment rolls of the Court of Common Pleas against Larkin Ballenger. Among these rolls was one (indorsed) "Spartanburg, *roll 3792, William White v. Larkin Ballenger. Confession, $141.36. Interest from July 14, 1873. Recorded in book K, page 639." The execution is not signed by any one, but is tested by the "clerk, otherwise regular." It was to the admission of this roll that the first exception above applies. It will be observed that this exception does not raise any question as to the point whether this roll constituted a judgment, whether in law the legal requisites of a confession had been complied with, so as to make it a valid and legal judgment, but it is confined to the question of its admission in the case as testimony.

The two questions are very different. The first is before us, but the latter is not. The appellant's counsel has argued the latter, and has pointed out several particulars in which he claims that the paper was fatally deficient as a judgment. This may or not be so, but the judge made no ruling on this subject, nor does it appear that he was requested to do so. Or if he did rule upon it, the exception under consideration assigns no error to such ruling. It does no more than object to the paper being in testimony. It may not have been worth much, certainly not unless its defects were sufficiently explained; but its admission for what it was worth does not seem to us to have been legal error. It was competent to the point at least that there was such a roll in the clerk's office. The appellant discusses the legality of other judgments introduced by the defendant, but we find no exception under which such discussion becomes pertinent.

2d exception claims error, because his honor overruled plaintiff's objection to the testimony of Elizabeth White in regard to the sheriff's deed and the contents thereof. This witness was the purchaser at sheriff's sale of the land in dispute. The deed was not produced. The witness was examined by commission, and in reply to the interrogatories she stated, "I know the Larkin Ballenger land. I bid them off at sheriff's sale and paid the bid; the land was sold under execution. All the Larkin Ballenger land was sold. I got a deed for certain lands from Sheriff Wingo. I have made search for this deed but cannot find it. I never bought any other land at sheriff's sale but the Larkin Ballenger land." &c. It is true that a portion of this is secondary evidence, and it suggests better and primary evidence; but secondary evidence is *admissible where the primary has been lost or destroyed, after proper search for it in the proper place. The witness testified that she had made search for it. She does not say where, but the paper was hers, she was the proper custodian, and if she was unable to find it after search, the way was clear for the introduction of the secondary evidence which she gave. Oliver v. Sale, 17 S. C., 587; 1 Greenl. Evid., § 558; Floyd v. Mintsey, 5 Rich., 362; Berry v. Jourdon, 11 Rich., 75; Congdon v. Morgan, 14 S. C., 592.

3d. Error is alleged in allowing the defendant to put up additional testimony to rebut the testimony offered in reply by plaintiff. It appears that during the reply in testimony by the plaintiff certain evidence was introduced which the judge ruled at first was in reply, but upon consideration he ruled that it was new matter, and he then, because it was new, permitted the defendant to offer rebuttal evidence thereto. This cannot properly be assigned as error. It was simply correcting a mistake. It was no more than putting the parties back in their former status. If this new matter had been introduced by the plaintiff in her evidence in chief, where it ought to have been introduced, certainly the defendant would have been allowed to rebut it, and when it came out in the way it did, justice required that the defendant should be permitted to meet it; otherwise, he would have been taken at a disadvantage, by a mistake of his honor. Besides, the object of all judicial investigations is to reach the truth, and while the mode of procedure, long in use, affords the best of means of accomplishing the end, and therefore should be adhered to, yet in a case like this, where that mode has inadvertently been departed from on the one side, it is no violation of the principle to have the mischief repaired by relaxing the rule on the other side. In such cases much should be left to the discretion of the presiding judge. Kairson v. Puckhaber, 14 S. C., 627; Christian v. Lebeschultz, 18 Id., 602; Cantey v. Whitaker, 17 Id., 529.

4th. "In charging that a judgment obtained in court could be filed and entered on the first day of the term." This exception, it seems to us, was taken under a misapprehension of what the judge said. We do not find in the charge as printed in the "Case" that the judge charged as here stated. On the contrary, he *called attention to the old rule, 11, of the court, which forbade the entering of judgments until the rising of the court, and he stated that it did not appear when the court rose, or how long it sat. It was to assemble on that day, and if it adjourned on that day, the judgment was entered up properly on the day the court met and adjourned—further stating that public officers in the discharge of their public duties were presumed to discharge them properly and according to law, and in order to break this presumption down, there should be proof such as to satisfy the jury that that presumption was not well founded. With this he seems to have left the question to the jury. Where was the error in this? The judge's law seems to be sound, and it is with his law only that we are allowed to deal.

5th. "In charging on the facts, in charging, in substance, that the deeds of gift made by Larkin Ballenger were void." Here, again, we think the appellant misapprehended the charge. We do not find that he charged anywhere directly and positively, or in substance, as alleged, that these deeds were void. On the contrary, he asked what was the purpose of their execution. Was Ballenger in embarrassed circumstances at the time, insolvent, and being sued? Did he mean to defraud his creditors? "If so, the law would not tolerate fraud, &c., but it is for you to say for what purpose. If it was fraudulent, then they cannot stand; otherwise a man can do as he pleases with his own, because it is his." These remarks are not objected to, except in the general language of the exception, that, in substance, he charged that the deeds were void. We do not think the exception is sustained by the charge. Nor do we find that the 6th exception is borne out by the charge.

7th. "Because his honor charged that when the sheriff levies upon land under execution, the titles by operation of law pass out of the defendant and into the sheriff." This is an abstract question, in no way affecting this case. What the judge meant, as it evidently appears from reading all of his charge on this point, was that the sheriff, when he levied on land, was invested with power to convey the same to the purchaser by executing a deed thereof. But even if he expressed this idea in the language of the exception, what difference did it make? It could have had *no influence with the jury in determining the question of title as between the parties litigant. The main idea was that after levy and upon the sale, the sheriff could convey to the purchaser. It could have made no difference to the jury, whether he obtained title when he levied or was invested with power to convey when he sold.

We do not see where he charged as objected in the 8th exception, but if he did, that is disposed of by what has already been said.

The 9th "alleges that the judge charged on the facts, in reference to Mrs. White obtaining from the sheriff a deed for the land in dispute." While a judge has no right under the constitution to charge on the facts to the extent of giving his opinion to the jury, of what has or has not been proved as matter of fact, yet, in stating the law, he must necessarily say something about the testimony, or else his charge would be barren of fruit, and in many cases a useless ceremony. The appellant has not pointed out to us wherein the judge gave his opinion to the jury in connection with Mrs. White obtaining a deed from the sheriff. He stated what Mrs. White said, but he did not say that in his opinion it was true, nor that the jury was bound to find the facts as she stated them.

10th error. "In charging that the sheriff could make a valid deed to Mrs. White, although she had not paid her bid in full, $19 being unpaid." The sheriff may have made himself responsible for this balance, if he executed the deed in advance of its payment, but the deed would not have been void on account of its non-payment. Upon executing the deed, he is presumed to have received the money, and, as to the execution creditors, he would be estopped from denying it. Besides, there is no evidence that any one entitled to this balance has complained.

The 11th exception is the 10th in a different form, and the 12th has no bearing upon the case, and the same may be said as to the 13th.

14th. Again complains that the judge charged on the facts, in reference to Mrs. White's agreement with the children of Larkin Ballenger, to make titles to them when she was reimbursed the money paid by her. Charging on the facts is a vague term, al*though qualified by stating the subject-matter, to which the charge referred, as in this exception, and the other exceptions, as to the facts. Sometimes a fact is admitted all round, and in such case there would be no objection to the judge assuming it, and declaring the law applicable to such fact. What is meant by the constitutional inhibition upon a judge in charging on the facts, as we understand it, is that as to any disputed matter of fact in issue between the parties, while he may state the evidence, read it over to the jury, or state it orally, yet he is not permitted to give his opinion as to its force and effect, or make remarks intended, or tending, to influence the jury as to their finding. He may state the case alternatively, as, if they find thus and so from the testimony, which he has recounted to them, the law will be one way, if not, it will be otherwise. The point is, that the judge shall not take the testimony from the jury, either directly or impliedly, as to its effect. It has not been pointed out to us wherein Judge Cothran violated this rule below.

The 15th and 16th exceptions were not discussed by the appellant, nor do we see their pertinency.

fused to charge that it is not sufficient to defeat plaintiff's title, simply to show that the grantor had a fraudulent intent when he conveyed it to her, and in charging that such rule cannot apply here." His honor was requested to charge "that it was not enough to show that the grantor's conveyance was with fraudulent intent." He replied: "That would be so, if this conveyance was a conveyance for valuable consideration, but that rule does not apply to voluntary conveyances, and especially conveyances to children." Was this not the proper and legal distinction between these two classes of conveyances? Ordinarily, it is true that where a conveyance, founded on a valuable consideration, is attacked for fraud, you must not only prove the fraud in the grantor, but you must go further and implicate the purchaser; but this rule does not apply to voluntary conveyances. In such case, a man must be just before he is generous, and he cannot part with his property by a mere gift, thereby defeating his creditors, however innocent or commendable may be his motives, or however worthy the objects of his bounty.

18th, and the last. "There was not authority for the sheriff *to sell the land in dispute under judgment and executions introduced in testimony." In reply to a request to charge this, his honor said: "I cannot charge this, gentlemen, because you may find from the proof here that there were judgments; and if there was any judgment in the sheriff's office at the time the sale was made, to which that sale could be referred, the law says that it is a valid sale, whether the execution under which he levied was a good execution or not. If there was an execution in this office to which this sale could be referred, then the sale was valid for the purpose of taking title out of the parties. Agnew v. Adams, 17 S. C., 364. I have charged you already upon the subject of enough property remaining to satisfy the judgments against him, outside of the lands conveyed to the plaintiff. But it must appear clearly that there was enough in his possession, not only to satisfy the execution, but to pay all of his debts. Where a man conveys his property voluntarily, and owes debts at the same time, if he has not got an abundance of property to pay the debts, then the creditors who are injured by that voluntary conveyance have the right to draw that property back."

The main point in this quotation is, that the judge declined to say for himself that the judgments or executions introduced were insufficient. What would constitute a legal judgment or execution was doubtless a question of law, and had the judge been requested to state the legal requisites of a valid judgment, and he had declined or had stated them incorrectly, an exception would have been proper; but whether there was such a judgment, was a question of fact. This he left to the jury, and had he not done so, he would have usurped the province of the jury, and been subject to the criticism of charging on the facts. His law, that if there was any judgment or execution in the office under which the sale could be made, whether levied or not, yet the sale would attach thereto, was certainly correct.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

A proceeding before a trial justice to eject a tenant (Gen. Stat. § 1819), who claims title in himself, is not an action involving the title to land, but a summary proceeding, and the trial justice has jurisdiction. O'Neale v. Fickling, 10 S. C., 301.

But in such proceeding, the tenant must be personally served with the notice to show cause, and when served by copy left, and he appeared and objected to the jurisdiction upon this ground, the trial justice was without jurisdiction, and the tenant, under a writ of certiorari, is entitled to have the proceeding vacated.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, December, 1884.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Bacon & Moore, for appellant.

Messrs. Lyles & Haynsworth, contra.

April 1, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was a petition praying a writ of certiorari, to be directed to J. Q. Marshall, trial justice for Richland County, commanding him to certify and send to the court below a certain proceeding had before him by the respondent, Cavender, as alleged landlord, to eject the appellant, as alleged tenant, from certain real estate situate in said county. Upon this petition, a rule to show cause was issued by his honor, Judge Kershaw, upon the return to which the case was heard by his honor, Judge Wallace, who issued an order, of which the following is a copy: "The petition for the issuance of a writ of certiorari in the above entitled cause having been heard: it is ordered, that the said petition be, and the same is hereby, refused, and that the order of Judge Kershaw restraining the respondent herein be, and the same is hereby, dissolved." From this order the appeal before us has been taken, with a number of exceptions, which, however, need not be set out seriatim, as we think the points involved may be considered and determined without this.

The appellant claims as a foundation for the writ, that the trial justice had no jurisdiction, either of the subject matter in question or of the person of the relator; not of the subject matter, because title to land was raised, and not of the person, because he had not been personally served with notice to quit, or to show cause why he should not be ejected, as required by section 1819, General Statutes. Further, that the relator was not a tenant of Cavender, and owed no rent; that no entry and claim of possession of the premises had been made by Cavender, and that the trial justice committed errors of law in refusing to hear certain testimony offered by the relator and in allowing certain other testimony offered by Cavender; and also that there was error of law in the ruling of the trial justice in some other respects.

We think that the main questions raised in this appeal are concluded by our cases of O'Neale v. Fickling, 10 S. C., 301; State ex rel. McCall v. Cohen, 13 Id., 198; and State ex rel. Maxwell v. Lewis, 21 Id., 598. In the first case above, the proceeding below was to eject the petitioner from certain premises in the city of Columbia, of which the respondent claimed to be the owner, and that the petitioner was a tenant at will. The petitioner denied the tenancy at will, and claimed title in herself. The trial justice heard the proceeding, and ordered the petitioner to be ejected, and the petitioner prayed a writ of prohibition, mainly upon the grounds: 1st. That title to real estate being involved, the trial justice had no jurisdiction; and 2d. That it appeared on the face of the proceedings that the relator was not a tenant at will. The court held, that while it was the law, that trial justices had been excluded from jurisdiction in "actions" where the title to real estate came in question (Old Code, § 81), yet that this law did not apply to summary proceedings like the one then under consideration, because such proceeding could not be regarded as constituting an action. The court says: "That this was not intended is evident from the fact that this section [the section under which the proceeding had been instituted] was re-enacted as a part of the general statutes, after the code took effect." Now, this

Fickling, supra, the raising of title by the relator did not oust the trial justice of jurisdiction on that ground.

Inasmuch as this case, however, ultimately turns upon another question of jurisdiction in the trial justice's court, it is not necessary to discuss the errors of law assigned to the court below, nor how far such alleged errors are reviewable by this court, on appeals in certiorari proceedings originating in the Court of Common Pleas. But there is no doubt that it belongs to the office of certiorari to test the jurisdiction of the inferior court to which it may be directed. We have, therefore, addressed ourselves to this question in the first instance, and finding the trial justice's court was without jurisdiction for the reasons given below, we have not considered the errors of law assigned.

As to the subject matter, the question of title being out of the way, it may be assumed for this case that the trial justice had jurisdiction, under section 1819 of General Statutes, and whether the rent was due, or had been paid in whole or in part, were questions of fact for him, and also in a case of prohibition it would be for him to ascertain, whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and whether it was of the character required by the section of the General Statutes under which he was acting. O'Neale v. Fickling, supra. See, however, Leonard's Case, 3 Rich., 113; Cooper v. Stocker, 9 Rich., 292; and State ex rel. Sawyer v. Fort & Harth [24 S. C. 510], next case infra, as to certiorari.

But to give the trial justice complete jurisdiction, it should appear upon the face of the proceedings that he had jurisdiction of the person of the relator as well as the subject matter. Now, to give the trial justice such jurisdiction, the section 1819 requires that he shall have a notice served on the tenant to show cause before him, if he can, within three days from its date, why he should not be dispossessed, and that this service shall be a personal service. In the case of State ex rel. McCall v. Cohen, it was held that a judgment rendered by an inferior court against a party not brought within its jurisdiction by proper service of process, may be set aside under proceedings by certiorari. True, it was intimated in that case that a voluntary appearance without service before judgment would have been sufficient, as equivalent to a personal service. Code, § 160. And in the case of State ex rel. Maxwell v. Lewis, it was held, where the trial justice himself had served the process, which was irregular, yet the defendant having appeared and fixed a day for the trial, could not afterwards interpose the objection of non-service.

Now, the relator here was not personally served. He denies such service, and the constable testified that the service was made by leaving a copy at the house of the relator; but, notwithstanding this, had he voluntarily appeared, without objecting to the service, under the authority of the cases supra, he would have been concluded. Did he voluntarily appear? He appeared and demanded a complaint to be filed, setting forth the cause of action. He then answered, objecting, amongst other things, that no personal service of the notice to show cause had been made upon him, thus raising a jurisdictional question. This, it seems to us, is different from those cases where the party appears without service of summons and consents to go on with the cause. The objection that no personal service had been made, was in effect a protest to the further progress of the case, and it accompanied its progress to termination. It is true that the relator, not having been personally served, might have disregarded the notice, and might have refused to appear; then clearly the trial justice would not have had jurisdiction of his person. McCall v. Cohen, and Maxwell v. Mitchell, supra. If so, should his appearing under protest give jurisdiction? We think not.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the proceeding before the trial justice be vacated and set aside.

Under the grant of powers by the constitution to the Supreme Court, that court can, under its writ of certiorari, inquire only as to the jurisdiction of the inferior court (Ex parte Childs, 12 S. C., 111); but the Court of Common Pleas, under the same writ issued by that court, can also review errors of law apparent upon the record, but not errors of fact.

Under a writ of certiorari issued by the Court of Common Pleas, that court has the power to determine, as matter of law, the construction of a written agreement; and having construed it as not creating the relation of tenancy at will, it has the power to restrain the order of the trial justice based upon a contrary construction.

[4. Landlord and Tenant ⇨302.]

Where a tenant rents land for a year, and agrees to surrender possession at the end of the year, but continues in possession for two years longer, it is not a tenancy at will; and, therefore, in such case a trial justice has no jurisdiction, under section 1818 of the General Statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1298; Dec. Dig. ⇨302.]

Before Kershaw, J., Lexington, June, 1885.

The tenancy in this case was under the following agreement:

State of South Carolina, County of Lexington.

These presents are known as such: Wm. Fort, now deceased, purchased a tract of land at sheriff's sale, sold as the estate land of George Sawyer, deceased, February 7th, 1870, and sold the same to George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer, on condition that they pay him the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, with interest from 7th July, 1870, interest to be paid annually; and whereas the said George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer are unable to pay the said Wm. Fort for the same, we, whose names are signed to this instrument, make this agreement, and we desire to have a settlement without litigation or suits at law. I, H. Arthur Fort, administrator of the estate of Wm. Fort, do hereby certify and agree that if George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer will yield to the said H. Arthur Fort, as aforesaid, peaceable possession of all that piece, parcel, or tract of land, containing five thousand three hundred and thirty-eight acres of land (well understood that fifty-five acres are to be deducted, as I, the said H. Arthur Fort, have made to the said George and J. W. Sawyer a title for the same), the said George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer are to be released from said agreement on the payment of the sum mentioned with the interest thereon; and also they are to be released from the payment of the dower and the costs that Wm. Fort and H. Arthur Fort have paid for them in the case of Ann C. Murphy vs. W. Fort, George and J. W. Sawyer, and also the taxes for the same that has been paid by W. and H. Arthur Fort since the purchase of the land by W. Fort.

I, the said H. Arthur Fort, promise and agree to permit George and John W. Sawyer to stay upon said land and cultivate all *or any portion of the land that is now cleared and under fence for one year; and that said George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer be permitted to cut, saw, and raft two hundred logs off of said land, and saw all logs that they have cut and on hand ready to be sawed and raft the same to Charleston. They are also permitted to remove and raft to Charleston lumber and timber that they have on hand sawed and cut up to this date; they, the said George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer, are permitted to saw and raft all the timber John W. Scofield may cut and haul to said mill within one month from date, and to saw all the timber John W. Scofield now has at said mill.

In consideration of the foregoing agreement, H. Arthur Fort, administrator as aforesaid, promises and agrees to withdraw a suit entered against George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer on an injunction, and that the suit shall proceed no further against them.

In witness whereof we have set our hands and seal, January 27th, 1882. H. Arthur Fort, Geo. Sawyer.

The trial justice reported his judgment and the reasons therefor, as follows:

Mr. Meetze had the defendant, George Sawyer, sworn, and endeavored to prove by him that he (George Sawyer) claimed to hold the land at that time as tenant of minor heirs of George Sawyer, sr., deceased, who had commenced an action against Col. Fort's heirs for the possession of this land. Mr. Graham, attorney for plaintiff, objected to this evidence or defence on the ground that the defendant was estopped from such defence because he was plaintiff's tenant, having entered under him, and had not surrendered his tenancy, nor had he ever notified plaintiff that he held adversely to him or for third parties, and therefore he was estopped from such defence, because it was contrary to public policy; and to support this objection he cited me to the following authorities, to wit: Sedg. & Wait T. T. L., pp. 218-20, and authorities there cited; and also cited the following South Carolina decisions: Syme v. Sanders, 4 Strob., 201; Milhouse v. Patrick, 6 Rich., 352. Under the foregoing authorities I held that defendant was estopped from such defence, and accordingly ruled out his testimony.

Defendant then claimed that I had no jurisdiction of the case, *because the proper notice to quit had not been given to defendant by Mr. Fort. I have already stated Mr. Fort's testimony, which was amply sufficient under the circumstances of this case, for Mr. Fort had notified him personally on more than one occasion, besides he had written him twice what he might depend on if he failed to make satisfactory arrangements about the rent, and Mr. Fort had never given him permission to remain on this land. Davis v. Carew and Dawson, 1 Rich., 276. Besides this, the Supreme Court, in the case of the State v. Stenart, decides that "A tenant who, after the expiration of the first year, continues to hold over without any new contract, except that implied by law, and refuses to give his note for the rent, as he had done in the first year, or to pay rent, is not entitled to the usual notice to quit. But the defendant endeavored to show that he claimed to hold the land for third parties, which conduct on his part waived the notice if he had not been notified legally (which is not the case)." State v. Stenart, 5 Strobl., 31.

The defendant did not pretend to claim any title in himself to this land, and his whole conduct showed that he never intended to pay any rent to Mr. Fort. In a word, the defendant absolutely failed to show any cause why he should not be ejected from the said premises.

Therefore I passed an order directing that a writ of ejectment should issue against him, requiring the sheriff or any lawful constable of Lexington County to eject him from said premises; and on the same day I issued a warrant of ejectment against him, according to the statute in such case made and provided.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

In this case summary proceedings had been instituted on the part of the plaintiff to eject the defendant as tenant of the land described in the proceedings, under section 1818 of the General Statutes. An order of ejectment was issued by the trial justice, and the defendant petitioned for and obtained a writ of certiorari issued to the Trial Justice Court, requiring that the record be brought into this court for examination on account of alleged defects in the same arising from the want of jurisdiction and power of that court to proceed under the act in question under the circumstances of this case.

*In order to the exercise of the power attained by the Trial Justice Court, the act invoked by plaintiff, all the circumstances must concur, required by the act, before the court would have jurisdiction. The case must clearly fall within one or more of the specified instances in which the act authorizes the Trial Justice Court to proceed in this manner. The person sought to be ejected must either be the tenant at will of the premises, or must have gone into possession of the same under a contract of service as a domestic servant or common laborer, or otherwise. The act applies only to those classes of tenants and none other.

If the agreement introduced by the plaintiff is to be considered as characterizing the nature of the holding (and it is certainly the best and most reliable evidence appearing in the case), the defendant held under the terms of that paper for one year from January 27, 1882, and agreed to surrender the possession of the land at the expiration of that time. The defendant did not so surrender, but continued to hold and occupy the land during the years 1883 and 1884, and not until the present year was there any demand for possession or notice to quit; and it may well be doubted if the notice or demand here claimed to have been made was sufficient or would have been sufficient to terminate a tenancy, and to set in motion the machinery provided by the act for the ejectment of the tenant.

But conceding that the proceedings would have been regular in the case of a tenant at will, can the defendant be so regarded? He did not enter as tenant at will, but as purchaser under a valid contract. This is stated in the written agreement; certainly up to the date of that instrument he held in his own right and not as tenant. That agreement undertakes to set aside the contract of sale, and it was agreed thereby, that if the defendant would give up possession of the land, he should be released from all liabilities for the purchase money, and should occupy the premises for one year longer. Now, if we give to this agreement the same effect as if it were a lease of the premises for one year, and an acknowledgment of tenancy for a year, which is the most favorable view for the plaintiff, when he held on for another year, held again for another year, he became a tenant from year to year, and the terms of the act would not apply to such a tenancy.

*If the agreement is not to be construed as creating a tenancy by contract for a year from its date, it must be a contract to surrender the possession of the land at the expiration of a year, and the incidents of a tenancy would not attach, but it would have been an agreement to be enforced by those courts having the power to enforce the performance of contracts. However, as I have said, it is most favorable to the plaintiff to construe it a contract for a tenancy for a year, which continuing, resolved itself into a tenancy from year to year, which can be terminated only in the modes applicable to such a tenancy. Any other view of the case appears to me impossible to be entertained.

To eject a farmer at this season of the year, and so deprive him of the fruits of his labor, would require the strongest and clearest case of right to sustain it. If the plaintiff, before the commencement of the new year, had served the defendant with notice to quit in proper time, there would have been no wrong done in ejecting him; it would have been the defendant's own wrong to have continued in possession and planting a crop upon the land would have been his own folly. But after having suffered defendant to continue year after year without notice to quit, the continuance in possession during the present year was a right of the defendant, of which he cannot be deprived by the method adopted in this case.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the proceedings of the Trial Justice's Court herein are without jurisdiction, null, and void, and that the same and all proceedings thereunder be set aside.

From this decree the respondents, Fort and Harth, appealed on the following grounds:

1. Because it appeared upon the face of the return and petition that the proceedings in this cause were had in a matter pending, within the summary jurisdiction of Wm. T. Harth, trial justice, and that having jurisdiction of the subject matter and the person of the defendant, George Sawyer, the Circuit Judge could not, by the writ of certiorari, it is submitted, review the judgment or proceedings in said cause.

2. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding and deciding that the defendant, George

Sawyer, was a tenant from year to *year, and could not be ejected by a trial justice under section 1818 of the General Statutes.

3. Because it is respectfully submitted that the Circuit Judge committed a gross error in holding and deciding that, "To eject a farmer at this season of the year, and so deprive him of the fruits of his labor, would require the strongest and clearest case of right to sustain it."

4. Because the decision of the Circuit Judge shows that he set aside the judgment of Trial Justice Harth, simply because the defendant, George Sawyer, had planted a crop upon the premises from which the plaintiff sought to have him ejected.

5. Because the Circuit Judge erred in finding as a fact that the plaintiff, James C. Fort, had not demanded possession of the premises in question, or notified the defendant, George Sawyer, to quit until the present year, whereas the evidence offered by the plaintiff showed that the defendant had been notified verbally and in writing on more than one occasion prior to the present year, and Trial Justice Harth found as a fact that he had been so notified.

6. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding "that the proceedings of the Trial Justice Court were without jurisdiction, null, and void."

7. Because the Circuit Judge had no right to review the facts found by the trial justice, nor had he any right to set aside the proceedings of the trial justice in said cause.

Mr. George T. Graham, for appellant.
Messrs. Meetze and Muller, contra.

April 1, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case the appellant, J. C. Fort, obtained an order from W. I. Harth, a trial justice in Lexington County, to eject the respondent, Sawyer, from a certain tract of land, by proceedings under section 1818, General Statutes, providing for the ejectment of tenants at will and domestic servants. Thereupon the respondent petitioned his honor, J. B. Kershaw, for the writ of certiorari, which was granted.

Upon *hearing the return to this writ, his honor holding that the proceedings before the trial justice were without jurisdiction, and therefore null and void, ordered the same to be set aside. The appeal questions the correctness of this order.

The appellant in support of the appeal contends, first, that the office of certiorari is not for the correction of errors of law or fact in the inferior court, but it is to test the jurisdiction of such court, and that this is its only office; second, that the errors complained of here did not involve a jurisdictional question in the Trial Justice's Court, and therefore, even admitting the complaint to be well founded, yet said errors are beyond the reach of certiorari; the questions involved belonging under the act to the trial justice, and without appeal. The case of Ex parte Childs (12 S. C., 111), is relied upon to sustain the first position, and O'Neale v. Fickling (10 S. C., 301), the second.

Ex parte Childs was a case within the original jurisdiction of this court, and what was said in that case, it must be remembered, was applicable to the office of the writ, as issued by this, the Supreme Court, under the authority of the constitution, giving it power to issue certain writs. Art. IV., § 4. And it is true that the court there did hold that the only office of certiorari, when issued by the Supreme Court, was to confine inferior courts within their legal and proper boundary, and that neither errors of law nor of fact, made in a case within the jurisdiction of said courts could be brought up for review by this court under writ of certiorari, issued by said court. This decision was in accordance with the construction of art. IV., section 4, of the constitution given by the Supreme Court in the case of the State ex rel. Wallace v. Hayne and Mackey (8 S. C., 368), in which it was held, that while the power of the Supreme Court, in reference to certain writs named in the constitution, to wit: injunctions, mandamus, &c., was the same as it existed at common law when the constitution was adopted, yet with reference to other original and remedial writs not named, as certiorari, its power was limited by the words, "as may be necessary to give it general supervisory control of all other courts in the State;" and in the case of Ex parte Childs, supra, these words were construed as limiting the power of this court in such writs to the supervising of the jurisdiction of the other courts, and not to the correction of either errors of law or fact made therein, the powers of this court as to errors of fact and law being confined, under the constitution, to appellate cases in chancery, and to the correction of errors of law under such regulations as the general assembly may prescribe. And no regulations having been prescribed by the general assembly by which the errors of inferior tribunals can be corrected through the medium of certiorari, it followed, as Melver, A. J., said in delivering the opinion, that such errors could not be so corrected by this court. "And, therefore, however it may be as to the Court of Common Pleas, this court cannot issue a writ of certiorari as a substitute for a writ of error."

The case of Ex parte Childs, however, did not decide that the Court of Common Pleas in certiorari was confined to jurisdictional errors, as is the Supreme Court. The general question as to the office of certiorari, it is true, was somewhat discussed, but as to the power of the Court of Common Pleas thereunder, there was no positive adjudication, because that question was not before the court; and therefore, as will be seen from the extract above, it was left open. This question, however, has been before our court in at least three cases. State v. Seuff & Prioleau, 2 Hill, 367; State v. Stewart, 5 Strob., 29; and Cooper v. Stocker, 9 Rich., 292; in each of which it was held, that while the writ of certiorari could not be regarded as a substitute for an appeal, and while errors of fact could not be reviewed thereunder, yet that the Court of Common Pleas might review errors of law, although not jurisdictional in their nature, when the record had been brought up by the writ.

It may be regarded as somewhat of an anomaly that the Court of Common Pleas should have greater power under the writ of certiorari than the Supreme Court, but yet such is the law under the cases supra; and besides, when article IV., section 15, of the constitution, in which power is conferred upon the Court of Common Pleas to issue these writs, is compared with section 4, of article IV., conferring this power on the Supreme Court, it would seem that the framers of the constitution had in view this difference. In the first, it is declared that "the Court of Common Pleas shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, prohibition, and scire *facias, and all other writs which may be necessary for carrying their powers fully into effect." In the second, that the Supreme Court "shall always have power to issue, * * and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it general supervisory control over all other courts in the State." Why this difference in the terms employed, but to show a difference in the powers conferred? And that the Supreme Court has none of the powers of a writ of error, for the correction of errors at law under a certiorari, is made still more plain by the fact, as already stated, that the constitution further provided that such errors of law could be corrected by said court only under such regulations as the general assembly might provide. These regulations have been provided, and they do not include proceeding by certiorari.

So that we conclude that there was no error on the part of the Circuit Judge in looking into all assigned errors of questions of law involved, whether jurisdictional or otherwise, there being no appeal allowed in such cases, the ordinary mode of correcting such errors. State ex rel. McCall v. Cohen, 13 S. C., 198.

It is contended, second, that the trial justice had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and of the person of the respondent, and such being the case that all questions arising were for him, and without appeal—that his decision was final, subject to no review. So far as any errors of law are concerned, what we have said above disposes of this question. But the position of the appellant is correct as to the facts. These cannot be reviewed either by certiorari or by any other process; whether wisely so or not, they are final with the inferior court. Now, was the order of the Circuit Judge based upon a question of fact, or was it upon a question of law? And if upon the latter, did the judge err in his holding? The proceeding under which the trial justice acted, was founded upon section 1818 of General Statutes, which provides for the ejectment of tenants at will and domestic servants. It is not claimed that the respondent was a domestic servant, but the trial justice held that he was a tenant at will, and therefore ordered that he be ejected. The Circuit Judge holds that respondent was not a tenant at will, and therefore that the trial justice had no jurisdiction.

ling (10 S. C., 302), *in which the court said: "That it was for the trial justice to ascertain by proofs whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and, if a tenancy existed, whether it was of the character that the statute required, and if the trial justice arrived at an erroneous conclusion, that is no ground for prohibition." That case was a case of ejectment, like this, of an alleged tenant at will. The question raised by the defendant was title, and the trial justice having disregarded this defence, a writ in prohibition was sought, mainly on the ground that the question of title being raised, the jurisdiction of the trial justice was ousted. The court held that the proceeding before the trial justice not being an action, the defence of title did not oust jurisdiction, under section 78 of the Code. It does not appear in the case upon what evidence the tenancy rested. It is true, that one of the exceptions claimed, "that his honor erred in refusing the prohibition, when the fact appeared on the face of the return, that the relator was not a tenant at will," and it was in reply to this exception, that the court used the language quoted above, and which is relied on by appellants here.

We do not think that this concludes this case, for several reasons. First, the case of O'Neale v. Fickling was a case of prohibition, and not certiorari, and the court in that case held, that the only ground of prohibition is want of jurisdiction—that it can “be properly asked only on the ground that the issue was placed by law beyond the jurisdiction of the trial justice to determine the truth or falsehood of the allegations contained therein.” While in reference to certiorari, the cases referred to above have distinctly determined that questions of law other than jurisdictional may be considered thereunder. See Leonard's Case, 3 Rich., 113; Cooper v. Stocker, 9 Rich., 292; in both of which cases it was held, that errors of judgment in a point of law by an inferior court could not be reviewed under prohibition, the remedy being a writ of certiorari. See, also, State ex rel. Richland County v. Columbia, 17 S. C., 82. Second. It does not appear, in that case, but that the tenancy at will was entirely a question of fact. If so, the ruling of the court was in accordance with the cases supra, even in cases of certiorari, as it is nowhere contended that the facts can be reviewed in such proceedings.

*In the case before the court, whether the respondent was a tenant at will, it is true, was the main question, but this question did not depend upon the evidence of facts, the truth or falsehood of which had to be determined; but it depended upon the construction of a certain agreement between the parties, which was before the court. This was a question of law, and therefore subject to review. We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge was not bound by the judgment of the trial justice as to the construction of this agreement, as he would have been upon a mere finding of a fact, and that he had the right to construe it for himself. We think further, that his construction was the correct one, and that there did not exist such a relation of tenancy at will between these parties as gave jurisdiction to the trial justice to eject respondent under section 1818, General Statutes.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

HOLLADY v. HOLLADY.

SAME v. SAME.

Where executors made a final return, crediting themselves with debts paid, but not charging themselves with rents received from lands of the devisees, an order of the probate judge approving this return and striking a balance in favor of the executors cannot be pleaded as res judicata to an action afterwards brought by these devisees against the executors for the recovery of such rents.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⚡513.]

Where an executor takes possession of lands of infant devisees, receives the rents, and applies them in part to the debts of the testator, he is liable to an action by these devisees for the surplus; and this right of action does not terminate with his life, but may be prosecuted against his executor.

The finding of fact by the master, concurred in by the Circuit Judge, that this executor had appropriated these rents to his own use, approved; and the judgment against his estate for such rents, less the pro rata liability of these devisees for the balance found in the executor's favor by the probate judge, affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Greenville, July, 1885.
The opinion states the case.

*Messrs. Perry, Perry & Heyward, for appellants.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These were actions to account for the rents and profits of land. They were brought by brothers in the same right, only differing in the amounts claimed. They were heard together and they will be so considered; but, to prevent confusion, we will refer to the case of Edda, intending that what is said shall be considered as applying mutatis mutandis to that of Emory M.

Robert Hollady died in 1874, leaving a will, of which Henry Hollady and G. W. Hollady were the executors. After making other dispositions, the testator, by the 6th clause of his will, devised directly to his sons, Emory M. and Edda (to be equally divided between them), a small tract of land, containing 192 acres, and known as the “Cooley tract.” At this time, and for some time afterwards, these two boys were both minors, living with their mother, and, as alleged, the executors took possession of the “Cooley land,” and for several years received the rents and profits, which, as they claimed, were applied in payment of the debts of the estate. In February, 1880, the debts all being paid, the executors, after formal publication, made a final settlement of the estate in the probate office, and were discharged. In that settlement it was ascertained that the executors were in advance to the estate in the sum of $2,825.93; but it did not appear that they had ever charged themselves for the rents and profits received from the lands. Nor was any effort made by the probate judge to ascertain how much had been received from the different devisees, or to adjust the amounts which they should respectively contribute to reimburse the executors for the amounts they had advanced for the estate.

In February, 1884, one of the executors, G. W. Hollady, died testate, and the defendant, John T. Chapman, is the sole executor of his will. Some time afterwards Emory M. and Edda Hollady came of age—Emory first, who was then placed in possession of his half of the Cooley land, and afterwards Edda, to *whom was turned over the other half. Each of them now brings his action against Henry Hollady, the surviving executor of his father's will, and John T. Chapman, the executor of the deceased executor, G. W. Hollady, for the rents and profits of their respective portions of the land, down to the time they were placed in possession of the same. The defendant, Chapman, executor of the deceased executor, answered, denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the allegations of the complaint, and pleading plene administravit as to the estate of his testator.

The case was referred to the master, S. J. Douthitt, Esq., to report his conclusions of law and fact; and he, after taking the testimony, reported, among other things, "that Edda Hollady was a minor about eleven years of age when his father died; that the rent of his portion of the real estate devised to him and his brother by his father was worth one hundred dollars a year, on an average, during the time the executors received the same, and that the defendant, John T. Chapman, as executor of the will of G. W. Hollady, has not come into the possession of any property belonging to the estate of his testator," &c. And as conclusions of law: "That the defendants, Henry Hollady and John T. Chapman as executor of the estate of G. W. Hollady, are liable to the plaintiffs for the rents and profits of his real estate from the death of Robert Hollady up to the final settlement of his estate, a period of six years, at one hundred dollars a year, with interest thereon from January 1 of each year after the same became due, less his pro rata of the amount found to be due them on said settlement, which, after making said deduction, he finds to be at this date the sum of six hundred and sixty-two dollars and sixteen cents ($662.16). 2nd. That the judgment should be given against the defendant, John T. Chapman, as executor of the estate of G. W. Hollady, subject to the plea of plene administravit, as it appears that he has never received anything on account of the estate of his testator," &c.

The cause came upon exceptions to this report, and Judge Cothran granted an order confirming it; and from this order John T. Chapman appeals to this court upon the grounds: I. That the matter in controversy is res adjudicata. II. That the *appellant, as executor of G. W. Hollady, cannot be made liable for mesne profits of land alleged to have been wrongfully held by the said G. W. Hollady. III. That, even if this were not true, the respondent here, having failed to prove that any of the profits of the land were appropriated by G. W. Hollady to his own use, it is submitted that he cannot recover.

First. As to the question of res adjudicata. It does not appear that the question was either made in the pleadings or submitted to the master, but if it had been, it could not have prevailed. The settlement of the estate in the probate office was a mere statement of the receipts and expenditures of the executors with a view to their discharge. It is true that devisees must abate for the payment of debts, but it must be an abatement equal by all, in the same character. It would undoubtedly have been more satisfactory if, at that time, an account could have been taken of advancements of the different parties in the way of rents and profits, and how much more, if any, each devisee should contribute to reimburse the executors. It seems, however, that the executors did not ask for such accounting, but proceeded on the line that the rents and profits belonged to them, and the devisees were liable to them for the whole amount found in their favor by the Probate Court. In that view, the executors could require contributions only by a proceeding on the equity side of the Court of Common Pleas. As we understand it, the Probate Court had not jurisdiction to enforce the equity of executors to have contribution from devisees to refund debts of the testator paid by them; and having no jurisdiction of the question, it is, of course, not res adjudicata.

Second. As to the right of plaintiff to recover from the executor of G. W. Hollady rents and profits received by the testator in his lifetime from lands alleged to have been wrongfully held. That is to say, is this a proper case for the application of the principle, actio personalis moritur cum persona? The test is whether "the deceased actually held the property of the plaintiff so as to derive a benefit therefrom, so that a promise to pay therefor could be presumed or implied, while an action for tort could not be maintained, yet the tort could be waived and assumpsit brought for the value of the property." 2 Add. Torts, 539; Chaplin v. Barrett, Administrator, 12 Rich., 284 [75 Am. Dec. *525]

731]; *Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C., 477. This is certainly not an action of trespass to try titles to the land, nor for damages quare clausum fregit, nor, as it seems to us, in form ex delicto.

It is true, a devise is a form of conveyance, subject, however, to the payment of the debts of the testator. As lands are liable for debts, executors, whose duty it is to provide for debts, have some qualified right to control lands devised, so far at least as debts are concerned. Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C., 149. The plaintiff, devisee, was a minor without guardian. His devise was liable to abate for debts, and we do not see that the executors committed a bald trespass in receiving the rents and profits of it, to the extent of its pro rata share of contribution for the payment of the debts of the testator; but for any excess beyond that amount the profit was money had and received for plaintiff's use, which ex equo et bono belongs to him, and he may recover it from the executor. "It is an established principle of equity, that if one intrude upon the estate of an infant and take the profits thereof, he will be treated as a guardian and held responsible therefor to the infant, in a suit in equity." Goodhue and wife v. Barnwell, Rice Eq., 198.

Third. But it is claimed that the plaintiff cannot recover, for the reason that "he failed to prove that any of the profits of the land were appropriated by the testator, G. W. Hollady, to his own use." That was a question of fact, which, after careful consideration, was decided by the master, who, as it happened, had also been the judge of probate when the executors made their final settlement in that court. Even if it had satisfactorily appeared that the executors applied the whole of the rents and profits received by them in payment of the debts of the estate, the result would have been the same; for they got credit for all the debts paid, and never charged themselves with the rents and profits, the effect of which was necessarily to appropriate the rents and profits to their own use. The master first found the amount of rents and profits received from the plaintiff's land by the executors, and after deducting from it "his pro rata of the amount found to be due the executors on settlement," gave judgment for the balance. In this the Circuit Judge concurred, and we cannot say that it was error.

CLARK v. WRIGHT.

Where a vendee receives a title deed to land, and undertakes, in part payment, to discharge a judgment against his vendor, then constituting a lien upon this land, the administrator of such vendor cannot afterwards require the judgment creditor to proceed against the land itself by levy and sale, to the relief of the vendor's estate, where such a proceeding would be beset with difficulties and would involve litigation.

Nor did this agreement between vendor and vendee create a trust enforceable by the vendor against the land itself, but only a simple contract debt in vendor's favor.

[3. Trusts ⇨30½.]

And this vendee having made a voluntary conveyance of this land to trustees for the benefit of his wife and children, and the trustees having sold the land and received the purchase money, the court declined to order them to apply it to the judgment debt.

[This case is also cited in Hardin v. Clark, 32 S. C. 483, 11 S. E. 304, as to facts.]

Before Wallace, J., Chester, March, 1885.

This was an action by W. A. Clark, as administrator of the estate of C. D. Melton, deceased, against Ann E. Wright, executrix, J. J. McLaure and C. H. Alexander, trustees for the widow and children of G. W. Melton, deceased, the said widow and children, and W. H. Hardin and J. C. Hardin. The complaint prayed the following relief:

1. That the money realized by the said trustees, and now in the hands of the said John J. McLaure and Charles H. Alexander, from the sale of the said Chester property, be ordered to be brought into this court and held subject to the decree herein.

2. That the said defendant, Ann E. Wright, should be required by the use of her judgment to assist plaintiff in subjecting the Chester property to her claim, before demanding payment from plaintiff out of the estate of the said Cyrus D. Melton, she has-*ing two funds from which she may be paid in full, while the other creditors can at best only have a pro rata share of an insolvent estate.

3. That to this end the said Ann E. Wright may be restrained from enforcing payment from this plaintiff, except under the direction and decree of this court.

To the statement of facts made in the opinion it will be necessary to add only this, that the funds realized from the sale of the Melton house and land to W. H. Hardin were in the hands of the trustees, J. J. McClure and C. H. Alexander.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

This demand of the complaint is rested upon two grounds:

First. That Mrs. Wright has two sources to which she can resort for payment—one the Chester property and the other the general assets—her judgment being a lien upon both, while the other unsatisfied judgment creditors have a lien only upon the general assets, their judgments being junior to the conveyance to George W. Melton. Second. That all the transactions in reference to this Chester property between C. D. and G. W. Melton resulted in imposing an express trust upon G. W. Melton to pay the Wright judgment, and that that trust binds the land to that end and to that extent.

It is a well settled doctrine in this State that when a judgment debtor sells a part of his property upon which there is an existing general lien, the judgment creditor is remitted in the collection of his debt by process to the available property remaining unsold in the hands of his debtor, and only when that is exhausted and his execution unsatisfied can he resort to the property previously conveyed by his debtor, and then only in the inverse order of the sales. Bank of Hamburg v. Howard and Germany, 1 Strobl. Eq., 173. As this principle was not controverted at the hearing, it is supposed to be conceded.

Then, as to the first ground of the demand of the complaint, that the Wright judgment must first be levied upon the Chester property, because a lien on that as well as the general assets, and the other judgment creditors hold liens only upon the general assets in the hands of the administrator. The rule here invoked is a familiar doctrine of equity, and founded upon fairness and *justice. When, however, its application would defeat a subsisting and otherwise valid right of third parties, then equities come into play and prevent the application of the rule, because fairness and justice forbids the destruction of one rightful equity to promote another. If here Mrs. Wright be required to go upon the Chester property for the satisfaction of her demand, the rights of the beneficiaries under the trust deed are destroyed. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1414.

Second. Did the transactions between C. D. Melton and Geo. W. Melton create and impose upon G. W. Melton an express trust which bound this property and which this court will enforce, and hold the property bound to respond? There can be no question that the rights of the holders of the Wright judgment, as against C. Davis Melton, were unaffected by these transactions. C. D. Melton surrendered his security for the purchase money of the property upon the promise of Geo. W. Melton to him to pay the judgment set out in the statement supra. It was a contract upon valuable consideration. Geo. W. Melton did not perform, and unquestionably a right of action at law accrued to C. D. Melton to recover damages for his failure to perform his contract. Estes v. Stokes, 2 Rich., 133. And if an action at law will lie for breach of the agreement, that is a conclusive reason that an express trust was not created. Lever v. Lever, 2 Hill Ch., 162; Stroman v. O'Ginn, 13 S. C., 103.

Other defences are set out in the answers which need not be considered here, as the foregoing principles are fatal to the complaint.

It is adjudged and ordered, that the complaint be dismissed.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because the case shows certain transactions touching the transfer of the Chester property, between C. D. Melton and G. W. Melton in their life-time, which, as between them, gave rise to certain well established equities which his honor in his decree has overlooked and entirely disregarded.

2. Because the transactions, all in writing, evince such a state of facts that a court must hold that G. W. Melton became, not a mere debtor, but a trustee of an express trust, which relation *created rights and obligations enforceable in a court of equity; and to hold otherwise, as his honor has done in his decree, is error.

3. Because, when G. W. Melton assumed to lift certain debts in judgment and otherwise (among these the Wright judgment) then pressing upon the shoulders of C. D. Melton, and when in consideration thereof C. D. Melton on his part released the legal lien (the mortgage) that was good against G. W. Melton for twenty years, and when G. W. Melton on his part assumed the legal lien (the Wright judgment) which was good against C. D. Melton for twenty years, the equity of the latter party and the obligation of the former party were concomitant, and until the obligation assumed was discharged, the attending equity continued to exist, and a court of equity will compel the observance of good faith in the whole transaction.

4. Because, to permit G. W. Melton to keep the Chester property discharged from all liability in his hands, and at the same time to permit G. W. Melton to disregard what he assumed as a concomitant binding obligation, would be to permit G. W. Melton to take advantage of his own wrong, and aid him in perpetrating a fraud, which a court will never for a moment sanction: on the contrary, were it necessary to the justice of the cause, a court would wipe out the "satisfaction" of the mortgage and remit C. D. Melton or his representatives to his original rights under it.

5. Because, whether the Wright judgment were a valid judgment or not, it was not in G. W. Melton's mouth to dispute its validity, and as to him and all volunteers, or purchasers, with notice under him, equity will deal with it as a judgment which he and they will not be permitted to dispute.

6. Because the Wright judgment is and was a valid judgment, binding upon the said C. D. Melton at the time of the transaction between him and the said G. W. Melton, and ever has been and now is a valid lien upon the Chester property in the hands of the said G. W. Melton and those holding under him: and while the owners of the Wright judgment cannot be prevented from claiming payment from the estate of C. D. Melton, still in equity the estate of C. D. Melton should be allowed the benefit of that payment out of the fund from the sale of the Chester property, which fund is now in the hands of those who paid nothing for the property, can lose nothing, and are in fact mere volunteers.

7. Because, while it is admitted that the Wright judgment was a legal claim against C. D. Melton in his life-time, and as a legal claim has been enforced against his estate, his honor has entirely overlooked the equity of C. D. Melton not to have that judgment "satisfied," but to be permitted in equity to have it enforced in the name of Ann E. Wright against the Chester property for his benefit, or the benefit of his estate.

8. Because the trustees, McLure and Alexander, under the trust deed to them and the beneficiaries under that trust deed, are volunteers merely, and as such are affected with all the equities that affected their grantor, G. W. Melton.

9. Because W. Holmes Hardin and J. C. Hardin, who became purchasers of the Chester property (the latter of whom is now in possession), purchased the same with full knowledge of the Wright judgment, and in no sense are purchasers for value without notice: and after their purchase, when notified by the plaintiff not to pay the purchase money over to the trustees, McLure and Alexander, and when in the face of this notice they did so pay the purchase money, they must take the consequences of their own voluntary act.

10. Because the plaintiff, Clark, standing in the shoes of C. D. Melton as his personal representative, is clothed with all the rights and equities of the said intestate, and is entitled to enforce them as they are now set forth in this cause, sustained as they are by the evidence therein.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. On November 15, *531

1867, Samuel *Wright obtained a judgment against the late C. D. Melton for a considerable sum. Ten days afterwards (November 25), C. D. Melton sold and conveyed to his brother, George W. Melton, a tract of land and lot in the town of Chester for $8,000, and took for the purchase money four notes and a mortgage of the premises sold to secure them. On November 25, 1871, the brothers, C. D. and George W. Melton, had a settlement, in which the purchase money aforesaid was ascertained to amount to $10,240, upon which was credited certain obligations of C. D. Melton to the amount of $4,286.29, leaving $5,953.71 still due; and in order to discharge this, George W. Melton assumed the payment of certain judgments against C. D. Melton, which had "liens upon the premises," and among them the judgment of Wright above referred to, then amounting to $1,979.30. The aggregate of these judgments amounted to $6,587.97, which overpaid the purchase money by $634.26, and for this C. D. Melton gave his note, and marked the old notes and mortgage for the land "satisfied."

On August 28, 1875, George W. Melton conveyed the land to J. J. McLure, C. H. Alexander, and W. A. Clark, in trust for the use of his wife and children, with certain limitations over. This deed was regular, but voluntary. C. D. Melton died December 4, 1875, and the plaintiff, W. A. Clark, became his administrator. George W. Melton died July 6, 1876, leaving the aforesaid Wright judgment unpaid. In the meantime, the judgment creditor, Samuel Wright, had also died, and his executrix, Ann E. Wright, on October 13, 1877, caused the judgment to be renewed against the plaintiff as administrator of C. D. Melton. Execution was issued on the renewed judgment and levied upon the aforesaid Chester property. Thereupon the trustees instituted proceedings to enjoin the sale, and upon the discovery of some supposed irregularities and defects in the record of the judgment, the levy and sale were not pressed. In 1879, the trustees obtained an order to sell the Chester property for reinvestment, and at that sale Holmes Hardin purchased the property, and subsequently sold it to J. C. Hardin, one of the defendants, who is in possession of the same.

the estate of C. D. *Melton, finding that the estate was insolvent, instituted proceedings to call in the creditors and marshal the assets. Under this call Mrs. Wright presented her judgment, to which, as stated, objection had been made for want of formalities when it was levied, and undertook to establish it. After contest, it was determined that the judgment was "valid and had a lien from its entry in the abstract of judgments." See Clark v. Melton, 19 S. C., 498.

Thereupon the plaintiff, administrator of C. D. Melton, commenced this action, for the purpose of requiring Mrs. Wright to seek payment out of the Chester property or its proceeds upon two grounds: First, That having a lien upon the Chester property, she has two sources from which she may be paid, viz., that property and the general assets, and she must exhaust the former, to the relief of the other creditors, who, having no lien upon the Chester property, can go only against the general assets; and second, That all the transactions in reference to the Chester property between C. D. and G. W. Melton, considered together, amounted to "an express trust on the part of George W. Melton to pay the Wright judgment, and to that end and to that extent the trust binds the land."

All the parties resisted the claim; the trustees and cestuis que trust insisting upon the statute of limitations; that G. W. Melton and his heirs had adverse possession of the premises for more than ten years; the purchasers, that they bought at a judicial sale for full value and without notice; and Mrs. Wright insisting that "while indifferent as to the source from whence payment of her judgment may be had, and while asserting her right to be paid from the sale of the premises in question, upon which her said judgment is a lien, she denies that any equity exists to restrain her by injunction from pursuing her remedy against the assets in plaintiff's hands, and to require her to embark in expensive litigation to seek payment elsewhere."

The cause was heard by Judge Wallace, who dismissed the complaint, and from his decree the plaintiffs appeal upon the several grounds stated in the brief.

We do not understand that this is a proceeding to enforce the judgment of Mrs. Wright by a levy and sale of the Chester property. That could only be done by Mrs.

Wright herself, the *owner of the judgment, but, having once made an unsuccessful effort in that direction, she declines to do so again. But, in the first view of the plaintiff, it is a proceeding to marshal the securities and to secure for the estate of C. D. Melton, or rather the other creditors of it, the application of the equitable principle, that a person, having two funds to satisfy his demand, shall not, by his election, disappoint other parties, having but one fund. This is an undoubted principle of equity, and has been well stated thus: "The general rule is, therefore, that if one creditor, by virtue of a lien or interest, can resort to two funds, and another to one of them only, as, for example, where a mortgagee holds a prior mortgage on two parcels of land, and a subsequent mortgage on but one of the parcels is given to another, the former must seek satisfaction out of that fund which the latter cannot touch," 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1415. If there was no difficulty about the right of Mrs. Wright to receive payment out of the Chester property, then the plaintiff, Clark, acting for the other creditors, would undoubtedly have a right to enjoin her and to require her, in their relief, to receive payment of her judgment from that source. But the same author, on the same page, says: "These rules must be taken with the modifications and exceptions that in their application the paramount incumbrancer shall not be delayed or inconvenienced in the collection of his debt, for it would be unreasonable that he should suffer because some one else has taken imperfect security; that the rights of third parties shall not be prejudiced, and that the parties themselves are creditors of the same debtor."

In this case we do not lay much stress upon the rights of the widow and children of George W. Melton as standing in the way of the enforcement of this equity, for they are mere volunteers, and their rights, whatever they may be, are no greater than those of their ancestor, under whom they entered and held. But we think there is great force in the objection that the right of Mrs. Wright to receive payment from the Chester property is stoutly contested. It is, indeed, beset with difficulties, and we agree with the Circuit Judge, that it would not be just to Mrs. Wright, in enforcing a mere equity of others, to require her, against her protest, to embark in an expensive litigation, and to be "delayed and *inconvenienced in the collection of her debt." In this respect, the case is somewhat like that of Walker v. Covar (2 S. C., 20), in which the court say: "Such relief as is here asked is never granted, if the prior creditor is thereby endangered or his right to raise the money out of both funds the least impaired. Evertson v. Booth, 19 Johnson [N. Y.], 493; Evans v. Duncan, 4 Watts [Pa.], 24; Ramsay's Appeal, 2 Watts [Pa.], 228 [27 Am. Dec. 301]. Or where the fund to be resorted to is dubious, or one which may involve him in litigation, notwithstanding the claims of a junior creditor may be defeated thereby. Fowler v. Barksdale, Harp. Eq., 165; Goodwyn v. The State Bank, 4 Desaus., 393; Moore v. Wright, 14 Rich. Eq., 134." In the case last cited it was said: "In adjusting priorities and marshalling securities, the usual course is not to restrain the preferred creditor in the first instance, but to compel him to place his remedies at the disposition of the other claimant, after they have served the purpose of satisfying his own debt. It seems only just to require that those who insist on the sufficiency of remedy as a means of payment should be obliged to take the risk and delay of enforcing on themselves. Aldrich v. Cooper (Am. notes), 2 Lead. Cas. Eq., 276." The injunction is dissolved in this case without prejudice to any right which W. A. Clark as administrator may have to be subrogated to the rights which Mrs. Ann E. Wright may have had to enforce her judgment against the Chester property.

But, apart from the question as to the equity doctrine just considered, the plaintiff's second view is, that all the transactions between C. D. and G. W. Melton in reference to the Chester property created an express trust on the part of George W. Melton to pay the Wright judgment, and to that end and to that extent the trust binds the land; and the plaintiff, as administrator of C. D. Melton, may have it enforced in equity like a mortgage. We may venture to say, that it would not be matter of regret if such a binding trust could be established; for it does not seem to be in accordance with the principles of justice and equity that the widow and children of George W. Melton should be protected in the possession of property which he gave them, but had never paid for, certainly to the extent of the Wright judgment.

*The matter, however, is not at all free from difficulty. If C. D. Melton had not conveyed the title to George W., or, having executed title and taken back a purchase money mortgage, he had left uncancelled so much of the mortgage as would cover the Wright judgment, there could have been no difficulty about it; for in the latter case it would have been easy to foreclose the mortgage, and in the former, if he had retained the title (the promise to pay the Wright judgment having been substituted pro tanto for the purchase money notes, which were cancelled), we suppose that C. D. Melton or his administrator might have gone into the court of equity for specific performance of the contract, as an executory agreement as to land, and, if the Wright judgment were not paid, obtain an order to sell it to produce payment. See Walker & Trenholm v. Kee, 16 S. C., 78, and Kerngood v. Davis, 21 Id., 206. But C. D. Melton did not retain the title, but, on the contrary, made an absolute deed, and cancelled his notes and mortgage. The contract for the sale of the land was then executed; and it looks as if C. D. Melton, in doing so, committed a mistake which is irreparable. He had an express lien on the land to secure the consideration, and we suppose (after the cancellation of the notes) it would have covered and secured the promise to pay the judgment as a substituted part of the consideration, and yet he voluntarily renounced it. After that, it is difficult to suppose that, in lieu thereof, he relied upon an obscure and doubtful trust, only inferrible from a number of facts, and difficult, if not impossible, to establish.

George W. Melton did promise to pay the Wright judgment. Upon that promise, and possibly the inherent lien of the judgment to enforce itself, C. D. Melton must have relied, but the very point of the difficulty is that the promise did not touch the land specifically. The only conceivable connection between the promise and the land was the fact that the promise to pay the judgment was part of the consideration for the conveyance of the land. That is substantially true and is conceded, but that does not authorize the inference that the promise attached to the land, which had been previously and absolutely conveyed. There is in this State, in regard to executed contracts as to land, no such thing as the equity of the vendor. If one sells and conveys *land, taking in payment a note, the grantee may transfer the land the next day, and the purchase money note, as it cannot follow the land, may never be paid. Whether the promise of George W. Melton to pay the Wright judgment is called a contract, obligation, agreement, or trust, it seems to us the insuperable difficulty still remains, that the undertaking was not specific, but general, like any other promise, for the performance of which reliance is placed only on the honesty and ability to pay of the party making it.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, with the reservation herein stated, be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was filed by plaintiff, upon which May 24, 1886. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition for a rehearing. All the issues made by the pleadings were considered and decided, and the court cannot undertake, by administrative orders or otherwise, to decide by anticipation any questions which may hereafter arise.

As it does not appear that any material fact or principle involved was overlooked in the decision, there is no ground for a reargument. Petition refused.

At the same time the court refused to grant the petition of W. Holmes Hardin and J. C. Hardin for a rehearing.

24 S. C. 536

DAUNTLESS MANUFACTURING COMPANY v. DAVIS.

This court cannot consider exceptions to the taxation of costs by the clerk, the proper course being first to take the judgment of the Circuit Court upon such exceptions, and then appeal from such judgment if it is supposed to be founded upon any error.

The presumption being that a public officer, and more especially a Circuit Judge, has acted in accordance with law, such a construction will be placed upon an order of the Circuit Judge, if practicable, as will make it conform to law.

[3. Costs ⇨169.]

There being no little confusion, even in the books, in the use of the terms "costs" and "disbursements," regard must be had to the sense in which those terms are intended to be used, more than to their strict technical signification.

In supplementary proceedings, the order of the Circuit Judge directed "that the plaintiff be allowed the usual costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk, together with thirty dollars in addition for his disbursements." This order did not confine the allowance granted the plaintiff to the "thirty dollars," and was in strict accordance with the provisions of the code. In supplementary proceedings, a party may be allowed not only the sum provided for by section 321 of the Code, but also such other costs as may be provided for the several officers of the court, including the attorneys, for any specified services in an action.

[5. Costs ⇨73.]

A party cannot tax as costs $10 for motion for appointment of a receiver, there being no order of the court allowing the costs of such motion.

[6. Costs ⇨150, 158.]

The plaintiff's attorney, under the order above stated, was entitled to have taxed as costs, $5 for order of injunction, $25 for five days' references, and $3 for three sub-writs, in addition to the $30 allowed by said order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 579, 582-584; Dec. Dig. ⇨150, 158.]

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, April, 1885.
The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. W. L. Wait and Wells & Orr, for appellant.

Mr. Julius H. Heyward, contra.

April 20, 1885. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. On January 2, 1884, Judge Kershaw, under supplementary proceedings in the above entitled action, granted an order appointing a receiver, and, amongst other things, directed "that the plaintiffs be allowed the usual costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk, together with thirty dollars in addition for his disbursements, said costs and disbursements to be paid to the plaintiff's attorney by the receiver out of any funds first coming into his hands." There was no exception to or appeal from this part of the order. On March 3, 1885, due notice, accompanied with an itemized taxation proposed, of adjustment of costs was served upon the attorneys for appellant. The clerk disallowed the following items of the proposed taxation, to wit: "Procuring order of injunction, $5; five days' reference before master, $25; motion for receiver, $10; three sub-writs, $3;" and the plaintiff's attorney duly excepted, upon the ground amongst others which it is needless to state, that the clerk erred in disallowing said items.

Upon hearing the exceptions to the action of the clerk, Judge Pressley granted the following order: "Upon hearing the appeal from the taxation of costs made by the clerk in above entitled supplementary proceedings, it appearing that the order of Hon. J. B. Kershaw, of date January 2, 1884, provides for the taxation of said costs, it is ordered that the appeal be sustained, and that the clerk be required to tax the costs in accordance with said order. April 8th, 1885." In pursuance of this order, another notice of adjustment of costs, containing the items above mentioned as previously disallowed, was served on defendant's attorneys, and the clerk made another adjustment of the costs, allowing the items previously disallowed by him. Defendant appeals upon the following grounds:

1. Because the first taxation made by the clerk was in accordance with the former order of Hon. J. B. Kershaw, and his honor erred in refusing to sustain it.

2. Because his honor should have decided that the "thirty dollars" provided for in Judge Kershaw's order was intended to cover all the costs to be allowed to the plaintiff or his attorney to the date of that order.

3. Because, this being a special proceeding, his honor should have decided that there are no "usual costs" which can be allowed to the successful party or his attorney, and that the amount of such costs is in the discretion of the Circuit Judge, except that he cannot exceed the sum fixed by section 321 of the Code of Procedure, and must be settled by him.

4. Because the amount of costs that can be allowed to the plaintiff or his attorney in a proceeding of this kind, being limited by section 321 of the Code of Procedure to thirty dollars, and that amount having been fixed by Judge Kershaw's order, his honor erred in deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to any more costs.

5. Because his honor erred in referring this case back to the clerk to tax the costs, it being the duty of his honor to fix the amount of the plaintiff's costs.

*The defendant further excepts to the taxation of costs made by the clerk on April 22, 1885 (the last adjustment), 1. Because he allowed the plaintiff the following items: Procuring order of injunction, $5; five days' reference before master, $25; motion for receiver, $10; sub-writs, $3. 2. Because the clerk erred in taxing anything more as costs for the plaintiff than the thirty dollars allowed by Judge Kershaw's order. 3. Because the clerk erred in taxing more than thirty dollars as costs for the plaintiff in addition to the amount allowed by the order of Judge Kershaw.

We may say in the outset that we cannot consider exceptions to the taxation of costs by the clerk, the proper course being first to take the judgment of the Circuit Court upon such exceptions, and then appeal from such judgment, if it is supposed to be founded upon any error. It is true, as was held in Dilling, Baker & Co. v. Foster (21 S. C., 334), a taxation of costs made under an erroneous order of the Circuit Court may be practically corrected by an appeal from such order. But no appeal from a taxation of costs by the clerk, or motion to correct the same, can be heard by this court. We are pleased to find, however, that the appellant will suffer no injury by this view, for the same questions raised by the exceptions to the clerk's last taxation are substantially presented by the exceptions to the order of Judge Pressley, which are properly before us for consideration.

That part of Judge Kershaw's order which relates to the costs and disbursements, not having been excepted to or appealed from, must be regarded as the law of this case, and therefore the real question presented by this appeal is whether Judge Pressley has placed the proper construction upon the order of Judge Kershaw, though it will aid us in the consideration of this question to ascertain what is the law in reference to the matter in hand, as the presumption always is that a public officer, and more especially a Circuit Judge, has acted in accordance with law. Hence it is our duty to place such a construction upon the order, if practicable, as will make it conform to, rather than depart from, the law. It is true that Judge Pressley does not, in express terms, undertake to construe the order of Judge Kershaw, and at first view it might seem that his order amounted to nothing more than a direction to the clerk to carry out the order of Judge Kershaw, and, *therefore, affording no ground for appeal, yet when we consider that the clerk had, by his first adjustment of costs, undertaken to carry into effect the order of Judge Kershaw, and in so doing had disallowed the items of costs in controversy, and the exceptions to such adjustment had imputed error to him in disallowing said items, and when we find Judge Pressley sustaining those exceptions, and directing the clerk to tax the costs in accordance with the order of Judge Kershaw, we are bound to conclude that Judge Pressley so construed Judge Kershaw's order as to allow the costs disallowed by the clerk in the first adjustment. So that the question for us to determine is whether such construction was correct.

In construing orders of this kind, we must bear in mind the fact that they are usually drawn by the counsel in the cause, in the hurry of business during the sitting of the court, and that neither counsel nor judge have the time or opportunity to give such critical attention to the phraseology used as to insure technical accuracy. Indeed, there seems to be no little confusion, even in the books, in the use of the terms "costs" and "disbursements," one sometimes being used for the other, and we must look to the sense in which those terms are intended to be used more than to their strict technical signification. The theory seems to have been that the fees of the several officers of court, as well as the witnesses, would be paid by the party at the time he called their services into requisition, and when that is done the amounts thus paid would properly constitute disbursements; but unless this is done we do not see how such fees could be properly classed as disbursements, when nothing has been disbursed; and in such case, which very frequently occurs, we do not see why such fees may not properly be taxed as costs due to the several officers of court. Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C., 58. Indeed, we suppose that a good deal of the confusion in the use of the terms "costs" and "disbursements" has arisen from this conflict between the theory and the practice—the theory being that the fees of the several officers of court and the witnesses are paid by the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, at the time the services are rendered, in which case they would very properly be termed disbursements and taxed as such, in order to reimburse the party for *the outlay he has been required to make; while the practice, in many cases, is that such fees are not paid at the time, but remaining due to the several officers at the termination of the action, are taxed as costs due to such officers.

We do not think, then, that any stress is to be laid upon the manner in which those terms are used in the order which we are called upon to construe, for the allowance is there spoken of as an allowance for disbursements, while in the Code, § 321, such allowance is termed costs, and such it was manifestly intended to be. The order directs "that the plaintiffs be allowed the usual costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk, together with thirty dollars in addition for his disbursements." It is quite clear that the order does not confine the allowance granted the plaintiff to the thirty dollars, but that in addition thereto the plaintiff must be allowed "the usual costs;" and this, we think, is in strict accordance with the provisions of section 321 of the Code, which reads as follows: "The judge may allow to the judgment creditor, or to any party so examined, whether a party to the action or not, witness' fees and disbursements, and a fixed sum in addition, not exceeding thirty dollars, as costs."

It will be observed that this section reads now as it did when the code was originally adopted (see section 327 of the original code), at which time no costs were allowed to the attorneys, but certain fixed allowances were made to the parties for the usual proceedings in an action which were expressly designated as costs, but no fixed allowance was made for supplementary proceedings, and this section was probably inserted for the purpose of supplying that omission, and leaving it to the discretion of the judge, controlled only by a maximum, to fix the amount of such allowance in a supplementary proceeding, which, not being one of the usual proceedings in an action, was not elsewhere provided for. This section having been left unrevoked, after the amendment to the code substituting for the fixed allowances to the parties for the usual proceedings in an action the provision that the attorneys shall be entitled to certain fixed amounts for certain specified services as costs, just as the other officers of court are entitled to fixed amounts for specified services as costs, the effect is that, in supplementary proceedings, a party may be allowed not only the *sum provided for by section 321 of the Code, but also such other costs as may be provided for the several officers of the court, including the attorneys, for any specified services in an action.

It is contended, however, that a supplementary proceeding is not an action, and that as the code only provides for costs "in every civil action commenced or prosecuted in the courts of this State," and makes no special provision for costs in supplementary proceedings except that contained in section 321, no other costs can be taxed in such proceeding. But as is said by Mr. Justice McGowan, when speaking of a supplementary proceeding, in Kennesaw Mills Co. v. Walker, 19 S. C., at page 107: "The proceeding is not technically what is called a special proceeding, but a continuation of the action in which the judgment was recovered, and in one sense a substitute for the former creditor's bill;" though, as is said in Dilling, Baker & Co. v. Foster, 21 S. C., at page 339, "not subject to all the rules governing the chancery practice under a creditor's bill."

This, therefore, being a continuation of an action, it only remains to inquire whether the items of costs, which we think the order of Judge Pressley in effect sanctioned, are allowed by the statute fixing the costs of attorneys. All these items we find expressly provided for in sections 2426 and 2428 of the General Statutes, except the item of $10, allowed for motion for the appointment of a receiver; and finding no warrant for that, it must be disallowed. It is true that the code, in section 328, does provide that costs, not exceeding ten dollars, may be allowed, in the discretion of the court or judge, on any motion; but it is not allowed as a matter of course, but only under the order of the court or judge hearing the motion. In this case, no such order appears, and hence that item cannot be allowed.

The judgment of this court is that so much of the order of Judge Pressley as allows the item in the taxation of costs of ten dollars for motion for receiver be reversed, and that in all other respects the order be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, February, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. L. W. Perrin, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In 1881, the county commissioners of Abbeville let out the contract to build a wooden bridge over Little River at Searls' Mill, in said county, to Catlett Corley, William Harmon, J. T. Jennings, and J. C. Jennings as the contractors, for $556. After the contract was made, it was changed so as to require rock piers, at the additional cost of $60 per pier (being three in number). There were specifications as to the kind of rock and the manner in which the piers were to be built, requiring "good rock that will not crumble, laid solidly in good hydraulic cement, the workmanship to be very substantial and *complete," &c. It was announced that the bridge was finished according to contract, inspected by the county commissioners, and from its external appearance accepted by them in September, 1881, and the claims of the contractors (the whole claim, it seems, was divided among them) were approved by the county commissioners November 7, 1881, and payment in part made, but checks for the balances still due on the contract were not drawn.

Within a few months, during the high waters of January and February, 1882, the bridge fell down. The county commissioners then made a careful examination of the fallen piers, and, as they thought, discovered for the first time that they had not been built according to contract, but, on the contrary, instead of being built solid with good rock laid in cement, only the rim or outer wall was laid in cement, and the hollow filled up with loose rock from the stream; and having, as they supposed, made this discovery, refused to issue the checks for the remainder of the price agreed to be paid. Thereupon the contractors brought this action against the County of Abbeville. The interest of Catlett Corley had been assigned to one Henry Young, and as he would not join in the action as plaintiff, he was made a defendant.

The defendant demurred, on the grounds that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the Court of Common Pleas has not jurisdiction to hear and determine an original action upon a county claim. The presiding judge overruled the demurrers, and sent the case to the jury. They found a verdict for the plaintiffs to the extent of the whole balance of the price agreed upon, and the defendant, County of Abbeville, appeals to this court upon the following grounds: First. Because his honor erred in overruling the demurrers of defendant: 1. That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 2. That the Court of Common Pleas did not have original jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action. And failing in these, then for a new trial. * * *

From the view the court takes of this case, it will not be necessary to consider any of the grounds of appeal, except the first, as to the demurrers. This is the first case in which the question has been made in this court whether, under the constitution of 1868 and the laws since passed, the board of county commissioners have exclusive jurisdiction to audit and provide payment for that class of demands which, being contracted by the commissioners as representing the county, are called "county claims," subject only to the right of appeal; or whether the Court of Common Pleas may take original jurisdiction of such claims and hear and determine them, rejecting or giving judgment against the county precisely as in ordinary cases. There have been cases in which the question might have been made, as for instance, Ostendorff v. Charleston County, 14 S. C., 403; Holmes & Calder v. Same, Ibid., 146; Edmondston v. Aiken County, Ibid., 622; Wheeler v. County of Newberry, 18 Id., 135; and Duke v. Williamsburg County, 21 Id., 414.

But in these cases the point was not raised, and cannot, therefore, be considered as adjudged. This court, in Wheeler v. Newberry, supra, said: "The court has never been required to consider how a creditor, having a claim already audited, should proceed to enforce it against the county—whether, considering the audit as a judgment of the tribunal established for the purpose of deciding county claims, he should seek to enforce it by mandamus, requiring the county commissioners to have the money raised to pay it, or sue upon it in the Court of Common Pleas to get thereby an enforceable judgment against the county. There is some want of uniformity in the practice of the different States upon the subject, and until the point is made and argued before us, we will make no ruling upon it." And in the subsequent case of Duke v. County of Williamsburg, supra, Mr. Justice McIver, who delivered the judgment of the court, said: "No question has been raised as to the form of proceeding in this case, and we shall not volunteer to do so. Whether a person claiming to be the creditor of a county can bring his action in the usual form for the recovery of his alleged debt, except in such cases as the right of action is given by statute, or whether he should not submit his claim for audit to the county commissioners, from whose judgment, if unfavorable to him, he may appeal, and after he has thus established his claim, whether his remedy is not by mandamus to compel the county commissioners to levy a tax to pay the same, is a question upon which we prefer to reserve our judgment," &c.

*The point is now, however, formally made, and it is necessary for us to decide it. The constitution of 1868 made a new distribution of the judicial power of the State. Section 15, article IV., provides that "The courts of common pleas shall have * * exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil cases and actions ex delicto, * * and appellate jurisdiction in all cases as may be provided by law," &c. Section 19, article IV., provides as follows: "The qualified electors of each county shall elect three persons for the term of two years, who shall constitute a board of county commissioners, which shall have jurisdiction over roads, highways, ferries, bridges, and in all matters relating to taxes, disbursements of money for county purposes, and in every other case that may be necessary to the internal improvement and local concerns of the respective counties: Provided, that in all cases there shall be the right of appeal to the State courts."

These sections stand in what is known as the judicial article, and, considered together as parts of the same instrument, seem to show two things: First, that a new body, known as the "board of county commissioners," was then created, having a local but large jurisdiction, having, indeed, entire charge of county affairs as the one administrative body of the county; not only to contract but to "audit" and provide payment for all that class of demands known as "county claims." And second, that these powers are not only original, but in their very nature exclusive; not falling within any other jurisdiction, except as provided by appeal to the State courts. This view is fortified by the fact that at the time the constitution was drafted, giving this right of appeal, the counties of the State were not bodies politic and corporate, and as such capable of being sued directly.

When we look to the acts of the legislature passed to carry into effect the important provision of the constitution creating the board of county commissioners, we think it appears that they were all framed on the line of making one consistent system for the management and control of county affairs, intended to be expeditious, but just, economical, convenient, and complete in itself. See General Statutes, chapter XVI., as to "County Commissioners," and the act of 1882, "to define their duties," appended as a note.

*1. The county commissioners are required annually to make an estimate of what the government of the county will require, and report the number, character, and amount of claims audited for the fiscal year to the comptroller general, who shall transmit the same to the governor, to be by him laid before the legislature, indicating the amount necessary for county purposes to be raised by taxation; and all claims against a county not presented during the fiscal year in which they are contracted or the next thereafter shall be forever barred.

2. It is made the duty of the county commissioners not only to make all contracts in behalf of the county, but to "audit" (or disallow) all county claims, and provide for those approved by giving checks upon the county treasurer. They are allowed to give checks only for legal claims audited by themselves, with the single exception of a judgment recovered against the county in an action ex delicto, brought by express authority of an act of the legislature, which in the case provided for expressly directs that they shall check for such judgment. To this act more particular reference will be hereafter made.

3. The commissioners are in terms forbidden to check for any claims unless they are legal and valid county claims, and there is money in the treasury for the express purpose of paying such claims. And the treasurer is forbidden, under the penalties of misdemeanor, from paying any claims whatever, unless they are approved, audited, and drawn for by the county commissioners.

These constitutional provisions and regulations of law constitute a system as to county claims, in which all questions fall within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, subject only to correction by the right of appeal given. If one holding a county claim may, without filing it in the office prescribed or obtaining "audit," or after audit, upon refusal to pay, go at his pleasure into the Court of Common Pleas and sue the county to judgment, it seems to us that it would tend to derange the system, to produce confusion, and to entail upon the county unnecessary expenses and delays.

But it is said that, by an act of 1868, the counties were made bodies politic and corporate, and may now "sue and be sued." That is true, but we do not see that a subsequent act of the legislature should control the construction of the constitution previously adopted. Besides, the simple fact that counties may now "be sued" determines nothing as to the court or the manner in which it may be done. There is no requirement that it can only be done in the Court of Common Pleas; and we think that, when the holder of a county claim files it for "audit" in the office of the commissioners, he may be said in effect to sue the county, not in the Court of Common Pleas, but in the tribunal specially provided to hear and determine such claims. The legislature has, however, made special provision that certain actions of a particular character—actions ex delicto for damages on account of defective "repairs on highways," the destruction of houses by mobs, &c.—may be brought directly against the county in the Court of Common Pleas. See Gen. Stat., §§ 1087, 2571, and 2572.

It seems to us that this special permission as to particular actions authorizes the inference that such permission was necessary, and that no such right exists beyond the special cases thus provided for. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. This view is aided by the terms of those special acts, "may recover in an action against the county the amount of damage fixed by the finding of a jury, * * may claim and prosecute the county in which the offence shall be committed for any damage he shall sustain thereby; and the said county shall be responsible for the payment of such damages as the court may award, which shall be paid by the county treasurer of such county on a warrant drawn by the county commissioners thereof, which warrant shall be drawn by the county commissioners as soon as a certified copy of the judgment roll is delivered to them for file in their office." No such special direction as to the manner of payment exists as to any other judgment against the county, and the fair inference is that none such were expected or intended to be rendered. The State cannot be sued, nor can the county as a part of the State, without permission given. Young v. City of Charleston, 20 S. C., 116 [47 Am. Rep. 827].

It is, however, further said, that the court of Common Pleas is a court of general jurisdiction, and as such has jurisdiction of all matters not given exclusively to an inferior tribunal or expressly forbidden to that court. The principle contended for may *be correct, but, as we think, does not apply to this case. Jurisdiction is expressly given to the board of county commissioners, but not to the Court of Common Pleas, without, however, any express negation. Under some circumstances, this might give the Court of Common Pleas concurrent jurisdiction; but in this case we think it does not. First, the same instrument (constitution) defines the powers and duties of both, giving original jurisdiction to the board of county commissioners with only the right of appeal to the Court of Common Pleas; and, second, the board of county commissioners was created by the constitution as a new body, with certain local powers and for certain special purposes, and in such case the powers given and the mode and manner of their exercise are in their nature exclusive. "It is the general rule, that if an affirmative statute, which is introductive of a new law, direct a thing to be done in a particular manner, that thing shall not, even although there are no negative words, to be done in any other manner." Sternberger v. McSweeney, 14 S. C., 35; Kennedy v. Reames, 15 Id., 552; Ex parte Lewie, 17 Id., 154. In this latter case, the Chief Justice said: "The Court of Common Pleas is the general fountain of justice, and when the rights of a citizen, either derived from the common law or the statutes, are invaded and the power to protect is conferred upon no special jurisdiction, he may seek redress in that court. But where rights are created by statute, to be obtained and protected in a special manner specified in the act and by a special tribunal, no other court can assume jurisdiction. On the contrary, parties interested must pursue the course prescribed, and must seek the aid of the tribunal upon which the power to grant or protect has been conferred, &c. Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C., 232," &c.

It may assist us in testing the right claimed to bring an original action in the Court of Common Pleas upon an ordinary ex contractu county claim to inquire how a judgment rendered in such a case could be collected. Certainly the execution could not be levied on the private property of the citizens of the county, nor could it be levied upon the public funds or property of the county.

see Gen. Stat., §§ 617, 440. "All county poor farms, poor houses, and hospitals, court houses, jails, and all other public property of every kind or description, actually used as such, are *forever exempt from attachment, levy, and sale, on account of any judgment, lien, or claim whatsoever against the county to which they or any of them belong," &c. The judgment creditors in this case could not claim the benefit of the express statutory provision made for the payment of judgments recovered in the special cases of tort heretofore referred to. It would, therefore, be necessary for them to go back to the county commissioners to obtain a warrant on the county treasurer for the payment of the judgment, as the said treasurer is positively forbidden, under penalties, to pay any kind of county claim, whether in judgment or not, except upon the warrant of the county commissioners. In case such warrant was refused, they might, as suggested in the argument, apply for a writ of mandamus to test the question, whether the board of county commissioners, having already audited their claim, are not bound to issue a warrant for its payment, and that right they had as clearly as now before they commenced this action in the Court of Common Pleas. Moses Mand., 104; Boyce v. Supervisors of Cayuga County, 20 Barb. [N. Y.] 294; People v. Supervisors of Chenango, 4 Seld. [S. N. Y.] 318; State ex rel. Marshall v. Starling, 13 S. C., 266; and In re Conant's Claims, 21 Id., 364.

It seems to us that an original action in the Court of Common Pleas upon an ordinary county claim is not only unauthorized by the system provided for the settlement of county claims, but can be productive of no advantage whatever.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, without prejudice to the plaintiffs to enforce their claim by other proper proceedings, as they may be advised.

Before Pressley, J., Anderson, February, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. T. C. Ligon, for appellants.

April 20, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiffs, as heirs at law of Robert Spence, sr., who died intestate in October, 1870, bring this action against the defendants, all of whom are heirs at law of said Robert Spence, sr., except the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, for the partition and sale of a tract of land alleged to constitute a part of the real estate of said intestate. They allege substantially that soon after the death of intestate, the defendant, Robert Spence, jr., filed his petition in the Court of Probate for the partition and sale of the real estate of said intestate, to which they as well as the other heirs at law of said Robert Spence, sr., were made parties; that under an order of said court the greater part of the real estate of the intestate was sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts; that the tract of land which constitutes the subject matter of the present action, owned by the said Robert Spence, sr., at the time of his death, "was, by fraud on the part of the said Robert Spence, jr., and by mistake on the part of the other parties to that proceeding, entirely omitted from said proceeding, and has never been partitioned among the parties thereto;" that the said

Robert Spence, jr., did thereafter, "to wit, on the day of A. D. 187 , fraudulently convey to J. P. Reed, as trustee for the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, the aforesaid tract of land," and that the said Browns, ever since the date of said conveyance, have been in possession of said land, enjoying the rents and profits thereof; that the trustee, Reed, is dead and no one has been appointed in his place, and that some of the heirs at law of the intestate are minors. The relief demanded is that the land be sold and the proceeds divided amongst the heirs at law of said Robert Spence, sr., or their assigns, and that the defendants, Robert Spence, jr., B. F. Brown, and Sallie V. Brown, account for the rents and profits of said land during the time it has been in their possession.

A formal answer was filed by the minor defendants through their guardian ad litem, and the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, put in an answer, the purport of which is not stated, except that it contains a demurrer, upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them.

On March 6, 1884, an order was granted by Judge Hudson, "that it be referred to W. W. Humphreys, master, to take testimony, and try all issues of law and fact, and report the same to this court." On January 21, 1885, the master, on the motion of plaintiffs, granted an order discontinuing the action as to the defendant, Robert Spence, jr., he being then dead, and the only demand made against him being for rents and profits—he having conveyed all his interest in the land to B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown. On January 17, 1885, a notice was served on the attorneys for the Browns by the plaintiffs' attorney, requiring them to produce a certain deed to Robert Spence, at a reference to be held by the master on January 19, 1885, "for the use and inspection of the plaintiffs herein." The said defendants having refused to produce the deed, the master, on February 10, 1885, made an order requiring the defendant, B. F. Brown, and his attorneys, "forthwith to produce said deed for the use of the plaintiffs as evidence in this case." From this order the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, appealed to the Circuit Court, and Judge Pressley set aside the order of the master, upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction to grant such an order. Immediately following this order of Judge Pressley, without further statement or explanation in the "Case," comes the following statement: "The court then ruled that the demurrer was first in order, and after argument the following order was made," to wit, an order sustaining the demurrer.

The plaintiffs appeal upon the following grounds:

1. Because his honor erred in calling up the demurrer for argument, the case being at the time under reference before the master by a previous order of his honor, Judge J. H. Hudson, and no report of the case having been made by the master back to this court.

2. Because his honor erred in sustaining the demurrer on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown.

3. Because his honor erred in holding that the complaint did not sufficiently connect B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown with the alleged fraud, and that the allegations must be made connecting them directly with the fraud, and state that said fraud was discovered within four years before the commencement of this action.

4. Because his honor erred in not holding that the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, were estopped from raising the demurrer, they having allowed the case to be referred to the master, without objections, to try all issues of law and fact, and report the same to the court.

5. Because his honor erred in holding that the master was without jurisdiction to grant the order requiring B. F. Brown and his attorneys, to produce the deed of George S. Smith to Robert Spence, dated December 24, 1847.

6. Because his honor erred in holding that his honor, Judge J. H. Hudson, was without jurisdiction to refer the case to the master to try all issues of law and fact, and that the master in this case could only take the testimony and report the same to this court, and that this case was still in the hands of this court, and not in the hands of the master, for determination.

It will be observed that while these grounds of appeal question the right of the Circuit Judge to hear the question raised by the demurrer pending the reference of all the issues to the master, they do not, as in the case of Smythe & Adger v. Brown [25 S. C. 89], decided at the present term, question his right to hear an appeal from an intermediate order of the master before his report has been made, and hence that question will not be considered here. The first inquiry presented by the appeal is whether the Circuit Judge could hear and determine the question raised by the demurrer after all the issues in the action, both of law and fact, had been referred to the master for trial in advance of his report and exceptions thereto. Exactly how the question presented by the demurrer was brought before the Circuit Judge, does not appear. There are, it is true, some statements made in the argument of counsel as to this matter, but these, as we have frequently had occasion to say, we cannot consider, but must confine ourselves to the "Case" as prepared for argument here; and there we find nothing to show how the question came up. All that we know is, that it did not come up upon the master's report and exceptions thereto, for it is stated in the "Case" that upon the notice of appeal from the order of the master requiring the defendant, B. F. Brown, and his attorneys to produce the deed above referred to, "the master held that the appeal suspended the further hearing by him until the appeal was disposed of by the Circuit Court."

This being the state of the case, we do not think that the question presented by the demurrer was properly before Judge Pressley for consideration and determination. This was one of the issues presented by the pleadings, for it is stated in the "Case" that an answer was filed by the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, "containing, amongst other things, the following demurrer," to wit, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against said defendants. And after all the issues of law and fact had been referred to the master for trial, we do not see how another Circuit Judge could *try one of those issues until the previous order of reference had been revoked, unless such order was so wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the judge who granted it as to render it a nullity. It is assumed in the sixth ground of appeal that Judge Pressley did hold that the order was void for want of jurisdiction, though this does not appear in the "Case" as the reason why Judge Pressley held that the demurrer was properly before him.

But, as a question of jurisdiction may be raised at any time, we will proceed to consider whether the order of reference was void for want of jurisdiction. This being an order of a court of general jurisdiction—the Court of Common Pleas—need not, like a proceeding in an inferior court, show upon its face all the facts necessary to give jurisdiction, but those facts, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, will be assumed. Now, there is no doubt that Judge Hudson, holding the Court of Common Pleas, had the power to grant an order of reference in the case, under certain circumstances, and he having granted it, we are bound to assume that he first ascertained the existence of those circumstances which would authorize him to grant such an order. It is true that it does not appear upon the face of the order that the defendants consented in writing to the order; but this is not necessary, as their written consent, which is all that the code requires, may have been otherwise given, and we are bound to assume, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that it was so given, especially when it is not suggested, even in argument, that any objection was ever made to the order of reference on that or any other ground, and, on the contrary, it appears that defendants recognized its validity by attending the reference, without protest, held in pursuance of such order.

One Circuit Judge cannot disregard an order made by his predecessor, unless it is void for want of jurisdiction, and, therefore, we do not think that the issue of law presented by the demurrer was properly before Judge Pressley for determination, and hence, upon this ground, his order sustaining the demurrer must be set aside. To say nothing else, it might work great injustice to a party to be called on suddenly to argue a question of law before the Circuit Judge, when he supposed, and had a right to suppose, that such issue had been previously referred to the master to be *heard by him in the first instance. This case differs from the cases of Kennerty v. Etiwan Phosphate Company, 17 S. C., 411 [43 Am. Rep. 607], and Davis v. McDuffie, 18 Id., 495; for there the cases were properly before the Circuit Judge for hearing, while here, as we have seen, this case was not properly before him, except, perhaps, upon the single question presented by the appeal from the order of the master requiring defendants to produce a certain deed.

Under this view, the question whether upon the merits the demurrer was properly sustained, does not arise; but, as that question has been argued, it may save another appeal to consider it now. Even assuming that the allegations with respect to the alleged fraud in the conveyance from Robert Spence, jr., to Reed as trustee for the Browns are insufficient to warrant a court in setting aside such conveyance, we do not see how it follows from this that no cause of action is stated in the complaint. Eliminating from the complaint all the allegations of fraud, its statements are substantially as follows: that Robert Spence, sr., being seized and possessed of the land in question, departed this life intestate in October, 1870, leaving, as his heirs at law, the plaintiffs and the defendants, other than the two Browns; that soon after his death his lands, under proceedings in the Court of Probate, were sold, but that, by mistake, the tract of land now in controversy was omitted from said proceedings, and has never been partitioned amongst the heirs of the intestate; that Robert Spence, jr., one of the heirs, sold and conveyed said tract of land to J. P. Reed as trustee for the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, who are now in possession of said land, receiving the rents and profits thereof.

Now, if these facts be true, as they must be assumed to be, in considering the question presented by the demurrer, we do not see why a case for partition is not properly presented. If the land belonged to the intestate at the time of his death, then clearly one of his heirs, Robert Spence, jr., could only convey his interest in the land, even though his deed might purport to convey the entire interest to Reed as trustee; and this would constitute him, or his cestuis que trust, the Browns, if the statute executed the use, tenants in common with the plaintiffs and the other heirs of the intestate, and as such amenable to the demand of *the plaintiffs for partition. Indeed, we do not know that it was any part of the object of the complaint to set aside the conveyance from Robert Spence, jr., to Reed as trustee for the Browns, on the ground of fraud. No such relief is demanded in the prayer of the complaint, and, on the contrary, the prayer is that the proceeds of the sale of the land be distributed amongst the heirs at law of the said Robert Spence, sr., or their assigns, and in the order which the plaintiffs offered discontinuing the action against Robert Spence, jr., the validity of such conveyance seems to be expressly recognized. And if the fact be, as alleged in the complaint, that the land belonged to the intestate at the time of his death, then, as Robert Spence, jr., could only convey his interest or share to Reed as trustee for the Browns, we do not see what possible interest the plaintiffs could have in setting aside such conveyance.

It seems to us, therefore, that all the allegations in the complaint with respect to fraud were wholly unnecessary to the real object of the action, and were probably inserted only as one of the reasons why this tract of land was omitted from the proceeding in the Court of Probate. It may be that the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown, have been in adverse possession long enough to give them title, but that is a matter to be set up in their answer, and cannot be considered under the demurrer, for it does not appear in the complaint when they went into possession, the date of the conveyance being left blank, and there is certainly no statement as to the character of their possession. It may be, too, that, when the terms of the trusts declared in the conveyance to Reed are made to appear, it will be necessary that the trustee should be made a party, but that also is a matter for the answer; for taking the naked fact, as stated in the complaint, that the conveyance was made "to J. P. Reed as trustee for the defendants, B. F. Brown and Sallie V. Brown," without more, there can be no doubt that the statute would execute the use, and vest the legal title in the Browns, in which event the trustee would not be a necessary party.

The only remaining inquiry is whether the Circuit Judge erred in setting aside the order of the master, requiring the defendant, B. F. Brown, and his attorneys to produce

had no authority to grant such an order. That officer being constituted a special tribunal, as it were by statute, can only exercise such powers as are conferred upon him by the statute law. We are unable to find any law investing him with the power to grant such an order. It is certainly not embraced in the powers conferred upon that officer either by section 791 of the General Statutes or by section 294 of the Code; but, as we learn from the argument of the appellants' counsel, the power is claimed under section 389 of the Code. The powers conferred by that section are, however, in express terms conferred upon "the court before which an action is pending or a judge or justice thereof," and not upon any other officer. We do not think that the master could claim the power in question under that section.

Indeed, it is not by any means clear that the provisions of section 389 would authorize even the court or a judge thereof to grant an order of the character of that now under consideration. The object of that section seems to be to enable a party to obtain an inspection or copy of some documentary evidence which his adversary expects to use on the trial, and not to obtain from his adversary evidence for his own use, for that he could obtain by a subpoena duces tecum or by notice to produce a paper, in default of which secondary evidence of its contents would be offered. Here the order was "to produce said deed for the use of the plaintiffs as evidence in this case;" and it is at least questionable whether the object of the section was to force one party to furnish testimony to be used by the other. But, as this point has not been argued, we do not propose to decide it now, but rest our decision upon the ground that the section does not confer the power in question upon the master.

The judgment of this court, is that the order of the Circuit Judge sustaining the demurrer be reversed, and that his order setting aside the order of the master requiring the defendant, B. F. Brown, and his attorneys to produce the deed mentioned in the order be affirmed.

The opinion states the case. The appeal was from the following Circuit decree:

The act of 1879 (5 Stat., 111) has been much discussed by our courts, in so far as it relates to the order of payment of the debts of a decedent. The case of Tunno v. Happpoldt (2 McCord, 188), followed by the case of Kinard v. Young (2 Rich, Eq., 258), in construing the language of that act, decides that a mortgage is a preferred claim only so far as it is a lien upon specific property, and when that lien is exhausted, the debt secured by it took rank according to the nature of the instrument by which it was evidenced. As thus declared the law stood (until October 14, 1875, when the case of Edwards v. Sanders (6 S. C., 316) was filed, which announced a different rule as derived from the act of *1789, which had at that time been incorporated in the revised statutes of 1872. By this latter case it was held that after the specific lien of a judgment had been exhausted by foreclosure and sale, the mortgage still took rank amongst judgments and executions as a mortgage, and this without any reference to the nature of the instrument by which the debt was evidenced.

While this case stood as the declared rule of construction of the statute, the referee held that the mortgages set up in this case were preferred claims as such. Before this case came on to be heard upon the exceptions to the referee's report, the case of Piester v. Piester, 22 S. C., 139 [53 Am. Rep. 711], was filed, which reverses the rule as laid down in Edwards v. Sanders and re-establishes the rule as declared in Tunno v. Happpoldt and Kinard v. Young, supra. Of course, the mortgages in this case, then, are not preferred claims, as such, unless there is some reason why they are not under the operation of Piester v. Piester. Counsel accordingly argue that the mortgages here are not under the operation of this latter case, but are to be governed by the rule as stated in the case of Edwards v. Sanders, because that was the declared rule, by the court of last resort, while their mortgages were in existence, and rely upon the case of Herndon v. Moore, and the cases there cited, to support this position. 18 S. C., 339.

As is well known to the profession, the Supreme Court of this State, in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell (10 S. C., 317), decided that the Probate Court had no jurisdiction in matters of partition of real property of deceased persons, and that the act of the general assembly of 1868 providing for the exercise of such jurisdiction by that court was unconstitutional. The Court of Probate, provided for in the constitution of 1868, was organized by act of the general assembly of the same year, and immediately proceeded to exercise jurisdiction in the partition of real estates in pursuance of the power provided for in the organizing act. The trial judge, Hudson, J., in his opinion in the case of Herndon v. Moore, supra, says: "No question was made as to the constitutionality of the act. The profession at large and the Probate Courts and the Circuit Courts and the Supreme Court, all recognized and acted upon a conceded jurisdiction to Courts of Probate in matters of parties and rights vested, and innocent purchasers, acting under this common error, shared by legislatures, lawyers, and courts, have become involved." These facts are held by Hudson, J., sufficient to sustain the validity of sales, or at least to render them unimpeachable, made under partition proceedings in the Probate Court in the exercise of a jurisdiction provided for in an act of general assembly decided to be unconstitutional—the ground of the opinion of Hudson, J., being that "a common error makes law."

The Supreme Court sustains the Circuit Judge in this view, and rests the affirming opinion mainly upon the remark of Lord Ellenborough in the case of Isherwood v. Oldknow, 3 M. & S., 396 (55 Geo. III.), who says: "It has sometimes been said communis error facit jus, but I say communis opinio is evidence of what the law is, not where it is an opinion merely, speculative and theoretical, floating in the minds of persons, but where it has been made the ground work and substratum of practice." The Supreme Court held, in Herndon v. Moore, supra, that the facts show that an opinion favorable to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court was the "ground work and substratum of practice" for many years, and therefore sustain the validity of the proceedings. With a view to a clear apprehension of the rule, it may be stated thus: where under a prevailing and common mistake as to the rule of law contracts are made by which rights are acquired and obligations incurred, which would not have been made but for the existence of the common error, such contracts will be upheld, and rights and liabilities under them enforced because the law will not allow itself to be made an instrument of fraud and injustice.

Now, in the case at bar the mortgage of Hopkins, Dwight & Co. was executed at a time when it had been declared by the court of last resort, that mortgages were preferred claims against the general assets even after its specific lien had been exhausted. But it does not appear that the contract had been made and the mortgage executed under a common belief in the soundness of the rule declared to be the law at that time, or that the rule so *declared had been "the ground-work and substratum of practice," or that the practice of taking mortgages would not have been the same if the rule as stated in Tunno v. Hapgoodt, supra, had never been changed. It may be added that the rule laid down in Edwards v. Sanders cannot be considered as within the description of the words communis error facit jus, because McGowan, A. J., in the opinion in the case of Piester v. Piester, states substantially that the profession in the State had never accepted that rule as sound construction.

The rule, therefore, as stated in Piester v.

Piester is binding upon this court, and there is nothing to take the mortgages in this case from under its operation. It follows that the mortgages here must take rank as against the assets in the hands of the administrator according to the nature of the instruments the mortgage was given to secure, and that the specific lien of the mortgages having been exhausted, they are no longer preferred claims as mortgages. I have not discussed the facts relating particularly to the mortgage set up by Mr. Kerr, because he can stand at least on no better ground than the other mortgage, his mortgage having been executed before the decision in the case of Edwards v. Sanders was filed.

From this decree, Hopkins, Dwight & Trowbridge appealed upon the following grounds:

I. For that his honor, the presiding judge, held that the lien of the mortgage held and owned by Hopkins, Dwight & Co.'s successor has been exhausted, and that the debt secured thereby is no longer a preferred claim, and can only be proved and take rank against the assets in the hands of the administrator, according to the nature of the instrument evidencing the debt and the statute relating thereto.

II. For that his honor, the presiding judge, did not hold that the rank given by the referee to the debt, and mortgage securing the same, of Hopkins, Dwight & Co.'s successor, being in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court in force at the time of the commencement of the action and of the finding of the referee, must be sustained.

III. For that his honor, the presiding judge, did not hold that the law in force at the time of the execution of the note and mort*gage securing the same, and at the time of the death of intestate, should determine the rank of the debt as a claim against the estate.

IV. For that his honor, the presiding judge, held that there was no proof that said note and mortgage were executed by the parties with reference to the decision of Edwards v. Sanders; whereas he should have held that the parties were to be presumed to have contracted with reference to the law as expounded by our highest court at the time.

V. For that the ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, that the rank of appellants' claim should be determined by the decision of Piester et al., Ex'rs, v. Piester et al., rendered by the Supreme Court, after the execution of the contract, after the death of the deceased, after the commencement of this action, and after the referee's decision upon the claim, was giving said decision of Piester et al., Ex'rs, v. Piester et al., a force and effect in violation of sec. 10, art. I., of the constitution of the United States.

VI. For that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Piester et al. Ex'rs, v.

Piester et al., as (or if) applied to appellants' claim, is in violation of section 10, article I., of the constitution of the United States.

An appeal was also taken by W. H. Kerr, clerk, and Mrs. Melton and her children, but the grounds are substantially the same as those above stated.

Messrs. J. H. Rion, A. S. Douglass, and S. P. Hamilton, for appellants.

April 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case, so far as necessary for a proper understanding of the points made by the several appeals, are substantially as follows: On July 9, 1876, Geo. W. Melton died intestate, and his estate being found to be largely insolvent, this action was commenced in July, 1877, to marshal the assets. Creditors were called in and numerous claims were established, but the only ones that need be specially stated are the following: a note under seal to G. R. Ratchford & Co., bearing date February 22, 1859; a note under seal to Dr. A. P. Wylie, bearing date May 3, 1872; a note under seal to Samuel D. Melton, bearing date February 1, 1871; a bond, secured by a mortgage of real estate to Duvall, sheriff, dated June 4, 1875, which has been transferred to the defendant, Kerr, as clerk of the court for Fairfield County; and a bond, secured by a mortgage of real estate to Hopkins, Dwight & Co., dated May 19, 1876.

The mortgage to Hopkins, Dwight & Co. has been foreclosed, and the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises being insufficient to pay the debt, the balance is now set up against the general assets, and preference for it is claimed as a mortgage debt. The land covered by the Kerr mortgage was sold under an order in this cause before Kerr became a party by proving his mortgage debt; and after that sale, Kerr not having got the proceeds, he brought his action to foreclose his mortgage against the purchaser at the sale made under the order in this cause, and the land was again sold but the proceeds of this last sale being insufficient to pay his debt, the balance is now set up as a mortgage debt against the general assets. The Circuit Judge held that the liens of the two mortgages having both been exhausted, the rank of these debts must be determined by the nature of the obligations which they were given to secure, and cannot be classed as mortgages. The appellants question the correctness of this ruling, and the defendant, Kerr, also appeals upon the ground that the Circuit Judge erred in not holding "That so much of the proceeds arising from the sale of the mortgaged premises under the order of the court in this action as are in the hands of the clerk of this court be applied to said mortgage debt."

In relation to this last mentioned ground of appeal, we have only to say that we are unable to discover where any such question was made in the court below. It does not appear that the referee ruled, or was asked to rule, upon it, and no such question was considered or passed upon by the Circuit Judge, and therefore we do not see how we can consider it. There is nothing in the "Case," as prepared for argument here, to show that an order directing the proceeds of the first sale to be applied to the Kerr mortgage was ever applied for. Whether such an order should be granted, or whether Kerr has elected to ignore the first sale by bringing his action to foreclose his mortgage against the purchaser at such sale, and thereby lost the right to claim the proceeds, or whether the purchaser at that sale may not have equities which entitle him to be heard, are all questions upon which we do not desire to be understood as intimating any opinion, inasmuch as we do not think the question presented by this ground of appeal is properly before us.

The Circuit Judge based his decision upon the main point involved in these appeals, that is, as to the rank of the claims of Hopkins, Dwight & Co. and Kerr, clerk, upon a recent decision of this court in the case of Piester v. Piester (22 S. C., 139 [53 Am. Rep. 711]); and there can be no doubt that if that case applies to this, it fully sustains the decree of the Circuit Judge. The appellants, however, contend that the case of Piester v. Piester cannot be so applied, for the reason that to so apply it would impair the obligation of contracts or would divest vested rights, inasmuch as at the time of the death of the intestate, and at the time of the making of one of the contracts in question—that of Hopkins, Dwight & Co.—the law, as then declared by the case of Edwards v. Sanders (6 S. C., 316), required that the balances due on these two debts should be ranked as mortgages, and as such entitled to priority over specialty debts; and that the subsequent change in the law, as it is called, by the decision in Piester v. Piester, cannot have the effect of divesting the rights of these appellants which became vested at the time of the death of the intestate, under the law as it was then declared to be.

For a clearer understanding of the questions raised, it may be well to repeat here the dates of the several transactions and matters referred to. The date of the sealed note to Ratchford & Co., one of the respondents, is February 22, 1859; the sealed note to S. D. Melton, February 1, 1871; the sealed note to Wylie, May 3, 1872; the Kerr bond and mortgage, June 4, 1875; the bond and mortgage to Hopkins, Dwight & Co., May 19, 1876; the death of the intestate, July 9, 1876: the decision *in the case of Edwards v. Sanders was filed October 14, 1875, though the book of reports in which it is found was not published until some time in the year 1877; and the decision in the case of Piester v. Piester filed January 10, 1885, and the decree appealed from May 20, 1885.

The construction which is now placed upon the statute prescribing the order in which the debts of a decedent must be paid is the same as that which was adopted by the law court in the case of Tunno v. Hapoldt (2 McCord, 188), as far back as 1822, and reaffirmed by the Court of Equity in the case of Kinard v. Young (2 Rich. Eq., 247), in 1846. Thus the law stood unquestioned, so far as we are informed, down to the year 1875, when the decision in Edwards v. Sanders, supra, was made, overruling the two former cases, and placing upon the statute the construction now contended for by the appellants. This last named decision does not seem to have been followed in a single instance; and from what is said in the case of Piester v. Piester, it would seem to have been never satisfactory to the profession, and that, at the first opportunity which was afforded, it was overruled, by the legislature, in the meantime, having, by the act of 1878 (16 Stat., 686), shown its dissatisfaction with the construction therein adopted by declaring: "That in the administration of the assets of a decedent, mortgages shall not be entitled to a priority over rents, debts by specialty, or debts by simple contract, except as to the particular parts of the estate affected by the liens of such mortgages. That after the property covered by the liens is exhausted, the grade of the demand shall be determined by the nature of the instrument which the mortgage was given to secure." It is true that in the case of Piester v. Piester, no express reference is made to the difference in the phraseology of the original act of 1789 and that adopted when it was incorporated in the general statutes of 1872, upon which stress seems to be laid in the argument of one of the counsel for appellants, but the whole subject was carefully considered before any conclusion was reached. Nor do we find in the case of Edwards v. Sanders that any allusion was made to such change in the phraseology as a reason for a change in the construction of the act.

the case of Piester v. Piester effect such a change in the law as would forbid its application to the case under consideration, because it would impair the obligation of a contract or would divest rights vested under the law as declared in the case of Edwards v. Sanders? As we have seen, the proper construction of the statute in question had been settled, for a long series of years, by decisions of both the courts of final resort in this State, in accordance with the view now declared to be the proper construction of that statute; and it seems to us that it would be going very far to say that a single isolated decision, never recognized or followed in any subsequent case, and never recommending itself to the approval of the profession, should be regarded as having the effect of changing the law; on the contrary, whatever may be the opinions of individuals as to its correctness, it must be regarded as an erroneous declaration of what was the law, and as only the law of the particular case in which it was made.

We do not think that the case of Herndon v. Moore (18 S. C., 339), relied on by the appellants, is applicable here. In that case, there were many potential elements, such as long and universal acquiescence, sales made, and money paid, which are not found here. Moreover, it will be observed that the majority of the court concurred only in the result, and hence that case can only be regarded as authority on the precise question therein adjudged, as presented under the special circumstances therein stated.

It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States have, in numerous cases, held that where a contract is valid at the time it is made, under the laws of the State as then expounded, its validity or obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent judicial decision giving a different exposition of the law; and this court has, in two cases (The Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C., 282, and Whaley v. Gaillard, 21 Id., 572), deferred to the authority of that court in that class of cases which involve the question whether a particular law or decision is in violation of that clause of the constitution which forbids a State from passing any law impairing the obligation of a contract. But even in the Supreme Court of the United States this doctrine is confined to cases of contract, and even in such cases it is, at least, doubtful whether it would be *applied where, at the time the contract was made, the law had been declared only by a single isolated case, never recognized or followed, and overruled at the first opportunity presented. See the cases of Ohio Life and Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How., 432 [14 L. Ed. 997]; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall., 175 [17 L. Ed. 520]; Lee County v. Rogers, 7 Wall. 181 [19 L. Ed. 160]; Butz v. City of Muscatine, 8 Wall. 575 [19 L. Ed. 490]; The City v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 477 [19 L. Ed. 725]; Olcott v. The Supervisors, 16 Wall. 678 [21 L. Ed. 382].

Assuming, then, for the sake of the argument only, that there was a change in the law by the decision in the case of Piester v. Piester, before the doctrine above cited from the Supreme Court of the United States could be applied in this case, it must appear that this is a case of contract, and that to give effect to such change in the law would impair the obligation of such contract. We do not see that the law, as declared in Piester v. Piester, impairs or in any way affects the validity or obligation of any contract. It does not purport to interfere in any respect with the validity or binding obligation of any contract set up by the appellants. It simply declares the proper construction of a statute prescribing the order in which the debts of a decedent are to be paid.

In Harrison v. Sterry (5 Cranch, 289 [3 L. Ed. 104]), the question was as to the right of the United States to priority under an act of congress. It was contended that as the contract was made with foreigners, in a foreign country, the law of the place where the contract was made must govern, and under that law no such priority was recognized. But the court held otherwise. Marshall, C. J., while recognizing the doctrine that the lex loci contractus governed in expounding the contract, adds: "But the right of priority forms no part of the contract itself. It is extrinsic, and is rather a personal privilege dependent on the law of the place where the property lies and where the court sits which is to decide the cause. In the familiar case of the administration of the estate of a deceased person, the assets are always distributed according to the dignity of the debt, as regulated by the law of the country where the representative of the deceased acts, and from which he derives his powers, not by the law of the country where the contract was made." This language is quoted with approval in the subsequent case of Smith v. Union Bank of Georgetown, 5 Peters, 518 [8 L. Ed. 212].

*We do not see, then, how any change in the law prescribing the order in which debts of a decedent are to be paid can be said to impair the obligation of any contract by which such debts were created. But even if such should be the case, it seems to us that the practical result in this case would be the same as that reached by the Circuit Judge. For if, as we concede, parties are to be presumed to contract with reference to the law as it exists at the time the contract is entered, and if the law fixing the order in which debts of a decedent are to be paid enters into and forms a part of the contract by which such debts were created, then it follows necessarily that the respondents, Ratchford & Co., Dr. Wylie, and S. D. Melton, whose debts were created at a time when, under the decisions of Tunno v. Hapoldt and Kinard v. Young, they were entitled to priority over the appellants, they could not be deprived of such priority by the subsequent change in the law, as it is called, by the decision in the case of Edwards v. Sanders, for the fact that the intestate did not die until after the so called change was made could not affect the validity of contracts made before that time; for certainly a circumstance occurring after a contract has been made cannot be said to enter into or form a part of such contract.

But, as we have said, we do not see that any change in the law prescribing the order for the payment of the debts of a decedent can be properly said to impair the obligation of any contract; and, therefore, whatever other objection may be urged, it is not amenable to the charge that it violates those clauses of the constitution of this State and the United States which forbid the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

It is contended, however, that upon the death of a decedent, the rights of his creditors to the payment of their debts, according to the law then in force, become vested, and that such vested rights cannot be impaired or taken away by any subsequent change in the law. Applying this doctrine to the facts of this case, appellants insist that under the law, as it was declared to be by the case of Edwards v. Sanders, at the time of the death of the intestate, they were entitled to priority, and that any subsequent change in the law cannot deprive them of such priority. Without repeating here what we have said above (that we do not assent to the fundamental proposition upon which the doctrine contended for rests, to wit, that the law ever was as it was incorrectly announced to be in Edwards v. Sanders), we will, for the sake of argument only, assume the contrary, and proceed to consider the question whether the appellants can claim such vested right of priority as that it cannot be divested by any change in the law.

We do not understand that there is anything in the constitution of the United States which forbids a State from enacting a retrospective law, or a law divesting a vested right, provided in so doing the obligation of a contract is not impaired. Watson v. Mercer, 8 Peters, 88 [8 L. Ed. 876]; Jackson v. Lamphire, 3 Pet. 280 [7 L. Ed. 679]; Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Pet. 380 [7 L. Ed. 458]; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420 [9 L. Ed. 773]; Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. 68 [20 L. Ed. 513]. Nor is there any provision in the constitution of this State, as in some of the other States, forbidding the enactment of retrospective laws, or any provision which, in express terms forbids the enactment of a law divesting vested rights, though certain safeguards are thrown around such rights by the provisions of sections 14 and 23 of article I. of the constitution.

In the case of Miles v. King (5 S. C., 146), it was held that the act of 1866, which required all instruments in writing of which a record is required by law, and of which the record has been lost or destroyed, but the original preserved, to be again recorded within a specified time; otherwise, that they should not prevail as liens against subsequent purchasers or creditors without notice, was a constitutional and valid law. Now, in that case the plaintiff, by recording his mortgage, which was executed in 1855, under the law then of force, had acquired a vested right, so to speak, of priority over all subsequent purchasers and creditors, and yet it was held that such vested right was divested by his failure to comply with the requirements of the subsequent act of 1866. In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Moses, C. J., uses this language: "The general assembly has power to divest vested rights, and to enact statutes retrospective in their action, provided they do not impair the obligation of a contract." And again: "A vested right may be divested by the legislature, unless it exists by virtue of or in the nature of a contract."

*Now, while we are not prepared to indorse this language without some qualifications, as it would, in its unqualified form, imply that the legislature had power to divest a vested right of property: yet we agree that every vested right, so-called, is not beyond the reach of the legislature. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to define precisely those rights which are so vested as to be protected from legislative interference, as is shown in the discussion of this subject by that eminent author, Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, and we shall not undertake to do so on the present occasion. It is sufficient for us to say, that the right of priority given to certain classes of creditors by the statute prescribing the order in which the assets of a decedent's estate shall be applied to the payment of his debts is a mere direction to the executor or administrator, as the case may be, as to the manner in which he shall administer such assets, which is at all times subject to legislative control, and does not confer any such vested right upon the creditors as to place it beyond such control.

This seems to have been the principle upon which the Supreme Court of the United States acted in Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, 2 Peters, 492 [7 L. Ed. 496]. In that case, an act of 1795, which seems to have been of force at the time of the death of the intestate, and at the time letters of administration upon his estate were granted, authorized administrators to sell lands for the payment of debts. This act was repealed on June 1, 1805, and in August following the Court of Common Pleas granted an order authorizing the administrators to sell the land in controversy, who proceeded to do so, and the question was as to the validity of the sale. It was contended on the part of the plaintiffs in error that the interest of the administrators in the real estate, as trustees for the creditors, was a vested interest, which the repeal of the law could not divest.

But the court held otherwise, and Marshall, C. J., in delivering the opinion, used this language: "The repeal of such a law divests no vested estate, but is the exercise of a legislative power which every legislature possesses. The mode of subjecting the property of a debtor to the demands of a creditor must always depend on the wisdom of the legislature."

It is not to be denied that some of the language used by that distinguished jurist, Johnston, Ch., in the case of Morton & Courteny v. Caldwell (3 Strob. Eq., 161), when considered apart from the question then under consideration, does seem to support the view contended for by the appellants. But the question in that case was so wholly different from the one now under consideration, that to apply the language there used to a totally different question would inevitably lead us into error. The question there was, to what period of time must we look in order to ascertain the amount of a claim against a decedent's estate, in order to determine its pro rata share of the assets of such estate, and the question now before us, as to whether the law-making power could not change the direction previously given as to the manner of administering the assets of a decedent's estate, was not considered or even hinted at. We do not see, therefore, that there was any error, in any respect, in the judgment appealed from.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

DIAL v. GARY AND TAPPAN.

Where it appears, under a liberal construction of the complaint, that two mortgages sought to be foreclosed were given, one by A and B on one lot of land, the other by B on another lot, to secure a note of A and B, a demurrer that two several causes of action were improperly united, was properly overruled.

A statement in the complaint that plaintiff "is induced to believe, and does believe," a matter stated, is an allegation of fact upon information and belief, and is sufficient.

Where the judge is not furnished with the papers necessary to enable him to formulate a proper judgment of foreclosure, it is not error for him, after decreeing that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, to give to plaintiff leave to move before the proper judge for such formal judgment as may be necessary to effectuate this purpose.

[5. Executors and Administrators § 521.]

The mortgagor having died domiciled in another State, no assignee of his executor there could sue in the courts of this State; action on this note and these mortgages could be maintained only by the administrator in this State.

*Before Cothran, J., Richland, July, 1884.

This was an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer at October term, 1881, and from a subsequent decree by the same judge on the merits, which, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The contention seems to be still as to the discrepancy or incongruity between the recitals of the two mortgages of October 9, 1873, and the evidences of indebtedness actually produced. In the Circuit judgment overruling the demurrer, and not appearing in the abstract, as reported in the case, it is said: "But it is argued by the defendants' counsel that it does not appear but that the bonds" (recited in the mortgages) "have been paid, as they have not been produced, nor their loss accounted for. It is enough to say in answer to this hypothetical objection that if such be the fact, it should be made out as a defence upon the merits of the case." (See brief of case reported in 20 S. C., 167.)

The plaintiff's complaint is again very sharply criticised, and, as I have had cause to say already, not unjustly, but much allowance ought to be made for the circumstances of the case—the original transactions were between parties nearly related, uncle and nephews, the latter having been charged with the preparation of the papers, and are therefore the authors of the discrepancies of which they so loudly and persistently complain. The plaintiff, upon the other hand, is at great disadvantage. He became connected with this matter after the death of Asa Burke, by assignment from his administrator and widow in the State of Massachusetts, and from the very nature of the case cannot be very positive in his averments. He has stated his belief, and the defendants insist that such is not necessary or proper matter of denial on their part. This seems to me so. 2 Wait's Pr., 417.

Can the matter of one's belief be submitted as an issue to a jury? It appears that it cannot be. But in his extremity the plaintiff is greatly relieved by two potential facts which appear in the case—the one furnished by the depositions of Philip Sowden, the foreign administrator, who was examined by commission. He says, "There was a note of three thousand dollars, signed by one of them (the defendants), and might have been signed by both, and *this note was secured by one or more of these mortgages. There was a note of three thousand dollars signed by said Tappan and Gary, secured by a life insurance policy upon the life of Elbridge Gary. The last named note and policy are in my possession, the others I sold to George L. Dial by assignment."

The other fact is that notwithstanding the indulgence given to the defendants to answer over; notwithstanding their abounding knowledge of this matter, they have not attempted, either by answer or by proof, to explain the discrepancy complained of, or to establish the pretence even that there are other outstanding evidences of indebtedness of theirs secured by the said mortgages. Upon this point they are profoundly silent, relying upon such technical defences as that they are not bound to deny the plaintiff's allegations of belief, nor to make out his case for him. To these technical defences, fortified, as the plaintiff's belief is, by the circumstance of the case and the depositions of Sowden, I have no hesitation in applying the aphorism that he who is silent when he should speak, should not be allowed to speak when he ought to be silent; and sometimes, at least, and even here taciti clamant.

At this stage of the decree I have been greatly delayed and its earlier filing prevented by the lack of necessary papers to formulate a proper judgment in the case, and that notwithstanding repeated requests made to the plaintiff's counsel to furnish the same. I am still embarrassed for the want of these.

Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff herein have the relief demanded in this complaint, and that his counsel have leave to move before the judge of the Fifth Circuit, or the judge in turn presiding for the County of Richland, for such formal judgment as may be necessary to effectuate this purpose.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, for appellants.

Messrs. R. A. Lynch, and Bachman & Youmans, contra.

April 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The object of this action is to foreclose certain mortgages of real

stantially, as a first cause of action, that on October 9, 1873, the defendants made "their written obligation" to said Burke for three thousand dollars; that on the same day they executed their mortgage to said Burke on a certain lot on Gervais street, in the city of Columbia, which "purports on its face to be to secure the payment of a certain bond or obligation executed by the said defendants to said Asa Burke October 9, 1873, in the penal sum of four thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of two thousand dollars;" that the defendant, Henry L. Tappan, at what date is not stated, executed his mortgage to said Asa Burke on a certain lot on Blanding street, in the city of Columbia, which "purports on its face to be to secure the payment of a certain bond or obligation executed by the defendant, Henry L. Tappan, to said Asa Burke, in the penal sum of two thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of one thousand dollars," and after stating that the plaintiff has never had in his possession either of the bonds or obligations above referred to, alleges that he "is induced to believe, and does believe, that both the mortgages aforesaid were executed to secure the payment of the obligation mentioned in paragraph I. hereof," which we understand to be an ordinary note, and which will hereafter be referred to as such.

There is also a second cause of action set forth in the complaint, based upon a bond of defendant's to Asa Burke in the penal sum of eight thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of four thousand dollars, bearing date December 1, 1874, secured by a mortgage on the Gervais street lot, bearing even date with said bond; but as there seems to be no controversy in regard to the second cause of action, it need not further be alluded to.

The defendants filed a demurrer to the complaint upon several grounds, all of which have been disposed of except the following: "Second. That several causes of action have been improperly united, in this, that one cause of action against the defendants, Edwin F. Gary and Henry L. Tappan, being to foreclose a mortgage by them executed to the testator, Asa Burke, of a certain lot of land in the city of Columbia, has been improperly joined *with another cause of action against Henry L. Tappan alone to foreclose a mortgage by him executed to the testator, Asa Burke, of another lot of land in the city of Columbia." The Circuit Judge overruled the demurrer, holding substantially that, according to his construction of the complaint, the joint debt of the defendants represented by the note for three thousand dollars was secured by the joint mortgage of the defendants on the Gervais street lot for two thousand dollars, and the individual mortgage of the defendant, Tappan, on the Blanding street lot for one thousand dollars, the two together making up the precise sum of the note. He, however, granted leave to the defendants to answer over. The defendants duly excepted to the ruling by which the demurrer was overruled, and filed their answer.

The case subsequently came on for trial on the merits, when judgment was rendered that the plaintiff have the relief demanded in his complaint, and that he have leave to move "for such formal judgment as may be necessary to effectuate this purpose," before the judge of the Fifth Circuit, or the judge in turn presiding for the county of Richland. From this judgment defendants appeal upon the following grounds:

1. That his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in holding that the defendants went to trial upon the merits before Judge Witherspoon, were cast, and appealing from this decree, took up, at the same time, for review by the Supreme Court, the judgment upon the demurrer.

2. That his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in holding that "the original transactions were between parties nearly related, uncle and nephews, the latter having been charged with the preparation of the papers, and are, therefore, the authors of the discrepancies of which they so loudly and persistently complain. The plaintiff, upon the other hand, is at great disadvantage."

3. That his honor, the Circuit Judge, erred in ordering and adjudging "that the plaintiff herein have the relief demanded in his complaint; and that his counsel have leave to move before the judge of the Fifth Circuit, or the judge in turn presiding for the County of Richland, for such formal judgment as may be necessary to effectuate this purpose."

This appeal, therefore, presents two leading questions: First, *whether there was error in overruling the demurrer based upon the ground that several causes of action were improperly united. Second, whether there was error in the final judgment upon any of the grounds stated.

First, as to the demurrer. While it is quite true that the complaint is very inartistically framed, yet we think by a liberal construction of its terms enough appears in it to relieve it from the objection taken by the demurrer. To sustain the demurrer, it must appear upon the face of the complaint that the individual mortgage of Henry L. Tappan was in no way connected with the debt, the collection of which is sought to be enforced by the foreclosure of the two mortgages mentioned in the statement of the first cause of action. This, we think, does not appear, and on the contrary there is enough in the complaint to show that these two mortgages, though purporting to be given to secure the two bonds mentioned in them, were really given to secure the payment of the note for three thousand dollars, described in the first paragraph of the complaint. The allegation made in the sixth paragraph of the complaint, "That this plaintiff has never had in his possession either of the bonds or obligations referred to in this paragraph, but is induced to believe, and does believe, that both the mortgages aforesaid were executed to secure the payment of the obligation mentioned in paragraph 1 hereof," was, doubtless, intended as an allegation of the fact that said mortgages were really given to secure the note for three thousand dollars, made upon information and belief, the only way in which it could be made by an administrator; and if it can be so construed, as we think it can, it would be sufficient.

The statement that one "is induced to believe" a certain fact necessarily implies that he has received reliable information that such was the fact, for it would be difficult to conceive how otherwise he could be induced to believe such fact. It is true that, speaking with the utmost strictness, an allegation of belief of a fact is not an allegation of the existence of such fact; and it is equally true that the ordinary allegation, frequently found in complaints, that the plaintiff is informed and believes that so and so is a fact is not, strictly speaking, an allegation of the existence of such fact, but simply an allegation that the plaintiff has been *informed and believes that such fact does exist, for it may be true that the plaintiff has been so informed and does so believe, and yet the fact itself may not be true. But to apply such strictness to a pleading under the code would violate its fundamental principles, for we are told in section 180 that "in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view of substantial justice between the parties." We cannot say, therefore, that there was any error of law on the part of the Circuit Judge in overruling the demurrer.

Next as to the appeal from the final judgment. We are unable to see the pertinency of the first ground of appeal. For even assuming that the Circuit Judge was not entirely correct in using the language imputed to him by this exception, it is perfectly manifest that it does not affect any question raised by this appeal. His honor was simply reciting what had occurred in the previous history of the case, and the only thing in it which could be regarded as objectionable, and that only by implication, was the statement that the Supreme Court had, in another case (Dial v. Tappan), sustained the judgment overruling the demurrer, which we have just been considering. This the Circuit Judge, manifestly, did not mean; and, even if he had, it cannot affect this case, as is conclusively shown by the fact that the question raised by the demurrer which we are called upon to decide in this case was not, and could not have been, considered in the other case, and has now been considered and decided upon its merits, without reference to the former decision.

Whether the Circuit Judge was right or wrong in making the statement attributed to him by the second ground of appeal, seems to us so wholly immaterial to the questions raised by this appeal that we have not deemed it necessary to inquire into the correctness of such statement.

The only remaining ground is couched in such general terms, that, under the rule, it might well be disregarded. But, as we are always averse to deciding cases upon purely technical grounds, we propose to relax the rule in this instance. As well as we can judge from the argument presented in behalf of appellants, the object of this exception was to raise a question of fact—whether *the debt secured by the mortgages asked to be foreclosed was proved. There is no doubt that the note for three thousand dollars, as well as the execution of the two mortgages, were fully and properly proved; and if it was established that these mortgages, though purporting on their face to secure independent bonds, were really intended to secure the payment of the note for three thousand dollars, then the plaintiff's case was fully made out, and he was entitled to judgment of foreclosure. The intimation thrown out in the argument, that the Circuit Judge was himself in doubt as to the kind of judgment to which the plaintiff was entitled, is scarcely fair to that distinguished judge, in the face of his explanation, that it was owing to the failure of the plaintiff's counsel to furnish him with the papers necessary to enable him to formulate a proper judgment, and hence the necessity for him to render judgment in general terms. It is quite clear, as appellant has assumed, that the intention was to render judgment of foreclosure and sale under all of the mortgages, and that the only reason why such judgment was not rendered in a formal manner was the want of the necessary papers.

The only remaining question, then, is whether there was any error in the conclusion that the two mortgages were really intended to secure the payment of the three thousand dollar note. Under the view which we have taken of the allegations of the complaint, inasmuch as there was no denial in the answer of the defendants that such was the real intention, there was no necessity for further proof. But, waiving this, we think there was sufficient testimony to sustain the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge. The papers all bear the same date, October 9, 1873, and the two mortgages make up the precise amount of the note, and this, with the testimony of Sowden, the administrator in Massachusetts, we think, was quite sufficient to warrant the conclusion adopted by the Circuit Judge, especially in the absence of any denial or explanation on the part of the defendants in their answer.

It is not asserted or pretended that the testator, in his lifetime, had assigned the bonds mentioned in these mortgages to any one, and if his administrator in Massachusetts has, since his death, assigned them to a third person, such assignee, as has already been determined in Dial v. Gary (14 S. C., 573 [37 Am. Rep. 737]), could *not maintain an action on them here, but that such action could only be maintained by the administrator here, the plaintiff in this case; and, therefore, the judgment rendered in this case will be a complete protection to these defendants against any other suit on these bonds. We see no error in the judgment appealed from.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

ROBERTS v. JOHNS.

[1. Equity ⇨333, 403.]

Where the validity of an order of final discharge granted by a probate judge is a matter at issue, and he has become the master for that county, the Circuit Judge may refer the case to a special master to state the accounts; and as the order of reference conferred only the powers of a special master, it was not vitiated by designating the officer a "special referee."

From the time when a trustee should finally account to his cestuis que trust, the presumption begins to run in his favor and is complete at the end of twenty years; but upon settlement made or disavowal of trust (which is a claim of full accounting), the statute of limitation bars a reopening of such accounting after the expiration of six years.

An act done by an administrator manifesting to the beneficiaries an intention to throw off the trust, gives currency to the statute of limitations in his favor; but the returns made to the probate judge, showing a claim by the administrator to certain assets in his own right, do not charge the beneficiaries with notice of an adverse claim by the administrator, and the statute did not commence to run in his favor until his final discharge.

In this case, the honorable T. B. FRASER, Circuit Judge, sat in the stead of Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, who had been of counsel.

This was an action commenced September 27, 1875, by the administratrix of a distributee of the estate of James Johns, deceased, against the administrator of said James Johns. The case has been in this court on appeal before. See 16 S. C., 184.

The case was referred to S. P. Dendy, Esq., who made an elaborate report, to which numerous exceptions were taken by both parties, most of which were finally disposed of by the Circuit decree. This decree passed upon these exceptions serially, and it will be necessary to furnish only the following portions of that decree:

The 5th exception related to the Reeder and Messer note. The defendant must account for what he might, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, have recovered on this note. The evidence shows that the note came to the hands of Col. J. J. Norton as his own property, and that he found it to his interest to compromise the same for $550. There is no sufficient reason to believe that the defendant could have realized more for the estate which he represented than Col. Norton did in regard for himself. The prudence, learning, ability, and experience of Col. Norton as a lawyer and man of business sufficiently appear in this case to warrant the conclusion that, to require the defendant to come up to his standard, would be to exact of him even more than will satisfy the demands of the law as to the prudence, care, and diligence required. The defendant's liability, therefore, will be limited on this note to the amount realized by Col. Norton, to wit, $550.

* * * * *

The 7th exception is also overruled. [Because the referee erred in his recommendation that the estate pay the costs of this action.] The spirit of the pursuit of this administrator has been very exacting, and I am impressed with the idea that his conduct has been viewed much more unfavorably than it would have been had this litigation terminated more recently after the reestablishment *of an orderly civil government in this State and the announcement of judicial decisions declaring void the constitutional provisions in regard to the invalidity of contracts for the purchase of slaves. Men are prone to forget that under the organic law of the State, supported by military force and expounded by courts fully in harmony with the revolutionary ideas then prevailing on this subject, such contracts were utterly and absolutely void and incapable of enforcement until the decision in Calhoun v. Calhoun [2 S. C. 283], heard at April term, 1870. To impute negligence to an administrator for not seeking, during that period, to enforce contracts of this character, is not only to ignore the history of the State in regard to the institutions, but to view the events of the past by the reflected light of the present day, as was felicitously said by the Chief Justice in support of the decision in Calhoun v. Calhoun.

I see no fraud in the dealing of the administrator with these securities up to the time of the sale. Even in regard to that, I can find no reason to impute fraud either to him or the court which ordered the sale. It was a mistake, and so far as defendant has profited by the assets thus disposed of, he is properly held to account for them. It was a mistake in him to insist on a right to retain the advantage thus secured to him. It was also a mistake in plaintiff, Mrs. Roberts, with the concurrence of her husband and through his agency, to settle with the administrator on the basis of the sale of the assets, and to give him a release and acquittance from further liabilities. But I do not find in the case anything to justify me in charging the defendant with all the costs of the litigation rendered necessary to ascertain and correct these mistakes.

Both parties appealed upon exceptions, which are sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Keith & Verner, for plaintiffs,
Mr. J. J. Norton, for defendant.

April 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. A full statement of the facts will be found *in the "Brief" in this case. So much of the facts as will be necessary to explain the ruling of this court will be stated in connection with the consideration of the several questions raised by this appeal. Plaintiffs and defendant have excepted to the decree of the Circuit Judge, and the various questions raised cannot well be considered in the order in which they are presented in the exceptions. They will be taken up in what seems to be a more convenient, if not more logical, order.

I. The first exception is on behalf of the defendant, and is to the order of reference to a special referee, and not to the master for Oconee County. This action was commenced September 27, 1875. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, with leave to answer; on appeal, the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed and the case remanded to the Circuit Court. By an order of the Circuit Court, all the issues of law and fact were referred to S. P. Dendy, as special referee, who made his report, March 11, 1879. This report was overruled by the Circuit Judge and the complaint dismissed. On appeal to the Supreme Court, this judgment of the Circuit Court was reversed, and the case was "remanded to that court for such orders and proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect" the judgment of the Supreme Court. This judgment of the Supreme Court was filed November 11, 1881.

On June 27, 1882, the Circuit Judge made an order by which it was referred to S. P. Dendy, "as special referee, to state the accounts of the defendant, James A. Johns, as administrator of the estate of James Johns, deceased, in accordance with the principles enunciated in the decree of the Supreme Court in the above stated action." To this order of reference counsel for the defendant excepted. If this exception was in writing, it does not appear in the "Brief." It is stated in the argument of defendant's counsel in the following language: "Because the reference therein ordered is to S. P. Dendy, as special referee, instead of Richard Lewis, Esq., master for said county." This exception was renewed on the first reference held by S. P. Dendy as special referee; it was taken before the Circuit Court on the hearing of the exceptions to the report of S. P. Dendy as special referee; and is again presented to this court, and with much earnestness.

*The exception raises two questions, one of substance and one of mere form. First as to substance. By section 781, General Statutes, which became law May 1, 1882, and before the date of this order of reference, it is enacted that "the office of referee and the practice of referring cases to referees as provided in the code of procedure shall not exist or be used in the counties of * * * Oconee * * *." Section 782 provides for the appointment of a master for Oconee and the other counties named in section 781. Section 789 provides for the appointment of a special master in certain cases, in these words: "In case of a vacancy in the office of master during a term of the court, or in case of the disability of the master from interest or any other reason, the presiding judge may appoint a special master in any cause, who shall, as to such cause, be clothed with all the powers of master. The amendment by the act of February 19, 1880, by which cases under reference at that date were excepted from the operation of the master's act then in force, was not re-enacted in the general statutes, May 1, 1882.

The authority of S. P. Dendy as special referee, under the first order, ceased when his report was filed, March 11, 1879, and the special exception of cases under reference no longer existed when the general statutes became of force. The order of reference here called in question must, therefore, be valid under section 789, or then it was made without authority of law. By section 789 it is provided that in case of disability of the master "from interest or any other reason, the presiding judge may appoint a special master," who shall be "clothed with all the powers of the master." The words "any other reason" were intended to give to the presiding judge large discretionary power, not, however, to be exercised capriciously, as to what reason is sufficient to disqualify a master from acting in any given cause.

It appears from the brief in this case, that Richard Lewis, the master for Oconee County, was at one time judge of probate, and that an order of final discharge granted by him as judge of probate to the defendant in this case, as administrator of this estate, is one of the material matters sought to be investigated in these proceedings and the validity of which is the very foundation of his defence. It was, therefore, due, not only to the plaintiffs, but *to the master himself, that it should be referred to some one else besides himself to state these accounts. It was, therefore, proper that the presiding judge should have made this reference to some one other than Richard Lewis, master for Oconee County. There is nothing in the conduct of S. P. Dendy, the special referee, in the hearing of the case, in his report on the matters referred, or in any other way, outside of statements of counsel, which shows that he is in any way an improper person to hear the case under an order of reference. So much for the substantive features of this order of reference to S. P. Dendy, and in which, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it is fair to assume it was presented to the mind of the Circuit Judge by whom it was made.

The other objection is one of mere form. It is contended, if we apprehend correctly the position taken in arguments, that a reference may be made to a "special master," and not to a "special referee." An examination of the code will show that this officer is called "referee," and that the term "special referee" is nowhere used. If all orders in which the exact name by which this appointee of the court is called in the act is not used are void, then all orders of reference to "special referees," even before the passage of the master's act, were without authority of law. Yet our own reports will show that there have been a large number of such orders of reference, and that none of them have been, for this reason, called in question. It is true that "the office of referee, as prescribed in the code," has been abolished and the office of master substituted in its place, but an examination of the code and of the master's act will show that there is a substantial difference between the "office of master" and the "office of referee," and not a mere change in the name.

In the Fifty-four First Mortgage Bond Case (15 S. C., 304) and Ex Parte Brown (Ibid., 518), it is held that an order that "the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company" should continue in the possession and management of the property of the company, and which conferred such powers and imposed such duties as are usually conferred on receivers, created the said president and directors receivers, although they were not so called and named in the order. In Ex Parte Brown*, the court says: "Every essential feature of a receivership was created by the order of July 2, 1872, and the office ought to have been so called." It would, on the same principle, be proper to hold that an order of reference would be good if made to a person by name, without styling him either master or referee. To call him special referee in an order conferring the powers and imposing the duties of a special master, is at most a mere erroneous description of the person. Falsa demonstratio non nocet. "As soon as there is an adequate and sufficient definition, with convenient certainty of what is intended to pass by the particular instrument, a subsequent erroneous addition will not vitiate it." Br. Leg. Max., *p. 606.

The order of reference complained of in this case conferred on S. P. Dendy, Esq., only certain powers of a special master and none of the prohibited powers of a referee, and it would be sacrificing the substance to the shadow to hold it void because he was there styled special referee and not special master. This exception of defendant must be overruled.

2. The exceptions of the defendant which raise the question of the statute of limitations will next be considered, because they refer to certain items in the account to which the other exceptions do not relate, as well as to some of the items covered by the other exceptions. The 7th and 8th exceptions by the defendant are as follows: "7. Because it appears in the evidence that each and every item in the account accrued against defendant prior to the 1st day of March, 1870, although the statute began to run on the 7th day of March, 1870; yet the statute of force prior to the 1st March, 1870, governs and bars each and every item of said account before the commencement of this action. 8. Because the claim to the note of E. P. L. H., and D. D. Verner, as a part of James Johns' estate, is barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant having claimed it as his own property since 17th December, 1869."

The question raised by these exceptions is not whether the limitation of five or six years is applicable in this case, but when did the statute commence to run. It might be sufficient to say that this matter has already been adjudicated by this court in this case. See Roberts v. Johns, 16 S. C., 184. In that case this court uses the following language: "The statute of limitations did not begin to run against the plaintiff's right to an accounting until the administrator had done some positive act manifesting a clear intention to terminate his trust. This was never done till March 7, 1870, when he obtained from the Probate Court his final discharge, and within the statutory period from that date this action was begun."

It is insisted, however, that the statute may still be pleaded to each item in the administrator's account. In exception 7 it is said that each and every item in the account accrued against defendant prior to the first day of March, 1870. And in exception 8 it is claimed that defendant should not be charged with the Verner note, because he "claimed it as his own property since December 17, 1869." Assuming that the question is an open one, is there anything in the dealings of the administrator with this estate to give currency to the statute at the periods stated in these exceptions? In the consideration of claims against trustees, where lapse of time is the ground of defence, it is important to bear in mind the distinction between the bar of the statute and the presumption of payment from lapse of time. Whenever the period arrives at which, according to the terms of his trust, the trustee is required to make his final account, and there is no disability on the part of the beneficiary of the trust, the presumption commences to run against the latter and in favor of the former. At the end of twenty years, unless there is something to arrest or suspend the presumption, it becomes a complete protection against any further demand on him as trustee. Any failure to account for or pay over to the beneficiary according to the terms of the trust is a cause of action, and the right of action accrues on such failure, and it is not barred until the presumption of payment has run its full course of twenty years.

The defence of the statute of limitations stands on a different footing. When a trustee has made a settlement by accounting and paying over, the liability under the original trust is prima facie at least at an end, and if it is proposed to open the settlement, it is necessary to allege and show errors in the settlement. It is this right to open a settlement which is barred by the statute of limitations which runs from the date of the settlement, or from the date of the discovery of the fraud, or other circumstance which invalidates it. When there has been no actual settlement, but "some positive act manifesting a clear intention to terminate his trust" has been done by the trustee, the statute begins to run from this act. Such an act amounts to a claim that the trustee has fully accounted, and the acquiescence in the claim for the statutory period is a bar to any reopening of what has been so long acquiesced in. It must be an act manifesting the intention to throw off the trust; manifesting it not to strangers, but to the beneficiary or cestui que trust.

The very liberal rule has been adopted by our courts, "that an act done in a public office, open for the information of parties, must be taken notice of by them." See Moore v. Porcher, Bail. Eq., 197; Glover v. Lott, 1 Strob. Eq., 79; Coleman v. Davis, 2 Id., 341; Payne v. Harris, 3 Id., 43; Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq., 63; Motes v. Madden, 14 S. C., 492. In all of these cases the act by which the trustee was allowed to give currency to the statute was either actually known, or presumed to have been known, to the beneficiary. In the case before the court there is nothing to show that Mrs. Roberts either had notice, or was in any way affected with notice, that the defendant claimed that he was not liable to account to her for any of the items to which the statute is here pleaded, until the final discharge by the judge of probate, March 7, 1870. She was then bound to take notice of this claim, thus throwing off the trust, and has commenced her action within the statutory period from that date. These exceptions are, therefore, overruled.

3. The 1st exception on the part of the plaintiff, and the 5th exception on the part of the defendant, relate to the note of P. J. Miller. If the compromise of this note for $205, at less than its nominal value, was a part of a scheme by which it was to be improperly converted by the defendant to his own use, he ought to be charged with its full value. If, however, at the time of the compromise he did, as he seems to have done, make such a compromise as a prudent man may well have done, he ought to be charged only with what he received on it, even if subsequent events show that he might have collected the whole amount if he had chosen to take all the chances of those uncertain times. The interest on $200, the amount of the Blair note, which was a part of the compromise, should run only from the day at which it became an interest bearing demand, May 1, 1870. To this extent the judgment of the Circuit Court must be modified in reference to this claim so as to make the interest on the Blair note run from May 1, 1870.

4. The 2d exception of plaintiff, as also the 2d exception of defendant, refers to the Mary Dalton note. This note was, with others, sold by the defendant December 17, 1869, to Sloan Dickson for a very small sum. This sale has been adjudged to be void, and defendant must account for the note in the same way as if the sale was never made. It is for the defendant to show the circumstances, if there are any, which may relieve him of his liability to account for this note in full. These appear in the testimony taken before the special referee. It is possible that the whole may have been collected. It seems, however, from the testimony, that the estate of Mary Dalton was small, and that some of her creditors received only a small percentage of their claims. Under all the circumstances of the times and the estate, it would be hard measure to hold this defendant liable for more than was received on this note, but for this amount, $413.41, he should account; and this court concurs with the Circuit Judge as to the amount with which the defendant is chargeable on this note.

5. The 3d exception of the plaintiff, which is also the 3d exception of the defendant, refers to the Reeder & Messer note. For the reasons assigned in the Circuit decree, this court concurs with the Circuit Judge as to the amount for which the defendant is chargeable on this note.

6. The 4th exception of the plaintiff refers to certain allowances made to defendant for services and expenses of trips to Georgia and Texas for the benefit of the estate. Though it does not appear that much, if any, good resulted from them, these services seem to have been rendered in good faith, and the amounts allowed seem reasonable, and this court concurs with the Circuit Judge in reference to them.

7. The 4th exception of defendant is, that the plaintiff has been allowed one-half, instead of one-third, of the net balance of the estate. An examination of the award made by the arbitrat*ors appointed by the defendant, and S. H. Johns, one of the distributees of the estate, shows that the award did not contemplate a final settlement of that share as the matter to be effected by it. It involved some matters of a purely private nature, and only settled some of the principles upon which a final settlement of that share was to be made between these parties. This exception is therefore well taken. The proper mode of stating the account is to charge the defendant with all sums which either for negro debts, or otherwise, were due to the estate by S. H. Johns, or the defendant himself, and then give him credit for all valid demands held by S. H. Johns against the estate. When the balance is struck, to show the present value of the estate, the advancements made to all the distributees must be added. The sum thus made up is the amount for distribution. One-third of this, less payments and advances and commissions for paying out to the distributees respectively, is the amount now due and payable to them severally. This exception is, therefore, sustained, and the account must be restated according to these views.

8. The 6th exception of the defendant is, that certain commissions were not allowed by the Circuit Judge for years in which no returns were made. If there is anything in the distinction urged on the court between neglect to make returns and failure to make returns, there is nothing in the testimony in this case to show that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of it. There was nothing so far as appears to prevent him from making returns, and he did not make them. This is neglect. This exception is therefore overruled.

The exception as to costs is overruled for the reasons assigned in the Circuit decree.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, except as herein modified, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the judgment of the Circuit Court as herein modified.

24 S. C. *591

*No. 1795. STATE v. THOMPSON. November Term, 1885.

[Appeal and Error ⇨807.]

This was a motion to restore to the docket an appeal which had been, on motion, previously dismissed by the court. The court, following the decision in Clark Brothers v. Wimberly (ante, p. 138), held that the matter was res adjudicata.

Opinion PER CURIAM, January 25, 1886. W. J. Whipper, for the motion. J. B. Howe, acting solicitor, contra.

No. 1796. STATE v. SMALLS. November Term, 1885.

Defendant was indicted for rape. The prosecutrix proved the offence, and said she recognized the prisoner as the offending person; that she had been brought up with him. The defendant denied the charge, and said he did not know the prosecutrix. The judge (Pressley) charged: "There is a matter in his testimony that bears upon that point [i. e. identity of the prisoner], and in my estimation it bears very seriously against him. She says she was brought up with him. He swears that he does not know her. Now, if she tells the truth, he tells a lie. If he tells a lie, he has a motive for it."

This court says: "We well know that it is not always easy to draw the line clearly between what is and what is not within the prescribed province of the judge. But as to the declaration here complained of, we can hardly doubt that it contained an expression of opinion on the facts, and was therefore in violation of section 26, article IV., of the Constitution, which declares that 'judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law.' It is true that the judge also said to the jury: 'If you have reasonable doubt; if her testimony leaves your mind in a state of reasonable uncertainty, then you will say not guilty.' But we do not think that *cured the matter." New trial granted.

Opinion by Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, February 13, 1886. Lee & Bowen, for appellants. Jervey, solicitor, contra.

No. 1812. MINTON v. PICKENS. November Term, 1885. Warren Minton brought this action against Polly Pickens and her husband, Paul, for the partition of a lot of land in the city of Columbia. Plaintiff claimed that under a declaration of trust from one Lee, trustee, in favor of Polly and her daughter, Jeannette (wife of plaintiff), and the subsequent death, intestate, of said Jeannette, he was entitled to one-fourth interest, and the defendant, Polly Pickens, to three-fourths interest. The defendants claimed that Paul Pickens paid for the lot and all improvements erected thereon; that Lee held as trustee for Paul; that the declaration of trust by Lee in favor of Polly and Jeannette was made upon the procurement and false assertions of plaintiff, without the knowledge of defendants; that Polly and Jeannette had paid nothing for the lot or its improvements, and that Lee was dead. Upon an issue submitted to the jury, they found that plaintiff had no interest in this lot. The Circuit Judge (Witherspoon) approved this finding, and dismissed the complaint. On appeal by plaintiff, held—

The verdict of a jury upon an issue submitted to them in a chancery case, and its confirmation by the judge, approved, not being against the weight of the testimony.

[2. Witnesses ⇨150.]

Section 400 of the Code does not render a defendant to an action for partition incompetent to testify to communications between himself and a former trustee of the property, now deceased, under whom plaintiff claimed, the plaintiff not holding any of the relations to the deceased specified in this section.

[3. Appeal and Error ⇨204.]

Testimony not objected to at the time is competent.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇨1054.]

A new trial will not be granted for admission of testimony, which, even if incompetent, was not considered by the Circuit Judge in reaching his conclusions.

[5. Trusts § 72.]

Where a party takes a deed in his own name, but for the benefit of A, who paid the money, and afterwards declares a trust for the use of the wife of A and her daughter, who have knowledge of the trust, they can claim no interest in the land, but it is the property of A.

For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 72.]

*February 22, 1886. Sawyer & Sawyer, John Bauskett, for appellant. J. P. Thomas, jr., contra.

No. 1813. STATE v. TARRANT, November Term, 1885. This was a prosecution against the defendant for official misconduct as a trial justice, tried before Aldrich, J., at Abbeville. Defendant appealed, and this court ordered a new trial, holding—

The good character of the defendant, if established to the satisfaction of the jury, is a circumstance to be considered by them in determining whether the acts done by defendant resulted from an honest mistake of law, or were prompted by an evil intent; but the judge could not charge that certain facts, as evidence of good character, "should weigh with the jury as a strong presumption of the defendant's innocence."

Unless a request to charge is correct as a whole, a refusal to charge it cannot be assigned as error.

[3. Justices of the Peace § 30.]

The judge erred in declining to charge "unless the jury are satisfied that the evidence has proved beyond a reasonable doubt the evil and malicious intent of the defendant, the intent being the essence of the offence, no act of the defendant done because of mistake or misconception of the law, can establish a case of misconduct or oppression in office," he having submitted to the jury the requests to charge as containing correct principles of law in the abstract.

[4. Judges § 38.]

Two elements must combine to constitute the offence charged—doing some act in an official capacity, in violation of law, and the evil intent with which such act is done.

[5. New Trial § 72.]

The judge did not err in refusing to grant a new trial, where the motion was based upon the proposition, that "if in the judge's opinion the preponderance of evidence is on the side of the defendant, he is entitled to a new trial." It is the province of the jury, and not of the judge, to weigh the testimony.

In assigning no reasons for refusing a new trial, the judge committed no error of law. If the motion was based upon matters of fact only, this court has no jurisdiction to review his judgment; and if based upon propositions of law, this court would assume that he had overruled them, and his ruling would be open to review on appeal.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, *February 22, 1886. W. C. Benet, for appellant. Orr, solicitor, contra.

No. 1823. ATKINSON v. JACKSON, November Term, 1885. A and B, tenants in common, executed a mortgage upon their land in 1882 to secure a debt, payable in four annual instalments. Afterwards A conveyed his interest in the land to another, and B also conveyed one moiety of his interest, and then died intestate in February, 1883. The widow and six children of B instituted this action for partition in 1885, making parties defendant the administrator of B, who was in possession, the other tenants in common, and the mortgagee. On oral demurrer the Circuit Judge (Aldrich) ruled that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, inasmuch as the action was prematurely brought. Held—

That upon the death of B his title and interest descended eo instanti to the plaintiffs, who could therefore demand partition (Gen. Stat., § 1829), not of grace, but of common right; that difficulty in effecting partition does not bar the right; that the right exists even where there are outstanding debts or liens upon the property, for the satisfaction of which provision may be made in the decree; and that if prematurely instituted, the proper practice is to suspend the proceedings, but not to dismiss.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, February 26, 1886. Moises & Lee, for appellant. Haynsworth & Cooper, contra.

No. 1826. PRICE v. WHITE, November Term, 1885. This was an action for foreclosure, and the only issue was as to the payments on the debt. The Circuit Judge (Wallace) heard the testimony, adopted the version of plaintiff, and this court affirmed his judgment. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, March 1, 1886. A. S. Tompkins, for appellant. W. T. Gary, contra.

No. 1827. POPE v. MONTGOMERY, November Term, 1885. This was an appeal from a decree of Hudson, J., refusing to set aside certain conveyances alleged to be invalid and to have been fraudulently obtained. The testimony was taken in open court.

[1. Appeal and Error ⚭1011.]

Findings of fact by the Circuit Judge affirmed, this court saying: "It is incumbent on the appellant to show that the conclusions of fact reached by the Circuit Judge are either without any testimony to support them, or are manifestly against the weight of the evidence. * * * The utmost that can be said is that there was conflict in the testimony, and in such a case this court rarely, if ever, interferes."

An informal paper, purporting to be an assignment of the maker's interest in a tract of land, witnessed by only one witness, but based upon a valuable consideration, is sufficient in equity to transfer such interest, and a proper conveyance could be enforced.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Trustees v. Bryson, 34 S. C. 416, 13 S. E. 619; Rush v. Hilton, 83 S. C. 446, 65 S. E. 525.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, March 1, 1886. Evans & Evans, F. D. Bryant, for appellants. Johnson & Johnson, C. A. Woods, contra.

No. 1828. HAYNE v. IRVINE, November Term, 1885.

This was a controversy without action, involving the construction of a will, originally submitted to this court for adjudication. The court held that they had no original jurisdiction of the matter, and ordered the case to be stricken from the docket without prejudice.

No. 1832. GARY v. BARNWELL, November Term, 1885. In this case the following points were ruled:

1. Findings of fact by the Circuit Judge (Pressley), who overruled the master, sustained.

[2. Costs ⚭13.]

This being a case in chancery, the matter of costs was for the judge as he saw proper to decree on that subject.

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, March 6, 1886. E. B. Gary, for appellant. Parker & McGowan, contra.

No. 1838. LEVY v. ZEALY, November Term, 1885.

This was a case in chancery, and the appeal alleged only errors of fact. This court affirmed the decree of the Circuit Judge (Witherspoon), saying: "It concerns the welfare of the country that there should be an end of litigation; and where the Circuit Judge concurs with the master on a question of fact, it will not disturb the finding, unless there is no testimony to support it, or it is manifestly against the weight of evidence."

No. 1840. Ex parte VERNER, November Term, 1885.

This case simply decides that the petitioner, having been charged, under the principles declared in Lay v. Lay (10 S. C. 216), with one-sixth part of the note for slaves described in that case, and the amount of such sixth part having been ascertained and adjudged by a decree of the Circuit Court, from which no appeal was taken, the petitioner could not afterwards have such amount reduced because of a compromise subsequently entered into between the parties to that note. Judgment of court below (Witherspoon, J.) affirmed.

Opinion by Mr. Justice FRASER (who sat in Mr. Justice McGOWAN'S seat), March 12, 1886. D. P. Verner, for appellant. W. C. Keith, J. J. Norton, contra.

No. 1862. FELDER v. WALKER, November Term, 1885.

The code is very properly liberal in allowing amendments, but where no cause of action is stated in a complaint, it is not a case of insufficiency to be corrected by motion before answer; demurrer (as in this case) is the proper remedy.

2. Husband and Wife [228.]

A complaint seeking to subject a wife's land to the payment of a debt due by her husband, upon allegations that this debt was assumed by the wife through her husband acting as her agent (without any direct allegations of agency), and that said husband had promised and agreed that said debt should be secured by a mortgage to be executed by his wife upon her land, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

3. Frauds, Statute of [16.]

Had the fact of agency and authority on the part of the husband been distinctly averred, the verbal promise to pay the debts of another is not binding.

A verbal promise by a married woman to execute a mortgage on her land is not binding upon her so as to authorize the enforcement of the agreement by foreclosing it as an actual mortgage executed by her for good and valuable consideration in respect to her separate estate. Judgment of Circuit Court (Fraser, J.) affirmed.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 27, 1886. J. C. Davant, for appellant. Robert Aldrich, contra.

No. 1866. COLN v. COLN, November Term, 1885. This was an action to remove cloud from title by cancellation of a deed, which plaintiff alleged defendant had received with full knowledge of plaintiff's title, and had put upon record before plaintiff recorded his deed. All the issues of law and fact were referred to a referee, who made his report, stating his conclusions of law and fact separately. He found that plaintiff's deed had never been delivered, and that the complaint should be dismissed. The Circuit decree (Witherspoon, J.) was a simple order confirming this report. On appeal, held—

1. Deeds [56; Reference 102.]

Where a decree confirms the separate findings of fact and law by a referee, it is not necessary that the decree should itself make separate findings.

Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. [56; Reference, Cent. Dig. § 185; Dec. Dig. 102.]

2. Findings of fact by referee and Circuit Judge, confirmed.

3. Deeds [54, 194.]

Delivery is essential to the validity of a deed, and the mere fact of manual delivery, in the absence of intention by that act to pass the title, will not be sufficient. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, intention to deliver may be inferred from mere manual delivery.

It is always competent to receive parol testimony as to the delivery of a deed; and when the question is as to the bona fides of a deed, such evidence may be received to show that the consideration named in the deed was not in fact paid.

In testifying to a date of a debt different from the date appearing in a judgment on such debt, in evidence, the witness does not contradict such record, and is not incompetent.

An exception couched in general terms cannot be considered. Judgment affirmed.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McJYER, March 30, 1886. W. A. Sanders, for appellant. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

No. 1867. CLARK v. SCHIPMAN, November Term, 1885. This was an action for specific performance. Held—

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1011.]

Findings of fact by master and Circuit Judge, sustained. Where the testimony is conflicting as to the material questions involved, this court rarely, if ever, undertakes to interfere with the conclusions of the court below.

The province of this court is simply to determine whether there is any error in the judgment appealed from, and not whether the reasons given to support such judgment are sound.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 30, 1886. Simons & Cappelmann, for appellant. Jervey & Jervery, contra.

24 S. C. *598

*In the case of THE STATE v. PACIFIC GUANO COMPANY, which will be found reported in 22 S. C. at page 50, there was a petition for rehearing by the State, alleging error in the ruling of the court as to the boundary line of the defendant on South Wimlee Creek and Bull River. Upon this petition, the court passed an order, dated January 7, 1885, which was inadvertently omitted in the publication of the case. The order was as follows:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition. When the opinion is properly understood, we do not think there is any occasion for a rehearing. The part to which our attention has been called is as follows: "We do not see how the defendants can have in the bed of this boundary (South Wimlee) any greater right than they have in the beds of the other boundaries, viz., Coosaw and Bull Rivers, as to both of which, by the express terms of their own deed, they only claim down to low water mark. That is also the limit of their right in South Wimlee." It is manifest that nothing was intended to be, or was adjudged, as to the boundaries on Coosaw and Bull Rivers, which were in no way before the court. South Wimlee Creek was referred to as one of the boundaries of Chisolm's Island, and as to that, the question as to the line of proprietorship, low or high water mark, was involved. Certain grants from the State (1869) covering marsh lands lying between high and low water mark were in evidence. The legality of these grants was not contested; but they had not been located, and it was not known to the court whether there were any marsh lands on South Wimlee Creek which these new grants did not cover. Being thus without information on that subject, this court could do no more than state the general rule as to the extent of private ownership in lands bounding on navigable tidal streams, and indicate "the limit" to which the grants, if located, could carry the title of defendants. That is to say, to declare the line to be an ordinary high water mark, except where the grants may cover the marsh; and where they do so, to declare the line of low water mark called for by them as "the limit of defendants' right," leaving, in either case, the bed proper, or bottom, below low water mark, as the property of the State. The petition for a rehearing is refused.

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME.

HON. WILLIAM D. SIMPSON, CHIEF JUSTICE.

HON. HENRY McIVER, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.

HON. SAMUEL MCGOWAN, "

25 S. C. *1

*GRAVELEY v. GRAVELEY.

[1. Domicile ⇨4.]

This court concurred with the master and Circuit Judge, that the domicile of testator at the time of the execution of his will and also at the time of his death, was in England, notwithstanding a previous residence for many years and denizenship in South Carolina, and the accumulation of property and investment of moneys here.

While a pecuniary legacy remains unpaid the executrix holds the residuum as assets of the estate, and not as bailee for trustees to whom the residuary estate is given.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇨523.]

The executrix of an English will who is also qualified here, holds the personal property of the testator situated here as assets of his estate, and subject to the claim of an unpaid legatee resident in this State.

[4. Executors and Administrators ⇨518.]

If a testator have personal property in a foreign country, the executor of the domicile has not the right, by virtue of the will alone, to go into that foreign country, and possess himself of that property, without new letters from the jurisdiction in which the property is found.

*The new administrator may or may not be the same person as the executor of the domicile. But, inasmuch as the law of the domicile must control in the succession or distribution of the effects, whether or not the administration granted is deemed the principal one and that in the foreign country as ancillary, yet there is no privity between them, but they are independent of each other. Each portion of the estate must be administered in the country in which possession is taken and held under lawful authority.

The only mode of reaching such assets is to require their transmission or distribution after all the claims against the foreign administration have been duly ascertained or settled.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Stevenson v. Dunlap, 33 S. C. 352, 11 S. E. 1017; Jones v. Jones, 39 S. C. 256, 17 S. E. 287, 802.

[7. Wills ⇨746.]

Where the will of a testator domiciled in England gave two thousand dollars to his nephew in this State, and the executrix qualified both in England and here and paid all the debts and legacies except this one, and there were assets in this State standing in the name of the executrix more than sufficient to pay this legacy, the nephew might maintain an action against the executrix in this State to recover this legacy.

The English courts not having construed this legacy, this court holds: That this legacy of two thousand dollars could be demanded by this nephew on attaining his majority, with simple (but not compound) interest at the rate of four per cent. (the English rate) from one year after date of testator's death, less the English legacy duty, and was not satisfied by the purchase, by the executrix in 1873, of such an amount in English consols as American paper would then buy.

Costs in an equity suit are within the discretion of the Circuit Judge as a part of the relief granted.

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, November, 1884.

This is the second appeal in this case, the first being reported 20 S. C., 93. This appeal was from the following decree:

The questions involved in this case are very interesting and of considerable importance, and I would be glad to have more time to consider and discuss them than I am able to bestow on them on account of the pressure of other official engagements.

The action has been brought in this case by the plaintiff to recover a legacy of "two thousand dollars," "to be held in trust by the executors," and "paid with the accumulations of interest" on his arrival at the age of twenty-one years, given in the will of plaintiff's uncle, John Graveley, who died in England. The will was executed in England, in 1862, and testator died 31 March, 1865. Maria T. Graveley, the executrix, qualified on *the will in England, in May, 1865, where the original will was admitted to probate, and, in 1872, she qualified as executrix in Charleston.

There are, as alleged in the complaint, in this State, certain assets held by the said Maria T. Graveley, as executrix, and more than sufficient to pay the claim of plaintiff, even if allowed to the full extent demanded, and these assets not having been turned over to any trustees named in the will, or trustees substituted in their places, are still a part of the estate. By the advice of eminent counsel, the executrix, in 1873, in England, where she resided, laid aside and invested in English consols, such a sum of money as would, at that time, have purchased the sum of two thousand dollars in legal tender notes of the United States, and simple interest thereon at four per cent. per annum from 31 March, 1866, being one year after death of testator. This investment in consols was sold by the executrix when plaintiff arrived at age, and the proceeds, less the English legacy duty, offered to him if he would sign a receipt in full for the legacy. This plaintiff refused to do, and now claims two thousand dollars, with South Carolina interest at seven per cent., payable annually from 31 March, 1866.

The testimony, amongst other things, shows that the testator was born a British subject, that he never became a citizen of this country, while, as a simple denizen, he held title to real estate in the city of Charleston, for business purposes, having never owned a dwelling house there; that he married in Charleston a Charleston lady, and accumulated there a handsome estate; that he went to England in 1859, leaving a large portion of his estate invested in bonds and mortgages and other securities in the city of Charleston. The weight of the testimony seems to me to be in favor of the view, that when the testator left Charleston, in 1859, the change was intended to be a permanent one. He was a British subject, and had no dwelling house here, and it was no uncommon thing for Englishmen residing in England to hold American investments.

While a good deal of the testimony of Mrs. Graveley is incompetent as "communications," under section 400 of the Code, it does not appear from anything in the testimony before me, that *the important statement made by Mrs. Graveley, that the testator voted in England, was made upon information derived by her from him, so as to have been founded on any "communications" between them. It was probably so, but she does not say so in her testimony. I, therefore, find that the testator was, at the time of his death, domiciled in England, and that the administration in England is the principal or chief, and that in South Carolina is the ancillary, administration.

I assume, therefore, in the further statement of my views, that Mrs. Graveley is properly before the court only in respect to her ancillary administration, and only in the same way as if some other person, who had no connection with the administration in England, was before the court as the ancillary executor or administrator. If the matter now stood before the court on the simple allegation that there were assets in the hands of the ancillary administrator or executor, and within the jurisdiction of the court, and no more, I do not see in any of the authorities before me any ground on which the court could exercise jurisdiction in the case. I take it to be well understood, that the primary purpose of an ancillary administration is to collect the assets and pay the debts, and then transmit the residuum for distribution, under the statutes or the will, to the administrator of the domicile; and the mere fact that some of the legatees or distributees resided in the ancillary jurisdiction, and assets were found there, does not give the court jurisdiction. There must be something more.

There are, however, certain facts set up in the answer, and testimony in reference to them has been taken without objection, and it will be better to determine the questions thus raised than to order the proceedings to be amended so as to make the allegation of these matters in the complaint. With this view, then, I find in this case as matters of fact, that the executrix does not set up that there are any debts to be provided for either in the principal or ancillary jurisdiction, or that there are any legacies, either specific or of a general pecuniary character, except the one to be paid to the plaintiff in this case, which have not been provided for. It is admitted that there were funds in the hands of the English executrix, applicable to this legacy, and *that the funds for this purpose were invested in England, and that the assets in this jurisdiction are sufficient to pay this legacy, and are without any claim on them except in favor of the residuary legatees under the will. These circumstances make a very material difference, as I take it, in the matter of jurisdiction.

It was admitted in the argument that the authorities are in favor of the rule, that in some special cases residuary legatees can sue for their legacies in the ancillary jurisdiction. When it is considered that in the order of distribution and payment of legacies, pecuniary legacies stand ahead of and are payable before residuary legacies, it is not apparent what reason there should be for allowing the residuary legatees to sue, and not the pecuniary legatees. It requires an accounting by the executor before the court can determine whether there are any funds applicable to the pecuniary legacies, and it requires the very same accounting, and besides an accounting as to the payment of specific and pecuniary legacies, before the court can judicially ascertain that there is anything applicable to the residuary legacies. It is not, therefore, the liability of the domiciliary administration to account, which is the test of the jurisdiction of the court of the ancillary administration.

It seems to me that the true test to be gathered from all the cases on this subject is the fact that it is either admitted or clearly shown that no accounting is necessary in order to show that the funds in the ancillary jurisdiction are not necessary to meet demands against it in the country of the domicile. In Cureton v. Mills (13 S. C., 409 [36 Am. Rep. 700]), it is said that "courts of ancillary administration have undertaken to distribute the estate of a foreign decedent, but this is an exceptional jurisdiction, depending on special circumstances." In Harvey v. Richards (1 Mason, 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 6,184]), the jurisdiction was exercised in favor of "distributees." And in 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 589, it is said that such courts are not incompetent to decree a final distribution to and among "the various claimants" having equities or rights in the funds.

In Whitehurst v. Whitehurst (6 Va. Law J.), while the general doctrine was admitted that distribution must be according to the law of the domicile, it was said that this might be done in *the courts of the local administration when all the parties reside there. In re Hughes, Adm'r., etc. (95 N. Y. 55), the local administration was in New York, and all the parties next of kin resided there, and the Pennsylvania administrator, who was the domiciliary administrator, was allowed to intervene, and failing to show that there were any creditors in Pennsylvania, the New York court proceeded to administer the estate. In Musselman's Appeal (101 Pa. St., 165), it was held that no proceedings could be in that State, either by an administrator d. b. n. c. t. a., or by a legatee, or a cestui que trust under the will, until an account had been filed in the foreign state (where was the domicile) showing a balance in his hands. In Leach v. Buckner (19 W. Va., 36), it was held, that where a part of the heirs and distributees resided in Ohio, and a part in West Virginia, those in the latter State could there impeach for fraud the returns made in Ohio (the domicile), those returns being used for the purpose of diminishing the estate for which the administrator was liable in Pennsylvania.

In citing the above authorities, I have been compelled to rely on brief abstracts. They, however, lead me to the conclusion that courts of the ancillary jurisdiction have the right to order the payment of a legacy or the distribution of the funds to residuary legatees, or under the statute of the domicile, wherever it appears as a matter of fact that there are funds of the estate in the hands of the executor in the ancillary jurisdiction, unless it be made to appear that in good faith an accounting is necessary in the jurisdiction of the domicile, or that for some other purpose the equities of the parties require that the funds shall be sent there for distribution. I do not think that any such necessity has been shown here. The legacy, it is admitted, has been unpaid; the estate is amply able to pay it; no conflicting equities have been shown, requiring the control of the English courts, and there are ample funds in this jurisdiction to pay it.

The personal estate of a decedent, however, is to be regarded as having no other locality for the purposes of succession or distribution than his domicile, and the law of the domicile is also the law by which bequests of personalty are to be construed and paid, and the ancillary administrator it seems to me by a proper *inference, should not be held to any liability in reference to payments of principal or interest out of the estate, save those by which the administrator of the domicile is governed. 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 588; Eells v. Holder, 2 McCrary, 622 [12 Fed. 668]. This latter case, with several others above cited, are referred to in the American notes to the case of Blackwood v. The Queen (35 Moak Eng. R., 671), which itself goes to great length on this subject.

I think, therefore, that while the courts of ancillary administration have jurisdiction to order the payment of the legacy in a case like this out of the estate, that jurisdiction should be carefully exercised so as to give the legatee no more than he would be entitled to if he had sued for his legacy in the courts of the domicile. It is very important that our courts should exercise in this matter a wise discretion, especially when it seems to be the now settled policy of the State to invite all persons, whose domicile is, as to this question, foreign to this State, to invest here, in stocks and bonds and many important enterprises, capital so much needed to restore the waste places of the State. It does not seem to me wise to exercise such a jurisdiction if the effect is to be, as claimed here, to give out of the estate higher interest on legacies than can be claimed by the legatees living in the country of the domicile.

A very serious difficulty presents itself in principle, that the laws of other States and foreign governments are to be investigated in this court as matters of fact and not matters of law. The legacy is for "two thousand dollars." In ordinary cases the court is presumed to know the meaning of words, and the cases in which it is proper to resort to testimony of witnesses to explain and define their meaning are exceptional. The word "dollar" in this will is one which the court must construe for itself. All the contents of the will, I think, show that the word was used in the American sense. The will speaks at the death, but it is not material whether the word is to be construed as to its meaning then, or at its date. At the date of the will the legal tender act had not been passed, and that, as construed in Lane County v. Oregon (7 Wall., 79 [19 L. Ed. 101]), applies only to debts arising under contract.

I cannot, therefore, accept the view of *the witness, that dollar meant United States legal tender notes, and not gold or other coin.

I am satisfied from the testimony that in England 4 per cent. was the amount of interest allowed on legacies. The investments here are not in interest-bearing securities, but are such as may or may not yield any interest, and there is no proof that any, much less larger, interest was made here. The case of Bourke v. Ricketts, in 10 Vesey, 330, does not seem to lay down any general rule, but depends on special circumstances, and it would not do in all cases to apply, between independent states, a rule adopted between England and her colonies.

The principle that this legacy under the English law, which is presumed to be the same as ours, was required to be invested at annual interest, is clearly deducible from the statements of the witness, and this accords with my view of the law in this State, and should therefore be applied here. Whatever benefit there may have been to the English executrix in making the investments in consols, even if, under any circumstances, that fact could be available here, has been lost because the investment in the consols themselves has been sold by her and only the proceeds offered to the legatee, and this solely in her capacity as English executrix. Besides this, there has been no good reason shown why in making that investment the interest was limited only as simple interest and not compound. The facts, therefore, on which this opinion of the English counsel is based are not before the court, and may not be those on which in fact the rights of the parties depended. I must therefore apply the principle, and allow compound interest from the 31 March, 1886.

I also think that the ancillary executrix should reserve sufficient funds to meet any expenses necessarily incurred by the executrix of the domicile, and that there should be reserved from this fund and remitted a sufficient amount to repay the English executrix the amount of legacy duty paid in England, with interest at the same rate and counted in the same way—amounting at the time of this decree to ($95.28) ninety-five 28—100 dollars—leaving a balance to be paid to plaintiff of ($3,947.61) three thousand nine hundred and forty-seven 61—100 dollars.

*I do not think this a case for costs to be paid either by the executrix out of her own or out of the estate of the testator.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the defendant, Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley, deceased, in this county and State, do pay to the plaintiff out of the assets standing in her name in this State, as executrix, the said sum of three thousand nine hundred and forty-seven 61—100 dollars ($3,947.61), each party paying his or her own costs. It is ordered that parties may apply at the foot of this decree for any order necessary and proper to carry out the same.

From this decree both parties appealed upon the several exceptions set forth in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. T. W. Bacot and Lord & Hyde, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for executrix.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This case was once before in this court (see 20 S. C., 99), to which reference is made for a full statement of the facts. It will there be seen that the action was for a legacy with its accumulations of interest given to the plaintiff, John Graveley, by the will of his grand uncle, John Graveley, deceased, against Maria Torrens Graveley, the widow of the deceased, and the executrix of his will; that the testator, John Graveley, sr., though born an English subject, had lived many years in the city of Charleston, in this State, where he had married, reared a family, and acquired most of his property; but that several years before his death he took his family with him to England, and there, June 27, 1862, executed his will, and on March 31, 1865, died, leaving his will in full force. The executrix qualified on the will in England and also in South Carolina, where a large part of the property still remained, as it had been invested by the testator in his lifetime.

By the will the testator gave to his nephew, the plaintiff, who was, and is, a citizen of Charleston, South Carolina, a legacy in the following words: "I give and bequeath two thousand dollars each to John Graveley and Francis Porcher Graveley, the sons *of my nephew, Cowlam Graveley, to be held in trust for them by my executors, and paid them, with the accumulations of interest, as they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years." &c. John Graveley, the legatee, attained the age indicated on September 18, 1879, and upon making application for his legacy, was informed that the executrix, in 1873, by the advice of eminent counsel, had laid aside and invested in English three per cent. consols such a sum of money as would, on March 31, 1866 (one year after the death of testator), have purchased two thousand dollars in legal tender notes of the United States, and added to said consols a further amount, being the interest on said sum at four per cent. from March 31, 1866, to date of investment. That the dividends from such invested consols were reinvested by the executrix from time to time in consols producing interest or dividends, and that upon the plaintiff arriving at age, the said alleged investment was sold, and the proceeds, less the English "legacy duty," were offered to plaintiff, if he would sign a receipt in full for the legacy. This the plaintiff refused to do, and claiming two thousand dollars, with South Carolina interest at seven per cent., payable annually from March 31, 1866, instituted this action to recover the same against Maria Torrens Graveley, as executrix, in the State of South Carolina.

The executrix claimed that the English was the domiciliary administration, and that of South Carolina was only ancillary, and that she could not be sued by a legatee for his legacy in the ancillary jurisdiction, even if the legatee were a citizen of that jurisdiction; and, in addition to this defence, on general principles that this action could not be maintained against her as executrix in any jurisdiction, for the reason that, as executrix, she had settled the estate in full, and invested the legacy of plaintiff in British consols, and if liable at all, she was only liable in the character of trustee, for the said consols, in which the legacy had been invested. In the first judgment in the case this court held that the defendant was not discharged from responsibility for the legacy of the plaintiff by the alleged voluntary ex parte investment in English consols, and that she might be sued and the fairness of the alleged investment inquired into "by a proceeding in equity against the executrix as such, in any court where the *executrix is amenable to account, in this country or in England." But inasmuch as it did not appear with sufficient clearness whether the domicile of the testator, at the time of his death, was in England or America, or whether at the time the action was brought there were assets of the estate still remaining in this jurisdiction, the court remanded the case, "with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to amend his complaint by making proper allegations, so as to make the question of the domicile of the testator at the time of his death, and as to the existence of assets, their character, and amount of the estate of John Graveley in the State of South Carolina when the action was commenced."

Accordingly the case went back, and it being referred without prejudice to master Sass to report the testimony, he reported on the question of domicile, "that when John Graveley, the testator, left Charleston in 1859 and returned to England, he did so with the intention of residing permanently in England, his native country, and without any intention of returning to America to reside there; and that he did reside in England from that time until his death, in 1865." And upon the question of assets within the State, he found "that there stood at and before the commencement of this action, and there now stands, in the name of Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley, on the books of the State treasurer, State of South Carolina consol stock to the amount of $10,000; on the books of the Bank of Charleston, National Banking Association, six shares Bank of Charleston stock (par value $600); and on the books of the Charleston Gas Light Company, seventy-five shares (par value $1,875). And that the dividends, interest, and income from the foregoing property have been, up to the present time, drawn and received by Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley; and also that she, as such executrix, received the insurance money of the buildings on said lot destroyed by fire, as aforesaid, and the purchase money for said lot," &c.

The cause came up on exceptions to this report, and the Circuit Judge held that the domicile of the testator at the time of his death was in England; and that, as a consequence, the estate, whether in England or still remaining in South Carolina, must be administered according to the English law.

But as it abundantly appeared from the pleadings and facts admitted, that all the debts were paid, and that there are no legacies, either specific or of a general pecuniary character, except the one to be paid to the plaintiff, which are not provided for, and no further account for any purpose whatever is necessary, there could be no good and sufficient reason why the property here should be sent to England only to come back in the shape of a legacy to the plaintiff. And according to this view he proceeded to adjudge the rights of the parties, in obedience, however, to the English law. In doing so the judge held that the proper construction of the legacy for $2,000 was that it should be paid in gold or silver coin, or its equivalent, and that this sum, together with the English interest of four per cent. compounded, was now the true amount of the legacy, which less by the "legacy duty" paid by the executrix, he decreed should be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant, as executrix of the will of the testator, John Graveley, viz., $3,947.61, each party paying his or her own costs. The judge, however, dismissed the complaint as to William Watson, who was impleaded as original or substituted trustee under the residuary provision of the will, but denied ever having acted as such trustee; and also as to Isabella Emma Graveley and Anna Julia Graveley, daughters of, and interested in, the residuum with the defendant, Maria Torrens Graveley, with the costs of these defendants to be taxed against the plaintiff.

From this decree both parties appealed. The plaintiff also, because he was charged with the costs of the parties, as to whom the complaint was dismissed.

Plaintiff's Exceptions. 1. Because his honor found "that when the testator left Charleston in 1859 the change was intended to be a permanent one," and "that the testator was at the time of his death domiciled in England, and that the administration in England is the principal or chief, and that in South Carolina the ancillary, administration."

2. Because his honor found as follows: "I am satisfied from the testimony that in England four per cent. was the amount of interest allowed on legacies," and "the investments here are not in interest-bearing securities."

3. Because his honor found as follows: "I also think that the ancillary executrix should reserve sufficient funds to meet any expenses necessarily incurred by the executrix of the domicile, and that there should be reserved from this fund and remitted a sufficient amount to repay the English executrix the amount of 'legacy duty' paid in England, with interest at the same rate, and counted in the same way—amounting at the time of this decree to $95.28—leaving a balance to be paid to plaintiff of $3,947.61."

4. Because his honor found as follows: "I do not think this is a case for costs to be paid either by the executrix out of her own or out of the estate of the testator."

5. Because his honor ordered: "That the defendant, Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley, deceased, do pay to the plaintiff * * * the said sum of $3,947.61, each party paying his or her own costs."

And the plaintiff also appeals from the orders of Judge Fraser dismissing the complaint against defendants, William Watson, Isabella E. Graveley, and Anna Julia Graveley, with costs.

Defendants' Exceptions. 1. That his honor erred in holding that "there are, as alleged in the complaint, in this State certain assets held by the said Maria T. Graveley, as executrix, and more than sufficient to pay the claim of plaintiff, even if allowed to the full extent demanded, and these assets not having been turned over to any trustees named in the will, or trustees substituted in their places, are still a part of the estate."

II. This was only as to an unimportant error of fact which has been corrected in the foregoing statement.

III. His honor erred in holding that it is admitted "that the assets in this jurisdiction are sufficient to pay this legacy, and are without any claims on them, except in favor of the residuary legatees under the will," the defendant having throughout denied that the securities, now held by her in South Carolina, are in law "assets" of the estate of John Graveley, and having, in her answer and otherwise, insisted that these securities are not held by her as executrix, or as a part of "the estate" of John Graveley, but, on the contrary, are held as investments of the residue of the personal estate given by testator in his will expressly upon certain trusts, and are held by defendant, Maria T. Graveley, simply as bailee, subject to the demand of the trustees named in the will, or to the claims of their cestui que trust, the residuary legatees, who reside in England.

IV. His honor erred in holding that the circumstances that the executrix does not set up that there are any debts to be provided for, either in the principal or ancillary jurisdiction, or that there are any legacies, either specific or of a general pecuniary character, except the one to be paid to the plaintiff in this case, which have not been provided for:

and the circumstances "that there were funds in the hands of the English executrix applicable to this legacy, and that the funds for this purpose were invested in England, and that the assets in this jurisdiction are sufficient to pay the legacy, and are without any claims upon them, except in favor of the residuary legatees under the will," are circumstances which make a very material difference in the matter of jurisdiction, or are such circumstances as would justify the courts of South Carolina, as courts of an ancillary jurisdiction, in assuming, by reason of the mere presence of such property of foreign residuary legatees, accidentally within the territorial limits of this State, a jurisdiction over a foreign domiciliary executrix, to try such foreign executrix in South Carolina as for a breach of trust or failure to perform her duty as such executrix in England, or are such circumstances as would warrant a court of ancillary jurisdiction in seizing upon property of residuary legatees and appropriating it to pay the demands of a mere pecuniary legatee of the testator, or to make good to him such alleged default or breach of trust committed by the domiciliary executor in England.

V. His honor erred in holding that "it is not apparent what reason there should be for not allowing the residuary legatee to sue, and not the pecuniary legatees, in the ancillary jurisdiction," and should, on the contrary, have held that the residuary legatee, when allowed to maintain his action against an ancillary executor, under peculiar circumstances, sues in the ancillary jurisdiction, not for alleged breach of trust of the domiciliary executrix alleged to have occurred in his administration of the estate in the jurisdiction of the domicile, as is attempted by this plaintiff, but sues for "distribution" and for such distribution of "the *residue" as his own property, or as property in which he has an interest, or specific share, under the will; pursues the funds or property found within the ancillary jurisdiction as the rem—the subject matter of his suit—and sues the ancillary executor as the means of reaching and detaining the specific property held by him to be remitted to the domiciliary executor for distribution by him under the will, whereas the pecuniary legatee has no claim for "distribution": is bound by the will and by the law of the domicile: has no privity of estate in the assets: has no privity upon which to found his action as legatee, except through the executor of the domicile; has no claim on the property of the estate, except through such executor; has no claim as general legatee on the assets found in the ancillary jurisdiction: has no right to pursue such assets specifically, or to sue the ancillary administrator in respect of such assets, or for distribution, or as the subject matter of trust in his behalf; and has no claim whatever upon "the residue" belonging to residuary legatees in such ancillary territory.

VI. His honor erred in construing the will so as to read two thousand gold dollars, or "two thousand dollars, payable in gold."

VII. His honor erred in holding "that this legacy, under the English law, which is presumed to be the same as ours, was required to be invested at annual interest, and that such principle is clearly deducible from the statements of the witnesses."

VIII. His honor erred in holding that the law of South Carolina as to investments should be applied here in the case of this legacy.

IX. His honor erred in holding that "whatever benefit there may have been to the English executrix in making the investment in consols, even if under any circumstances that fact could be made available here, has been lost, because the investment in the consols themselves has been sold by her, and only the proceeds offered to the legatee, and this solely in her capacity as English executrix. Besides this, there is no good reason shown why, in making that investment, the interest was limited only as simple interest, and not as compound." And in holding "that the facts, therefore, on which this opinion of the English counsel *is based, are not before the court, and may not be those on which in fact the rights of the parties depended."

X. His honor erred in holding that compound interest from March 31, 1866, is to be charged against the defendant.

XI. His honor erred in taking jurisdiction of the accountability of an English domiciliary executrix for insufficient investment in a suit brought in South Carolina against an ancillary executrix by a pecuniary or general legatee.

XII. His honor erred in entertaining the complaint as if it were an action brought against the ancillary executor.

XIII. His honor erred in entertaining the jurisdiction in this case, as if it were an action brought against the ancillary executor "in respect of assets."

XIV. His honor erred in adjudging "that Maria Torrens Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley, deceased, in this county and State, do pay to the plaintiff out of the assets standing in her name in this State as executrix the sum of three thousand nine hundred and forty-seven 61-100 dollars."

XV. His honor should have dismissed the complaint and referred the plaintiff, for his alleged grievance or accountability, to the English courts, to whom the executrix was and is accountable for her actings and doings as executrix of the domicile.

We will not follow the exceptions of plaintiff and defendant, but endeavor to consider them in order as they arise in connection with the subject matter.

First. As to the domicile of the testator at the time of his death. There is a great deal of nice learning upon the subject of domicile, but we do not think it necessary in this case to go into it. Without reference to the distinction suggested between British and English born, there is no doubt that the testator came to Charleston as a foreigner, and there is no evidence that he was ever naturalized. For the purpose of enabling him to hold real estate and facilitating his business, he became a denizen under the South Carolina law, and nothing more. It is true that he immigrated to the State at an early age; that he prospered in business here, and accumulated a fortune, which was invested to a large extent in South Carolina stocks and securities; that he married and had a family of children in Charleston, where he resided and did business as a merchant. But it seems that, like most Englishmen, he longed to return to the mother country and enjoy his wealth and rear his family among his early friends. The master found "that he left Charleston in 1859 and returned to England with the intention of residing permanently in England, his native country, and without any intention of returning to America to reside there; and that he did reside in England from that time until his death." Upon this finding and consideration of the evidence, which is all in the brief, the Circuit Judge held that the testator, John Graveley, was domiciled in England, where he made his will and died, and we cannot say that such ruling was error. "A man's domicile is prima facie the place of his residence, but this may be rebutted by showing that such residence is either constrained or transitory." 1 Jarm. Wills, 20, and note; 2 Wms. Exrs. (6 Am. Ed.), 1517, and notes.

Second. As to assets remaining in the State. The master found "that there stood at and before the action, and that there now stand, in the name of Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley, certain South Carolina bonds and securities (describing them to a large amount), and that the dividends, interest, and income have been, up to the present time, drawn and received by Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley," &c. These South Carolina securities, still in the condition in which the testator left them, are in amount largely more than sufficient to pay the legacy ($2,000) of the plaintiff, and are in the possession or under the control of the defendant, Maria T. Graveley, as executrix of John Graveley. But it is denied that these securities can properly be called "assets" of the estate, for the reason that the executrix has paid all the debts and all the pecuniary legacies (except that of the plaintiff, and having "set aside" certain consols in England in full payment of that legacy), the estate of the testator should be regarded as substantially settled; and these securities, although standing in her name as executrix, are really and equitably the property of the trustees, named in the will, and are now held by the executrix "simply as bailee, subject to the demand of the trustees, or to the claims of their cestui que trust, the residuary legatees, who reside in England."

"We cannot accept this view. These securities certainly were assets when the executrix took out letters testamentary in this State, by virtue of which alone she was enabled to control them. If so, when did they cease to be "assets"? They were never transferred to herself as executrix in England. We hear of no final settlement or receipt of the trustee or the discharge of the executrix. Mr. Adams says: "It is not until the debts and legacies are paid and the residue ascertained and appropriated, or until some legacy has been set apart from the general fund, that his representative character (executor) ceases, and he becomes a trustee of such residue or appropriated legacy, and is subject, in respect of it to the ordinary rules respecting trust property." Adams Eq., *251. It will be seen that the view suggested assumes that the defendant fully discharged herself as executrix by the purchase of a certain amount of consols in England, and the tender of "the result" of their sale, which is the very question in the case, if it was not decided by the former judgment in the case. As we understand it, an executor continues to hold his office until all his duties as executor have been performed. Dickerson v. Smith, 17 S. C., 289.

This may be the proper connection in which to make another remark. We do not regard this as an action in this jurisdiction to make the executrix personally liable for alleged wrong in making "an insufficient investment" in England as to the consols purchased and afterwards sold by her, but simply as an action to enforce payment of a legacy withheld, without noticing the transaction as to the consols or making any charge in regard to it, except to impeach its fairness and legality, when it is interposed as an obstacle in the way of his recovery. As we understand it, the action is for the legacy against the executrix in respect of assets within the State, precisely as a South Carolina creditor might bring his action here against the executrix. If she have no assets within the jurisdiction, she could plead plene administravit, but if she have such, the recovery would follow; to that extent, and in that manner, this action is "in respect of assets."

Third. This brings us to the most important question in the case. That is, the domicile of the testator being in England, and

ecutrix and recover a pecuniary legacy, there being ample assets here to pay the same: or whether his prayer for relief here must be refused, the assets transmitted to England, and he required to go there and make his claim in that jurisdiction. As said by Judge Story in the great case of Harvey v. Richards, 1 Mason, 408 [Fed. Cas. No. 6,184]: "This is a question involving the doctrines of national comity, or, what might be more fitly termed, international law. And looking to it as a question of principle, it would not seem to be attended with any intrinsic difficulty. The property is here, the parties are here, and the rule of distribution is fixed. What reason, then, exists why the court should not proceed to decree according to the rights of the parties? Why should it send our own citizens to a foreign tribunal to seek that justice which it is in its own power to administer without injustice to any other person? I say, without injustice. It may be admitted that a Court of Equity ought not to be the instrument of injustice; and that if in the given case such would be the effect of its interposition, it ought to withhold its arm."

There is certainly some want of clearness in the authorities as to the liabilities and duties of domiciliary and ancillary administrators, and the precise line of demarcation between them. For the sake of brevity, we may assume several propositions as settled. We take it as settled: 1. That if a testator have personal property in a foreign country, the executor of the domicile has not the right, by virtue of the will alone, to go into that foreign country and possess himself of that property without new letters from the jurisdiction in which the property is found. Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C., 573 [37 Am. Rep. 737]. 2. That the new administrator may, or may not, be the same person as the executor of the domicile. But whether or not, inasmuch as the law of the domicile must control in the succession or distribution of the effects, the administration granted there is deemed the principal or primary one, and that in the foreign country as ancillary, yet there is no privity between them, but they are independent of each other. "Each portion of the estate must be administered in the country in *which possession is taken and held under lawful authority." 3 Wms. Exrs., § 1664. 3. That the only mode of reaching such assets is to require their transmission or distribution, after all the claims against the foreign administration have been duly ascertained or settled. "The residue is transmissible to the home administration only when a final account has been settled in the proper tribunal where the new administration is granted, upon the equitable principles adopted by its own law in the application and distribution of the assets found there." Story

Conf. Law, § 513; 3 Wms. Exrs. (6 Am. Ed.), 1664, and notes.

These points being taken as settled, it is manifest that the question of importance is, as to what claims may be asserted in the ancillary jurisdiction before the residuum is ascertained and transmitted. It is conceded on all sides, that the ancillary jurisdiction will not transmit the property found there until all the domestic creditors are provided for. But it is contended that the principle on which the creditors are paid, does not embrace domestic legatees; for the reason that they derive their claims from the bounty of the testator, and therefore, under all circumstances, must go to the home administration. We believe it is true that, as a rule, legatees go to the administration of the domicile, but, as it strikes us, not for the reason suggested. Although a legatee is a volunteer, the duty to pay him, if there are assets, is none the less obligatory on that account. But for the reason that there may not be sufficient assets, that his legacy may have to abate to pay debts, and that a general settlement and marshalling of assets may be necessary, it is considered to be safe, convenient, and orderly that, as a rule, the legatee should go to the home administration.

But there are well established exceptions to this rule, proceeding, as it seems to us, upon the principle that when the general estate has been settled, and there is no need of further account, an exceptional case has arisen, and the reason of the rule ceasing, the rule itself ceases. There are numerous cases in which the ancillary jurisdiction has entertained actions in behalf of citizens, who were mere volunteers. See Harvey v. Richards, supra; Cureton v. Mills, 13 S. C., 410 [36 Am. Rep. 700], and other cases cited by the Circuit Judge. It is not denied that these were cases of mere *volunteers, but then another modification is suggested, that in all these cases the parties were distributees or residuary legatees. If the fact be so, why should that make the difference, unless the circumstance of their being residuary was taken as evidence that the estates were already settled and no further account necessary?

If this is the feature which makes residuary legacies exceptional, the one before us—although demonstrative in form—is in character residuary, in the sense that, the estate being settled, it is the only liability remaining. The legacy is fixed in amount and there are assets, it must certainly be paid in full, and the only question is, where shall it be paid? Suppose the testator had given to the plaintiff, not two thousand dollars, but one of his South Carolina State bonds of the denomination of $2,000, would this court, under the circumstances, be required to transmit that bond to England, really for no other purpose than to make the plaintiff go there to receive it from the defendant in her character of domiciliary executrix? But without pursuing this, Judge Story in stating the rule makes no reference to any such distinctions between residuary and other legatees. He says: "Still, however, the new administration is made subservient to the rights of creditors, legatees, and distributees, who are resident within the country where it is granted; and the residuum is transmissible * * * only when a final account has been settled in the proper tribunal, where the new administration is granted, upon the equitable principles adopted by its own law in the application of the assets found there." Story Conf. Law, § 513, and notes.

We cannot say that the Circuit Judge erred in holding that "courts of the ancillary jurisdiction have the right to order the payment of a legacy or the distribution of funds to residuary legatees, or under the statute of the domicile, whenever it appears as matter of fact, that there are funds of the estate in the hands of the ancillary jurisdiction; unless it be made to appear that in good faith an accounting is necessary in the jurisdiction of the domicile, or that for some other purpose the equities of the parties require that the funds shall be sent there for distribution."

dismiss the complaint, it is necessary to decide all the questions in the case. We would be pleased to escape this responsibility as the law of the domicile (England) must be applied. We undertake to do so with diffidence arising from a conscious want of familiarity with the English law. The terms of the legacy, however, are plain and simple. The bequest gave directly to the plaintiff two thousand dollars ($2,000), to be held by the executors until he attained the age of twenty-one years, and then with the accumulations of interest to be paid to him. Both the amount and time of payment were fixed, and it would seem that no question could arise about it, except possibly as to the interest. But the executrix claims that in 1873, some seven years after the legacy had been in her hands, bearing interest under the English law at four per cent., she, under the advice of eminent English counsel, invested such a sum of money as would have purchased seven years before (1866) legal tender notes of the United States of the nominal value of $2,000, but which at that time were considerably under par; and, adding the interest at four per cent. down to the time of the transaction, "laid aside" these three per cent. consols as the legacy of the plaintiff; and that when he came of age, these consols were not offered to him, but sold and "the proceeds," less the English "legacy duty," tendered to him in full payment.

It has never been decided by an English court, that the amount thus tendered was the whole legacy of the plaintiff. If it had been, we would of course, with proper deference, conform to that judgment, but the matter is now before the court as an original question. As to the currency in which a legacy is to be paid, the intention of the testator must furnish the rule. 2 Wms. Exrs., 1433. This legacy was given by the testator to his nephew, an American born, though then under age and living with his father at Charleston. It was expressed in dollars, and not to be paid until the nephew reached the age of twenty-one years. The will was executed in England, before the national currency of the United States (which growing out of the late war was abnormal) had come into existence; and we are not at liberty to conclude that the testator foresaw that there would be such paper currency in the United States,

We cannot doubt that when the testator said "dollars," he meant real dollars in coin, or its equivalent, and not mere paper promises to pay dollars, rising or falling in value according to circumstances. If this is, in all respects, an English legacy, how could it be discharged by a purchase of consols with American paper currency which were never a legal tender in England? It does not seem consistent to consider it an English legacy as to interest, investment, &c., and yet allow payment in advance of the time, and in a depreciated paper currency not recognized in England. The plaintiff, when he reached full age, was not, as it seems to us, bound to accept what was tendered by the executrix as his legacy, and is now entitled to recover two thousand dollars in coin or its equivalent, with the proper accumulations of interest.

Fifth. Then as to the rate and manner of calculating the interest. It seems that the rate of interest upon a legacy allowed by the English law is four per cent., to be computed upon the principal only and not upon the principal and interest, but under particular circumstances the court will allow the legatee compound interest, as where there is an express direction in the will that the executor shall lay out the fund to accumulate, and he neglects to do so. 2 Wms. Exrs., 1433. The phrase "accumulations of interest" may seem to indicate somewhat vaguely the idea of interest on interest, but there is no express direction in the will that the executrix should invest the legacy in any particular securities, or indeed to invest it at all, and as we have proceeded on the view that in fact there was no valid investment, we hesitate to require compound interest. See Robinson v. Robinson, 1 DeG. M. & G., 247, cited and commented on in 3 Wms. Exrs., 1815. Our own court is also disinclined to charge executors or trustees with compound interest. Baker v. Lafitte, 4 Rich. Eq., 392. Upon the whole, we think the plaintiff should recover two thousand dollars with simple interest thereon at the rate of four per cent., from one year after the testator's death (March 16, 1866) until paid, less whatever may be the proper "legacy duty" on the amount.

*Costs in an equity suit are within the discretion of the chancellor as a part of the relief granted, and in accordance with this general rule upon the subject we will not interfere with his decree in that respect.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, except as to the interest chargeable upon the legacy, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court, in order that the exact amount may be ascertained and adjudged according to the conclusions herein announced.

[2. Evidence ⇨519.]

A witness personally acquainted with the character and location of a turn-table may testify that it was dangerous for children to ride thereon.

Where there is an absence of all testimony as to any or all material points embraced in the issues between the parties, a non-suit should be ordered. If there is any pertinent testimony, whether weak or strong, the force and effect of which has to be weighed, the case must go to the jury.

[4. Trial ⇨165.]

On motion for non-suit, the judge can only determine whether there is any pertinent testimony; on motion for new trial, he may determine its sufficiency. Hence, a judge may grant a new trial to defendant where the same testimony would not permit a non-suit.

There being testimony that the turn table was dangerous, was located in an exposed place, easily accessible, unfenced, unguarded, and unlocked; that the plaintiff was of an age when he could not understand that the turn-table was dangerous, and that he had no right to inter-meddle with it—there was some pertinent testimony upon the issue of negligence, and a non-suit was properly refused.

[6. Negligence ⇨17, 136.]

The judge declined to charge that "the degree of care required of defendant is only such as is exercised by well regulated railroads over their turn-tables, and that if defendant exercised such care in this case, there was no negligence"—saying that other railroads' negligence could not excuse negligence by this defendant, and that it was for the jury to say whether there was negligence here. In this there was no *error. What well regulated railroads do may be very different from what prudence would require them to do.

Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, March, 1885.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, a youth under twelve years of age, while playing with other boys on the turntable of the defendant, located in Hendersonville, North Carolina, was badly injured, and he brought the action below through his guardian ad litem, in Spartanburg County, for damages, alleging negligence in the defendant, because said turn-table, being located in an open common near the highway, where the boys of the village were accustomed to play, &c., was yet not fenced or guarded, or locked, or secured, when not in use, but was negligently left exposed and accessible to children, who, not knowing the danger, made use of it as a means of amusement.

The jury rendered a verdict of $5,000 in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment being entered the defendant appealed. The appeal involves, 1st, a question as to the admissibility of certain testimony introduced by the plaintiff; 2d, whether a non-suit moved for by defendant should not have been granted; 3d, in not charging certain requests of the defendant; and, 4th, in charging certain propositions claimed by defendant to have been error.

First. As to the admissibility of the testimony objected to. It seems that certain witnesses were examined by commission, who were asked in said commission if a turn-table was dangerous, no objection being interposed in the commission to this question. These witnesses were examined also generally as to the location of this turn-table, &c., and they stated that it was dangerous for children to ride thereon. It is stated that this testimony was objected to at the trial. Objection overruled. We think the ruling of his honor was correct. The fact that no objection was interposed in the commission would not be sufficient to prevent objection at its opening on the ground that the testimony was already in the case without objection. McBride v. Ellis, 9 Rich., 269 [67 Am. Dec. 553]. But besides this, which is satisfactory, the opinion of the witnesses, as given, was not an abstract opinion, founded upon the evidence of facts testified to by other witnesses and given as the opinion of experts, but it was a statement based upon the witnesses' own knowledge of the character and location of this turn-table, and inferred from the facts to which the witnesses had testified in the course of their examination. That such testimony is generally received by the courts, see Ward v. Charleston City Railway Co., 19 S. C., 526 [45 Am. Rep. 794]; Seibles v. Blackwell, 1 McMull., 56, and the general doctrine discussed in Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C., 66 [45 Am. Rep. 761].

2d. Should the motion for non-suit have been granted? The law in reference to non-suits, as we have held in several cases, is this: Where there is an absence of all testimony as to any or to all material points embraced in the issue between the parties, a non-suit should be ordered. Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, 19 S. C., 32; Redding v. R. R. Co., 3 Id., 9 [16 Am. Rep. 681]; Boykin v. Watts, 6 S. C., 83; Holley v. Walker, 7 Id., 144. And this is, or may be, a preliminary question raised by the defendant before he enters upon his defense, and addressed to the judge. The judge is charged with the law involved, and it is his duty to determine what are the material points embraced in the issue; in other words, what points the law of the case requires the plaintiff to prove in order to recover. And while he cannot say whether these points, one or all, have been proved or not on a motion of non-suit, and while he cannot base his order upon such conclusion, yet he can say whether the facts proved or the testimony offered touch the issue; and if in his judgment they fail to touch the issue, or any material point thereof, being as to said issue irrelevant and non-pertinent, it would be proper for him to grant a non-suit. His judgment in this respect may or not be erroneous, but still it is his province—not final, it is true, but nevertheless his province, subject to review on appeal. On the other hand, where there is testimony in the case directed and pertinent to the issues involved, and to all material points thereof, whether weak or strong, yet pertinent, the force and effect of which has to be weighed in determining whether said points have been proved, the case must go to the jury, because, under our system of jurisprudence, whether the testimony bearing upon the issue (the facts alleged on the one side and decided on the other) sustains said allegations is a matter with which the jury in a law case is exclusively invested.

It is sometimes urged that if the judge would grant a new trial in a case because a verdict in his opinion could not be sustained by the testimony, a non-suit would be proper before submitting it to the jury. The law, however, does not say so. The judge, as we have said, may determine in the first instance the absence of, or pertinency of, testimony, and may instruct the jury as to what is pertinent and what not, but he has no power to determine its sufficiency if it be pertinent, except after the jury has passed upon it; whereas upon a motion for a new trial he, too, may then judge of its force and effect, its sufficiency, and make orders accordingly. It will be observed that we are not discussing the wisdom of this doctrine. It may, or not, be well that judges have been denied the province of telling the jury that the evidence, although pertinent, has failed in sufficiency to sustain the allegations in the complaint, and of directing the verdict on the facts. Much might be said on either side.

If this was an open *question, and raised before a legislative assembly, but in our courts it cannot be raised, as the law here has long since settled it, denying to the judges such power.

The question here, then, on the motion of non-suit is, was any pertinent testimony introduced by the plaintiff upon the point involved, to wit, negligence of the defendant? What is negligence? Negligence has been defined, in short, to be "the absence of due care." This is the usual and general definition. More fully explained, it may be said that it "is the omission to do something which a reasonable and prudent man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do under all the circumstances surrounding and characterizing the particular case." There are several classes of cases in which the question of negligence, such as would make the party in default responsible, may arise, some of which are as follows: 1st. Where an injury is inflicted by one upon another by his direct act, or the direct act of his agent. 2d. Where the injury is inflicted by some instrumentality under the immediate control and direction of the party, or his agent, at the time of the injury; and 3d. Where the injury is inflicted by some instrumentality belonging to the defendant, not, however, at the time under the immediate direction of the defendant or his agent, but the injury is received by the party bringing himself in contact therewith, and in that way sustaining said injury. Cases of the first class will readily suggest themselves. Cases of the second may be represented by running a train of cars under the direction of the defendant or his agent. And cases of the third, by the case before the court, where the plaintiff sustained his injury by going to the turn-table of the defendant when neither the defendant nor his agent was present, and there, of his own accord, attempting to use it as a means of amusement and play.

The question of the pertinency of the testimony offered as to alleged negligence in the two first classes would depend upon very different considerations than when raised in the third, or rather the facts constituting negligence would be of a different character in the third class from those in the two other classes, and the points to which the testimony should be directed, and *therefore its pertinency considered, would be different. In the third, whether the instrumentality was in itself a dangerous one; whether, being dangerous and capable of inflicting injury, it was located and left in an exposed place, unguarded and unprotected; and especially whether the party injured was mentally incapable of knowing and appreciating the danger, either from want of age or otherwise, and of the impropriety of his intermeddling with it, would all enter into the general question of negligence, and would have to be considered by the judge on the question of the pertinency of testimony arising on a motion of non-suit. And no doubt the Circuit Judge considered these in this case when he refused the non-suit. And we concur with him, that there was some testimony on all of these points. There was testimony that the turn-table was a dangerous machine; that it was left and located in an exposed place, easily accessible, unguarded, unfenced, and unlocked; and that the plaintiff was of that age when he was incapable of understanding that he had no right to meddle with it, or of appreciating his danger. Whether this testimony was sufficient to sustain these necessary ingredients of the issue, it is not for us to say, nor was it for the Circuit Judge to say. He was compelled to hold that it was at least pertinent, and so holding, he was compelled to say also, let the case go to the jury.

This brings us to the refusals to charge as requested. The appellant has presented nine (9) exceptions on refusals to charge. No argument, however, was made before us, except upon those numbered 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th, we suppose because his honor charged in the main as appellant requested on the others.

In the 5th it is assigned as error, because his honor did not charge "that the degree of care to be required of defendant is only such care as well regulated railroads exercise over their turn-tables; and if defendant exercised such care to this turn-table, then it was not negligent, and the plaintiff cannot recover." The judge declined this, saying: "I cannot charge that as law, for the reason that all other railroads in the country may have done exactly what this railroad did, and if all others were negligent in doing so, then this railroad would be negligent too; and, further, every railroad must be governed by the circumstances that surround it," &c., and, in substance, that it was for the jury to determine whether leaving the turn-table without a lock, and unfastened, under all the circumstances, was an act of negligence, &c. The request called upon him to charge whether a certain state of facts would constitute negligence, to wit: That if this road was doing as other well regulated railroads were doing in this matter, there was no negligence.

Negligence, as we have explained above, in one of its aspects, it is true, is the doing what other prudent and reasonable men would not do when governed by prudence under similar circumstances. But does it follow that the doing what other prudent and reasonable men are doing under similar circumstances would be proper care, and would negative negligence? Prudent and reasonable men may sometimes commit an act of negligence, as well as the reckless and imprudent. Humanity has seldom been found to be perfect, and it would not do to say that a man can shield himself from a negligent act, resulting in injury, by proving that prudent and reasonable men have done the same act. Such a doctrine could legalize the baldest act of negligence. Railroads, for instance, running through the streets of crowded cities might establish the practice of going at their utmost speed, regardless of human life. They might discontinue the custom of ringing the bell at crossings, and dispense with all the safe-guards now adopted to warn persons of danger, and thus change the meaning of negligence altogether. If the request had been that if the defendant exercised such care as well regulated and prudently managed railroads ought to exercise, such care as proper prudence demanded under the circumstances, then there would be no negligence, no doubt the judge would have so charged. But as to the request made, we think he properly declined it.

One of the most difficult questions that has come before our court, is this matter of negligence, and we have not been able to get much light from other courts nor from the text writers on some of the points involved. All agree as to the general definition—the absence of ordinary care. But who is to say whether the facts alleged and proved show this absence—the judge or the jury? The judge is required to charge the law, and the jury to find the facts. The law, however, does not state what facts proved will show the absence of ordinary care. It could not do so as applicable to every case which arises. The cases involving this question are so different in their facts, so various, so complicated, and arising under so many different circumstances, that it would be utterly impossible to lay down any general principle of law, by which every special case could be measured and tested as to the fact of negligence, and which would enable a judge to say to the jury, as matter of law, such and such facts show the absence or presence of ordinary care.

The general rule on the subject seems to be that the charge of the judge must simply be, that negligence is the absence of ordinary care, and the jury must determine whether the facts proved before them amount to negligence. They must determine what facts have been proved, and then say by their verdict whether these facts amount to the absence of such care as ordinary and prudent men ought to exercise, when guided by prudence, but not what men may be doing under similar circumstances. This must of necessity be so, because, as we have said, the law has not, nor can it fix any precise standard which can be given by the judge to the jury and by which the facts in each and every case can be measured and weighed as applicable to the question, whether or not ordinary care was bestowed in the case. Besides, in many cases, the matter is of common knowledge, and the jury being supposed to be reasonable men, brought into the court from daily contact with the ordinary and usual business of life, can take notice of what ordinary care would require. In such cases they are supposed to have a standard for ordinary care in their own mind. In other cases, where the matter pertains to some special business beyond the range of common knowledge and about which the jury cannot be supposed to be informed, what ordinary care and prudence would require in such case may be proved by experts or by other parties who may know. And, perhaps, in a case of demurrer on the ground that the facts do not constitute a cause of action, the judge would be bound to decide from the standard in his mind.

The next exception assigns error "because his honor did not charge, that if defendant's turn-table was located in a place where persons were not likely to go, then it was not bound to take precautions against possible injury to trespassers." We think the judge charged this. He certainly charged the preceding request in terms, and that was the same as this, with the phraseology somewhat different, and after charging the former as law, he said, this one is included in a former request.

Next, "Even if defendant was negligent, yet if the plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injury and did not, then he was the author of his own injury." His honor said in reference to this, in substance, that if the jury found that the plaintiff was possessed of sufficient intelligence and discretion to bring him within the operation of the rule, where he could be held responsible for his acts, and capable of contributing to his injury, then the jury could not find a verdict for him. And he submitted to the jury whether the plaintiff, whom they had seen and observed, and in reference to whose capacity they had heard testimony, was possessed of such capacity, notwithstanding his tender age of ten years and eleven months. This, it seems to us, was as far as the judge could have gone. He could not have charged in the language of the request, because that would have been assuming that the plaintiff was capable of exercising ordinary care, and in that way have avoided the injury, which was one of the very matters in controversy.

Next, in not charging, "that the plaintiff at the time of the injury was of sufficient age, intelligence, and capacity to make him responsible for his acts." His honor replied to this, that to charge that would be a clear invasion by the court of the province of the jury. And we concur in that opinion.

The next was very similar to the one just noticed, involving facts in reference to the capacity of the plaintiff and his contributory conduct, which his honor properly left to the jury.

The next two present the same idea, and complain that his honor declined to charge, that if the plaintiff was of sufficient capacity to know that it was wrong and improper to play upon the turn-table, especially after being told by his comrades not to do so, he was guilty of contributory negligence and could not recover. The judge charged this, with the slight qualification of inserting after the words, wrong and improper, the words, "because it was dangerous." This, it seems to us, was not such a modification as to make his charge legal error. A main question in the case was, did the plaintiff have sufficient capacity to contribute to his injury? This question the judge very fairly submitted to the jury, and the insertion of the words above, "because it was dangerous," if not absolutely necessary, was not improper, and could in no way have misled the jury. The plaintiff may have been told, and he may have had sufficient capacity to take in the idea, in a general way, that it was wrong and improper for him to be at the turning-table, and yet not of sufficient capacity to know that he might get hurt by attempting to ride upon it, and consequently not of sufficient capacity to exercise, or be required to exercise, ordinary care, so as to prevent injury. This was one of the points involved in the request, and the judge very properly brought it out, by inserting the words of modification referred to.

The appellant's counsel have earnestly pressed upon us the position, that it was the duty of the Circuit Judge to charge as matter of law under the evidence, that the plaintiff from his age and sprightly character was sui juris, and therefore subject to the general law, applicable to those of acknowledged capacity. Where it is admitted that the party injured was of sufficient age, or had sufficient intelligence to be responsible for his acts, we do not say but that the judge might properly charge in such case, that he could contribute to his injury in such way as to exempt the defendant. So, too, where it is admitted that from his tender years or other infirmities he has not sufficient capacity, the judge might charge, that he could not contribute. But where these matters are matters of doubt, and are points in the issue, depending upon facts to be proved, then they become questions for the jury.

In accordance with these principles, we find cases in some of the States, cited by appellant, where the courts have ruled as matter of law in cases of children one, two, and three years of age, that the doctrine of contributory negligence could not be applied. In other cases, where they were eleven, twelve, thirteen, and fourteen, that it could be applied, and in others between these ages, that the jury should first determine the question of capacity, before considering the question of contributory negligence. In the case before the court the incapacity of the plaintiff from age *and undeveloped intellect was alleged in the complaint, and denied in the answer. It thus became one of the facts in issue, and in our opinion it properly belonged to the jury, as it was not so clear, or admitted either way, to such extent as to warrant the judge, even under the cases relied on by appellant, to charge upon it as matter of law.

Next, in not charging, "that the law of the place which gave rise to the liability must be the law of the case." Had it been proved, as required by section 2218, General Statutes, that the laws of North Carolina on this matter were different from those of this State, the common law having been altered by statute, or having been modified by the decisions of the highest court in that State, then the defendant, perhaps, could have requested this charge, or at least he could have raised the question whether or not the law of North Carolina should control; but until such testimony was introduced, the question raised was an abstract question and had no application to the facts. And in that view the charge of the judge would be immaterial. We do not understand from the statements in the "Case," that either a copy of the statutes of North Carolina, or a volume of the Reports of that State, or any parol testimony was offered as to the law there. In the argument for non-suit, appellant's counsel read from a case cited, and produced the 74th North Carolina Reports, but this volume had not been offered or admitted in the progress of the trial up to that time, nor do we see that it was either admitted or offered afterwards. There being no testimony, then, that the law of North Carolina was different from ours, the charge of the judge, even if erroneous, would not call for a reversal of the judgment.

The exceptions not heretofore noticed assign error, in that the judge charged on matters of fact, in saying, "that the turntable under some circumstances was destructive and dangerous;" that it was patent and self-evident, that under some circumstances a turntable was a destructive and dangerous thing; "that it was an alluring and attractive place for boys." We do not think that these incidental remarks of the judge made in his charge, can be culled out and urged as a violation of the province of the jury. He did not instruct the jury that, as matter of fact, it had been proved in this case that the turn-table here was a destructive and dangerous thing. He said, that in some circumstances a turn-table was dangerous. Nor did he charge, as matter of fact, that the turn-table here was an alluring and attractive place for the plaintiff; he said, a turntable is an alluring and attractive place for boys. The purpose of the constitutional inhibition upon Circuit Judges, from charging on the facts, is to prevent the judge from leading the jury on the facts. Our system demands that the jury shall be left to their own findings, upon the facts, free from the opinion or suggestion of the judge. It can hardly be said that the judge here violated this principle by the incidental and general remarks excepted to.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

COVAR v. CANTELOU.

SAME v. BUTLER.

[1. Trusts ⇨194.]

A testator gave a portion of his residuary estate unto and to the use of his executor and his heirs, "in trust for the sole and separate use of T. [a married woman], free and absolute from any rights of her husband, for and during the term of her natural life, and upon her death to be equally divided amongst her children and their heirs forever." Under order of the court, a part of this fund was invested in a tract of land, and afterwards, upon the petition of T. and her substituted trustee (her children then in esse not being parties), a portion of this land was sold by order of court. Held, that the rights and interest of these children in this land so sold were not divested by the proceeding to which they were not parties. Moseley v. Han-kinson, 22 S. C., 323.

[2. Trusts ⇨61.]

Whether these children were necessary parties to the proceeding under which money of the trust estate was invested in this land, need not be determined; for if they were, and are not therefore bound by the investment, still they could follow their funds into the land, and this they have elected to do by this action.

[4. Trusts ⇨61.]

Upon the death of T., the trusts were executed and the fee in the land vested absolutely in the children of T.; and they, having the legal title, could maintain this action in their own names to recover this land.

Before Wallace, Jr., Edgefield, October, 1884.

*The appeal was from the following decree, omitting its statement of facts:

The legal questions arising upon the facts in this cause were discussed with striking ability at the hearing. The case, I think, lies within a narrow compass. These plaintiffs certainly had an interest in the land sold by the trustee, and although alive at the time of the proceedings to procure authority to sell, were not made parties. If the statute of uses executed the use declared by the will, it was executed in the mother and children, and they had a legal estate. If the statute did not execute the use, the legal title remained in the trustee, and they had an equitable interest. I may say that in my opinion the statute did not execute the use for two reasons. One is that by the terms of the will of Ryan, a use was limited upon a use, and the statute will not execute such a use. Such a limitation was conclusive evidence that the testator intended that the legal title should remain in the trustee. The other reason is, that the trust was created for the benefit of a married woman. These children, then, at the time of the sale had an equitable interest in the land which could not be defeated by proceedings to which they were not parties.

This principle, according to my construction of the cases, has been expressly decided in the recent case of Leroy v. Charleston, 20 S. C., 71. In that case, land was sold by order of the court, when certain persons, grandchildren of testator, held to be contingent remaindermen, were not made parties to the proceedings, nor was the heir of the trustee, who held the legal title, a party. The court, after referring to and quoting from Bofil v. Fisher (3 Rich. Eq., 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627]) as to the power of the court to sell the estates of infants and remaindermen, whether vested or contingent, and referring also to Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq., 331, and to Trescott v. Smyth, 1 McCord Eq., 301, uses the following language: "We think the grandchildren in this case, at least those whose names and residence are known, should have been made parties. We think, too, that the proceeding was defective, in the fact that the heir at law of the trustee was not summoned." In that case the sale was held invalid to convey a perfect title upon two grounds: First, that certain infant contingent remaindermen were not parties; and, second, because the holder of the legal title was not a party.

In this case the holder of the legal title was before the court, as was the life-tenant. All that they had was sold and enjoyed by the purchaser, but the rights of these remaindermen could not be sold under proceedings to which they were not parties, while they were living and known. The purchaser held all he bought, as the trustee and life-tenant held all they had subject to the rights of these plaintiffs. Upon the death of Mrs. Tillman, the fee would have passed to these plaintiffs if the land had not been sold. That was their right under Ryan's will. Under the principles above stated, that right remains unaffected by the sale made, and when Mrs. Tillman died, the fee in the land sold vested absolutely in these plaintiffs.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint. It is further ordered, that plaintiffs have leave to apply at the foot of the decree for such orders as may be necessary to carry it out.

Messrs. Sheppard Bros., for appellant, who also submitted argument of Mr. B. W. Betts, jr., deceased.

April 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by —

Mr. Justice McIVER. By the eleventh clause of the will of John Ryan, who died many years ago, he directed as follows: "It is my will and desire that all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, be divided into fourteen equal shares, and I devise and bequeath one of the said shares to each of my grand-nephews [naming them], to them and their heirs forever; and as to the remaining nine shares, I give, devise, and bequeath the same to my executors hereinafter named, and to the survivors and survivor of them, and to the heirs of the survivor, to the use of my said executors and the survivors and survivor of them, and to the heirs of the survivor, in trust, nevertheless, for the sole and separate use of my grand-nieces, Peggy G. Smith, wife of —"

Tillman [and seven others, naming them], free and absolute from any rights or control of any husband they may now have or may hereafter have, one of said shares to each of my said grand-nieces, for and during the term of her natural life, and upon her death to be equally divided amongst her children and their heirs forever, the legal representatives of any child of my grand-nieces who may have died to be entitled to the same share as his or her parents would have been if living."

The testator appointed three executors, of whom Christian Breithaupt alone qualified and assumed the duties of the trust. It seems that the share of Mrs. Mary E. Tillman, under the above clause of the will, amounted to seventeen hundred and thirty-five dollars, and that, by an order of the Court of Equity, eight hundred dollars of this sum was invested in a tract of land containing about 367 acres, which was conveyed to the said Christian Breithaupt and the other executors as trustees under the will of the said John Ryan, the petition for leave to make such investment setting out in full the eleventh clause of said will. Subsequently Benjamin Gallman and William G. Gallman were, by an order of the Court of Equity, substituted as trustees for Mrs. Tillman, and soon afterwards, the appointment of William G. Gallman as trustee was revoked by an order of court, leaving Benjamin Gallman as sole trustee.

Sometime in the latter part of 1844, an ex parte petition was filed in the Court of Equity by Mary E. Tillman and Benjamin Gallman, praying that the said Benjamin Gallman, as sole trustee as aforesaid, be authorized to sell a portion of said 367 acre tract of land and reinvest the proceeds in other property, to be held on the same trust. To this petition the plaintiffs, who are the children of the said Mary E. Tillman, though all of them were then in esse and within the jurisdiction of the court, were not made parties. Under this petition an order was made, permitting the said trustee to sell a portion of said land, not exceeding one-third thereof, and reinvest the proceeds in other property, to be held by him on the trust declared in the eleventh clause of the will above set out.

In pursuance of this order, the trustee,

Benjamin Gallman, sold and conveyed two portions of said land, and the same, by successive conveyances, have come to the defendants in the two actions above stated, who being now in possession, these actions are brought by the plaintiffs as children of the said Mary E. Tillman, who died in 1881, and, as remaindermen under the said eleventh clause of said will, to recover possession of said land. The Circuit Judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and rendered judgment accordingly. From this judgment defendants appeal on the following grounds: I. Because the court erred in deciding that the defendants, having purchased the lands described in the complaint under order of court, held the same subject to the equities of plaintiffs. II. Because the court erred in deciding that when the life-tenant, Mrs. Mary E. Tillman, died, the fee to the tract of land described in the complaint vested absolutely in the plaintiffs. III. Because the court erred in ordering, adjudging, and decreeing, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint.

The two cases, involving, as they do, the same principles, were heard and will be considered together. It seems to us that the fundamental question raised by this appeal had been determined adversely to the view contended for by appellants by the recent case of Moseley v. Hankinson, 22 S. C., 323. There can be no doubt that the plaintiffs, as children of Mrs. Tillman, were, upon her death entitled as remaindermen under the will of John Ryan to the share given to her, or for her use, during her life, and when that share, or a portion of it, was invested in the land in question, they thereby acquired an interest in the land which could not be divested by a proceeding to which they were not parties. It is urged, however, that the original fund to which the plaintiffs were entitled in remainder, was not the land now in controversy, but was personal property which was invested in this land by the order of the court in a proceeding to which they were not parties, and, hence, that they have no claim upon the land, but only upon the fund invested. Whether they were necessary parties to the proceeding under which the investment was made, need not now be considered. For even conceding that they were (though we are not to be understood as intimating any opinion upon that question), and that not being parties they were not *bound by the investment, yet that cannot affect the present inquiry. If their funds were invested in land without authority, they had the election either to disavow the investment and pursue the fund, or to sanction the investment and claim the property in which the fund was invested; and they have elected the latter alternative by bringing these actions.

The case of Farr v. Gilreath (23 S. C., 502), relied on by counsel for appellants, differs materially from this case. There the land in question was not devised to the remaindermen at all, but only the proceeds of the sale of the land were directed to be divided amongst them, and the trustee was expressly empowered to sell. The remaindermen never had any interest in the land, and hence were not necessary parties to the proceeding for its sale. The real question in that case was whether the fact that the sale was made prior to the termination of the life estate, when the will provided that it should be made afterwards, rendered the same invalid, and the court held that inasmuch as the postponement of the sale until after the death of the life-tenant was manifestly intended only for her benefit, and inasmuch as the life-tenant had herself applied for the order of sale as necessary for her interests, it should be sustained, even though made in advance of the time contemplated by the will. We are unable to see how that case affords any support for the position contended for by appellants in these cases now under consideration.

We think it clear, under the authority of the case of Moseley v. Hankinson, supra, that the sales made by the trustee, under a proceeding to which the remaindermen were not parties, could not divest their interests. Nor do we see any ground upon which the plaintiffs are estopped from now setting up their claim. When the sales were made, they could not have interposed. The life-tenant and the trustee being parties to the proceeding under which the order of sale was obtained, the sale of the life estate of Mrs. Tillman was valid, and no one had a right to interpose any objection.

Finally, it is urged by the appellants that in no event can the plaintiffs maintain these actions for the recovery of the possession of real estate, because they have not got the legal title, the same being in the trustee. We do not understand that the will created *any trust for the remaindermen. The trust was for the life tenants, and when those estates terminated, the several shares were given directly and absolutely to the children. There was no direction that the trustees should hold the property for the use of the children, or even that they should divide the same amongst the children, but upon the death of the life tenant, the property is "to be equally divided amongst her children and their heirs forever, the legal representatives of any child of my grand-nieces who may have died to be entitled to the same share as his or her parent would have been if living." It seems to us that this was a direct and absolute devise or bequest to the children, unencumbered with any trust.

It is true that the devise to the trustees and to their heirs would seem to import a devise of the fee to them, but it is well settled that, no matter how ample may be the terms in which a devise to trustees may be made, they will only take such estate as may be necessary to the complete execution of the trust created. Here the trust was only for the life of the grand-niece, Mrs. Tillman, and upon her death the trust terminated, and the absolute devise to the children in remainder was unaffected with any trust. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge, that "when Mrs. Tillman died, the fee in the land sold vested absolutely in these plaintiffs," and hence they were entitled to recover possession of the land.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases stated in the caption of this opinion, be affirmed.

Messrs. Haskell & Dial, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant herein having recovered a judgment against Geo. F. Young, one of the plaintiffs herein, which was entered up on August 30, 1884, and having under said judgment levied on the property of the plaintiff, Young, and being about to sell the same, this action was commenced (exactly when does not appear, though we presume on or about the 10th day of November, 1884, as the complaint was sworn to on that day), amongst other things for the purpose of obtaining from the defendant an account for the rents and profits of certain land in his possession, claimed to be the property of the plaintiffs, and a judgment for the sum which may be found due upon such accounting, and also for the purpose of enjoining the sale of the plaintiff, Young's property under the judgment obtained against him by the defendant, Copeland. On hearing the verified complaint, Judge Pressley granted an order requiring the defendant, Copeland, to show cause why the injunction asked for in the complaint should not be granted, and restraining the defendant, in the meantime, from enforcing his judgment against the plaintiff, Young.

The rule to show cause was heard by Judge Cothran upon the pleadings and affidavits submitted, who granted an order, "that, without prejudice, the restraining order heretofore granted in this case be continued of force until a decision is made upon the merits, provided the plaintiffs enter into bond," &c. Amongst the affidavits submitted was one made by N. J. Holmes, Esq., one of the firm of Holmes & Simpson, stating that the said Geo. P. Copeland, on the 16th day of October, 1884, executed and delivered to the said firm of Holmes & Simpson a paper, of which they still retain the possession, in the following words: "I hereby authorize Messrs. Holmes & Simpson to collect the funds due me from George F. Young on judgment I have against him, and also the *amount due me on the note against Hasting Dial's estate by R. P. Todd, and apply the same to the oldest judgment against me, and I hereby assign the same to them for that purpose." Judge Cothran gave as his reasons for continuing the restraining order until the determination of the case on its merits the following: "1. It is apparent that the defendant herein is greatly embarrassed, if, indeed, he is not insolvent. 2. Improvident action on my part would, in one event at least, seriously affect the rights and interests of the plaintiffs. 3. The matters involved are important and very complicated, and it is hazardous to determine such on the perfunctory proceeding by motion. 4. No injury to the defendant, other than such as may result from delay, can occur to him, which is not comparable to that which the plaintiffs may sustain if their claim is found to be meritorious; that would be irreparable, the other may be amply provided against by bond and security."

The defendant gave notice of appeal from the order of Judge Cothran solely upon the ground: "Because his honor erred in making said order, which is contrary to law," no exceptions having been served designating wherein the order is erroneous or contrary to law.

The respondents' counsel contends in the outset, 1st. That the order is not appealable. 2d. If it is, then the ground of appeal is too general, and cannot, therefore, be considered. We will consider these points in their order. The code, in section 11, specifies the cases in which this court may review the action of the Circuit Court, or a judge thereof. It is very manifest that the order appealed from here does not fall under either subdivision 2 or 3 of that section, for even granting that the order does affect a substantial right, that is not sufficient. For the order to be appealable, it must not only affect a substantial right, but it must also in effect determine the action and prevent a judgment from which an appeal could be taken, the language being, "An order affecting a substantial right made in an action when such order, in effect, determines the action, and prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken," &c. Now, it is quite clear that the order from which this appeal was taken does not, in effect, deter*mine the action or prevent a judgment from which an appeal might be taken.

So that if appealable at all, it must come under subdivision 1 of that section of the code, which, so far as this question is concerned, reads as follows: "Any intermediate judgment, order, or decree involving the merits * * * and final judgments." It certainly is not a final judgment, and therefore the only question is whether it is an intermediate order involving the merits. While the order in question undoubtedly is an intermediate order, we do not think that it involves the merits of the action in which it was made, and, therefore, it is not appealable. The order is nothing more in effect than an interlocutory injunction, made solely for the purpose of keeping the subject of the action in statu quo until the merits of the action can be considered and determined. It determines none of the rights of the parties to the action, but simply prevents any interference with the subject of the action until those rights can be considered and adjudicated. It does not even purport to pass upon any right claimed by either party to the action, and, on the contrary, in express terms it declares that it is granted "without prejudice," which we understand to mean that it is not to be regarded as even indicating what those rights may be, and it is to continue in force only "until a decision is made upon the merits." It will then have performed its office, and any order or judgment that may then be made or rendered will depend entirely upon the conclusion that may be reached by the court, after a consideration of the merits, wholly uninfluenced by the interlocutory order from which this appeal was taken.

Under this view of the case, the other questions which have been argued cannot arise, and need not be considered. But we may add that the appellant's single ground of appeal is too general in its terms, as has frequently been held by this court. There are no exceptions indicating any specific error in any conclusion of fact or law reached by the Circuit Judge; nothing but a general allegation that the order appealed from is "contrary to law," without designating in what respect it is contrary to law, which has always been held insufficient.

We desire to add, also, that we are not to be understood as *endorsing the propriety of the order appealed from, or as indicating any opinion as to the merit of the application for the interlocutory injunction. Whether the paper executed by the defendant, Copeland, to Messrs. Holmes & Simpson operates as an assignment of the judgment, which the order appealed from prohibits Copeland from enforcing, and whether the order of injunction can have the effect of restraining them, as assignees, from enforcing the judgment, inasmuch as they are not parties to this action, are questions which are not before us, and cannot and ought not to be considered in a case to which they are not parties. And whether any order of injunction should have been made until these gentlemen were made parties, is a matter which we are not at liberty to consider.

The judgment of this court is, that the appeal be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court to consider the same.

25 S. C. 45

ABERCROMBIE v. ABERCROMBIE.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Descent and Distribution ⚭143.]

A decree of settlement between distributees made by the ordinary will not be disturbed, after a lapse of nearly twenty years, and after payments and receipts thereunder.

[2. Descent and Distribution ⚭143.]

And one of these distributees being a creditor, who neglected to present her debt at such accounting and settlement, and afterwards received a tract of land in part payment of the amount, ascertained to be due her as distributee under said decree, she cannot call upon the other distributees to contribute out of the sums so decreed to them, to the payment of a judgment by default, recovered by her against the administrator many years afterwards.

Under this judgment, the plaintiff might look to the administrator personally, and to the undistributed assets of the estate in his hands.

[4. Executors and Administrators ⚭172, 453.]

But the administrator having been charged with the sale-bill, the amounts due thereon became his property, subject to the equity of this creditor, to have them applied to her judgment. This equity, however, is subordinate to the equity of the distributees to have judgments against them, or against their husbands, applied to the decree in their favor. This principle was extended even to the setting off of a decree in favor of one distributee (the wife of A), against a judgment against the husband of another distributee, for whom A was surety.

[5. Appeal and Error ¶198; Executors and Administrators ¶318.]

The plaintiff had no right to require the other distributees to refund *for the purpose of paying her debt, and if so, she should be required to refund her proportionate part. A reference ordered for this purpose was, therefore, unnecessary, but no exceptions having been taken by the defendants, no ruling can be made upon this subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1248-1250; Dec. Dig. ¶¶ 198; Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1319-1326, 1328-1331; Dec. Dig. ¶¶ 318.]

Before Cothran, J., Laurens, February, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Geo. Westmoreland and F. P. McGowan, for appellants.

April 23, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Jonathan Abercrombie departed this life in 1862, intestate, possessed of a considerable estate both real and personal. He left as his heirs at law four sons and eight daughters, viz: (1) Jonathan, (2) Elisha, (3) Alexander, (dead) and (4) John; (5) Elizabeth, who intermarried with one Adams, (6) Hannah, wife of Babb, (7) Christie, wife of Austin Moore (now dead), (8) Harriet, wife of Rowland, (9) Mary, wife of John Armstrong, (10) Jane Hellams, (11) Clarinda, wife of Henry P. Johnson, and (12) Susan Abercrombie. Jonathan Abercrombie, jr., administered upon the estate, and in December, 1862, sold the personal estate. At the sale some of the distributees purchased property and gave their notes, and in the case of daughters, their husbands bought. On April 16, 1864, a statement for a settlement of the estate was made in the then ordinary's office, wherein the administrator was charged with the sale bill, and credited with all payments returned, and after taking an account of advancements, the amount due to each of the children was ascertained, varying somewhat, but generally over $1,000. "Upon this accounting the ordinary rendered a decree directing the administrator to pay the several heirs the amounts found to be due them, in those cases where the advancements had not exceeded their shares; and that those of the heirs whose advancements had exceeded their share, should pay to the administrator the amount of such excess."

valued at $8.20 per acre; No. 2, consisting of 114 acres, seems to have been sold; and No. 3, 70 acres, went in some way to John H. Abercrombie. Soon after this adjustment and decree in the ordinary's office, the administrator actually settled the amounts due to Elizabeth Adams, Jane Hellams, and Harriet Rowland, and to Hannah Babb, except a balance for which her husband gave his note with surety. Susan Abercrombie consented to take the No. 1 tract of land at the appraisement, $1,394, which was nearly her full share. This was done by the consent of all parties, as she had received very little by way of advancement or purchase at the sale. She has been in possession of the land since 1864, and the other distributees in possession of the property purchased by them since 1862. No formal settlement was made with some of the distributees, but it lay over probably for the reason that in the case of married women their husbands had purchased largely at the administrator's sale. The decrees in the ordinary's office in favor of the wives stood open, while the notes for purchases at the sale stood unpaid against the husbands. The administrator sued to judgment John Armstrong and his sureties, on the note given by him for purchases at the sale; and he also sued to judgment the sureties of Austin Moore, on the note given by the said Austin for purchases at the sale; and also Henry P. Johnson and his sureties for purchases at the sale.

Matters stood in this condition until 1881, when Susan Abercrombie recovered a judgment for $1,602.73 against Jonathan Abercrombie, as administrator, and immediately after instituted these proceedings against the administrator and all the distributees, praying for a final settlement of the estate, and as incidental thereto, that all the unadministered assets, including the aforesaid judgments, might be realized and applied to the judgment on the debt of the plaintiff, and the excess, if any, paid into court for future division among all the distributees.

Jonathan Abercrombie, the administrator, did not answer, but some of the distributees did. John Armstrong and Mary, his wife, and the heirs of Austin Moore, deceased, claimed that the decrees in the ordinary's office against Jonathan Abercrombie, as *administrator, in favor respectively of Mary Armstrong and Christie Moore, should be set off against the aforesaid judgments, recovered respectively against their husbands and their sureties. And besides, John Armstrong exhibited a written assignment of his wife, Mary, transferring all her interest "in the estate of Jonathan Abercrombie, deceased, to the extent of the judgment against them (John Armstrong, Lewis Abercrombie, and Thomas A. Paden), and I hereby empower and authorize the said John Armstrong and Lewis Abercrombie to collect and receipt for so much of my said interest as will satisfy the said judgment." And the heirs of Christie Moore also executed a paper somewhat similar, giving John R. Hellams "power and authority to collect the decree in favor of the said Christie Moore, and to appropriate it to the payment of a judgment rendered against Austin Moore and John Hellams." These papers are in the brief. The defendants also insisted, if there was to be contribution among the distributees for the payment of the plaintiff's judgment, that all, including the said Susan herself, should contribute in proportion to the amount each received from the estate.

It was referred to the master, C. D. Barksdale, Esq., to state the account and decide the issues, who made a full and clear report. The cause came up on exceptions before Judge Cothran, who decreed: "That the judgment against John Hellams and Patilla F. Moore, as sureties of Austin Moore, is entitled to be credited with the amount reported as the interest of Christie Moore, by virtue of assignment; and that the judgment against John Armstrong and Lewis Abercrombie, and then the judgment against John Armstrong, as surety of H. P. Johnson, are entitled to be credited with the interest of Mary Armstrong, as ascertained in the master's original report; and that the remainder of the assets reported by the master be collected by him and applied to the payment of the debt and costs." He further directed, if the said assets were not sufficient to pay the said debt, that the master should inquire and report the amount which each distributee should contribute for the purpose of paying the remainder of plaintiff's debt.

From this decree the plaintiffs appeal on the grounds:

"First. It is submitted that his honor erred in decreeing 'that the judgment of Jonathan Abercrombie, administrator, against John Hellams, deceased, and Patilla F. Moore, as sureties of Austin Moore, is entitled to be credited with the amounts reported as the interest of Christie Moore by virtue of assignment.' I. Because said instrument is invalid and of none effect. II. Because said instrument, if valid, cannot operate as an assignment. III. Because the heirs of Jonathan Abercrombie, deceased, have no interest in the estate until debts are paid. IV. Because the plaintiffs, Susan Abercrombie and Clarinda Johnson, are distributees of said estate, and according to the decree of the court are entitled to distributive shares in the surplus, and no provision is made for them after debts are paid. V. Because the instrument, if valid, is not intended to protect P. F. Moore, but is simply a power of attorney to collect and apply to judgment against John Hellams.

"Second. It is submitted that his honor erred in decreeing 'that the judgment against John Armstrong and Lewis Abercrombie should be credited with the interest of Mary Armstrong as ascertained in the master's original report.' I. Because Mary Armstrong would have no interest until the debts were paid. II. Because said judgments amount to more than her share in the estate after debts are paid, and no provision is made for meeting the interest to plaintiffs. III. Because said judgments had been satisfied by enforcement and the fund in court under a previous order of court.

"Third. It is submitted that his honor erred in decreeing that the judgment against John Armstrong as surety of H. P. Johnson was entitled to be credited with the interest of Mary Armstrong as ascertained in the master's original report. I. Because the instrument from Mary Armstrong to John Armstrong and Lewis Abercrombie does not authorize such credit. II. Because Mary Armstrong would have no interest in the estate until the debts were paid. III. Because, to allow such credit would be giving her an amount greater than the share of Mary Armstrong after paying the debts, and no provision is made to pay the interest of the other heirs at law as fixed by the decree."

There is a good deal of confusion in this case, arising principally from the fact that

Susan Abercrombie claims in the double capacity of distributee and creditor. She was before the Court of Ordinary in 1864, when the estate was settled, but did not then, as she ought to have done, present her demand and have it provided for before division. She did not appeal from the decree, but, on the contrary, assented to it and received her share. Other distributees also received their shares, and now, after a lapse of nearly twenty years, it is too late to disturb that settlement. All the parties are bound by it, and if the administrator has failed to pay any of the distributees the amounts decreed to them, they may pursue him on his bond, but they have no right to a readjustment and contribution among themselves.

But the contention is that Susan Abercrombie is more than a distributee, she is a creditor of the estate, and as creditors must be paid before distributees, that debt must now be paid. There is no doubt about the principle which Susan Abercrombie should have invoked in the settlement in the ordinary's office, but having failed to do so, there is much difficulty in its application to the peculiar, if not extraordinary, facts of this case. We must assume that Susan Abercrombie was a creditor of her father at the time of his death. It does not appear that she presented her demand in the ordinary's office, but it would seem stood by and allowed the estate to be divided without taking any account of her debt, and she received her share enlarged by that omission.

After long delay, nearly twenty years, she sued Jonathan Abercrombie, the administrator, and recovered judgment against him in 1881. Whether the administrator in that action pleaded plene administravit or not, the judgment as to him imports assets, and if he does not pay it, the judgment creditor may pursue him as for a devastavit. Trimmer v. Thomson, 19 S. C., 247. It does not follow, however, that the judgment binds the distributees as to the shares already delivered or decreed to them. They were not made parties as heirs under the statute, calling upon them to contribute to the extent of assets received, to the payment of a subsequently discovered debt of the ancestor; and if such had been the character of the action, there could have been no recovery against them for the creditor, Susan Abercrombie, had notice of the former division and received her part under it. She could not hold under it herself, and at the same time disturb it *as to others, either as distributee or as creditor. Besides, the great lapse of time, which protects her in the possession of her land, also protects the others as to their shares. We do not understand that the complaint claims contribution, and as to the plaintiff's judgment, the question is not in the case. See Gregory v. Rhoden, 24 S. C., 90; Brewster & Dickson v. Gillison, 10 Rich. Eq., 435.

But under her judgment against the administrator it may be that Susan Abercrombie could ask for a final settlement and to have appropriated to her debt any remaining unadministered assets of the estate, in preference to having such assets divided among the distributees in a supplemental settlement. In this view, it is claimed that the judgments recovered by Jonathan Abercrombie upon notes for purchases at his sale, and standing in his name as administrator, are such general assets, and applicable as matter of right to her judgment. It does not strike us that these judgments are, in the proper sense of the word, assets of the estate. They were recovered on parts of the original sale bill which was accounted for by the administrator in the ordinary's settlement, and then became his property, subject to a strong equity that they would go to the distributees, whose decrees were, to a large extent, based on them. The liability of the administrator for these notes was changed into the form of decrees against him in favor of the distributees. The judgments might have been recovered by Jonathan Abercrombie without styling himself administrator, which was merely descriptio personae. Rhodes v. Casey, 20 S. C., 491; Robinson v. Robinson, Ibid., 573. Being the property of Jonathan Abercrombie they were not, in the usual sense, assets of the estate and disposable as such. Susan Abercrombie having a judgment against the administrator, may have an equity to ask that, as the property of her debtor they should be enforced and applied to her judgment.

But the distributees, who also have judgments against Jonathan Abercrombie, claim that they have a higher equity to have those judgments of Jonathan applied in payment of their decrees in the probate office against him. We think that purchases at an administrator's sale by a distributee of the estate are generally made in the faith that they are in part payment of the share of *such distributee. That is the natural course and is certainly the practice. Where the distributee himself purchases and the judgment for the purchases goes directly against him, his equity to have the decree for his share credited with the purchases is unanswerable; for in such case it would simply be the setting off of judgments between the same parties. When, however, the wife happens to be the distributee, and the husband making the purchases is sued to judgment, it seems to us that it is substantially the same thing. The husband in making the purchases acts also for his wife, and in the full confidence that they will be credited on the wife's share; when the wife so directs and gives up her individual and separate claim, as in this case, we think there is a high equity that the judgment for the purchases against the husband or his sureties should be set off, as payment in fact, against the decree in favor of the wife for her share. See Falconer v. Powe, Bail. Eq., 158, where Chancellor Harper said: "In this court (equity), we look to the parties really interested. The complainants are the parties to whom the proceeds of the land belong; and the advances made by the defendant were for their benefit. It is, therefore, a clear case of mutual demands existing in equity, between the parties to the suit, and they are to be adjusted in the same way as in other cases of discount," &c.

We have had some hesitation as to setting off any part of the share of Mary Armstrong on the judgment against Henry P. Johnson to which John Armstrong, her husband, was surety. We suppose that judgment was for the purchases of Henry P. Johnson, and according to what we have already said it should be set off pro tanto against the decree of Clarinda Johnson, the wife of the said Henry P. Johnson. It seems that the assignment of Mary Armstrong does not in express terms embrace that judgment. But in her answer she prays that her share may be set off "against the judgments that the representatives of Jonathan Abercrombie hold against John Hellams and John Armstrong;" and as it may enure to the benefit of Clarinda Johnson in relieving her husband, the decree of the Circuit Judge as to the credits or discounts is left unchanged.

In the view expressed, that Susan Abercrombie as judgment creditor, has no right to disturb the settlement in the ordinary's

*office by making the other distributees refund and contribute for the purpose of paying her debt, so much of the decree as directed a reference for that purpose was unnecessary. But as there was no exception to the decree in that particular, we have no right to make a ruling upon the subject. If the plaintiff as creditor of the ancestor had the right to make the other distributees pay back what they had received in that settlement, the principle of course would include herself as distributee. But we do not think that she has that right as to any of the distributees.

With this explanation, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

KAMINITSKY v. NORTHEASTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

[1. Railroads \hookrightarrow 350.]

In action against a railroad company for injuries sustained by plaintiff from a passing train of defendant at a highway crossing, prima facie proof of negligence on the part of the defendant is sufficient to compel the judge to send the case to the jury, and prima facie proof of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is not sufficient to withdraw the case from the jury; because, whether the plaintiff contributed to the negligence or not is a fact which no judge should determine on prima facie evidence.

[2. Negligence \hookrightarrow 122, 135.]

Contributory negligence is a matter of defence with the burden on defendant of proving it. To relieve the defendant from all liability, in this case, the proof of contributory negligence on plaintiff's part should have been clear and convincing.

A failure by the Circuit Judge to grant a non-suit upon a point not brought to his attention can hardly be ruled as error.

The requirements of the statute law as to signals at a railroad crossing, and to be given by an engine on approaching a crossing, did not supersede other proper signals, nor give a new cause of action under these statutes; therefore, in an ordinary action for damages, alleging negligence, the omission of these signals may be given in evidence, although not alleged in the complaint.

Sections of the General Statutes requiring a railroad engine to carry a bell of a certain weight and to give certain signals at a road crossing (§ 1483), and holding the company liable for all damages caused by the collision, if a failure to give such signals contributed to the injury, unless the person injured was guilty of gross or willful negligence, which contributed to the injury, or was acting in violation of law (§ 1529), are not unconstitutional.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for appellant.
Messrs. A. D. Cohen and James Simons, contra.

April 24, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action against "The Northeastern Railroad Company" to recover damages for a personal injury. The plaintiff complained: "That on April 25, 1883, while traveling in a wagon drawn by one horse along the public highway leading to the city of Charleston, which public highway crosses the railroad at a place called the crossing of the Meeting street road, near the place known as the forks of the road, and as the plaintiff had reached said crossing, the defendant carelessly and negligently caused one of the locomotives, with a train of cars attached thereto, to approach said crossing, and then and there to pass rapidly over the track of the said railroad. That by reason of the said negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff's legs were injured by the said train of the defendant.

rendering *the amputation of both necessary. That thereby he has been most seriously injured for the balance of his life, and debarred from following any active pursuit, to his damage thirty thousand dollars." The defendant corporation put in a general denial affirming that the train was not run negligently, as charged, and denying that, by reason of said negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff's legs were injured by the said train of the defendant, or that he was at any time or in any way injured by the negligence or carelessness of the defendant.

The cause came on for trial before Judge Pressley and a jury. There was much testimony, which need not be stated here, as it is all printed in the "Case." In brief, it appeared that the track of the Northeastern Railroad, in leaving Charleston, runs nearly north up the neck of land lying between the Ashley and Cooper Rivers, and a little beyond the city limits crosses a public highway at the same level, sometimes called the State Road, and at others the Meeting street road, along the centre line of which is a plank road running to the city. The crossing is at the point where the Magnolia avenue branches off from the Meeting street road, nearly at right angles, and runs eastward towards the cemetery, and probably for that reason called "Magnolia Crossing." The course of the railroad being nearly identical with that of the highway, the crossing is made very obliquely, creating two angles, one pointing towards the city and the other in the opposite direction, the railroad track constituting the long side of both. It will be seen at a glance that a train going towards the city necessarily closes the eastern angle and widens the other, and vice versa. At the time of the occurrence complained of, there was a brick wall or abutment on each side of the Meeting street road just above the crossing, not leaving room enough between the eastern abutment and the track of the railroad for a vehicle to turn into the mouth of Magnolia avenue without coming very close, if not touching the railroad. The Enterprise Street Railroad also runs to this crossing and turns down Magnolia avenue towards the cemetery.

Seeing this state of things, the legislature, in 1878, passed an act to provide further security for persons and property at the thoroughfare into the city of Charleston at and near the fork of *the road on Charleston neck, as follows: "Whereas the only entrance by land into the city of Charleston is by a narrow neck traversed by one public road, which crosses at the same point the tracks of the South Carolina Railroad Company and of the Northeastern Railroad Company; and whereas the constant passage of persons and of vehicles over said thoroughfare makes this place more than usually dangerous; be it enacted, &c., That from and immediately after the passage of this act the South Carolina Railroad Company and the Northeastern Railroad Company shall each cause the place where each of their railroad tracks crosses the State road at and near the fork of the road on Charleston neck, to be constantly guarded by a person of care and discretion whose duty it shall be, in the day time by a flag and in the night time by a lantern, to give notice of the approach of a locomotive or train on the railroad guarded by him, and to continue giving such signal until the said locomotive or train has passed the crossing." 16 Stat., 363.

On the evening the plaintiff received the injuries of which he complains, he and another gentleman (Rubin) in a one-horse wagon, driven by a colored lad, about sun-down, or possibly a little later, were coming down the plank road towards the city, and just as they reached the point of the angle made by the plank road and the railroad track, opposite the entrance of Magnolia avenue, a long freight train passed rapidly down towards the city. In some way a collision occurred and the wagon was upset, the parties were thrown out, Rubin had his arm broken, and the plaintiff received the fearful injuries which rendered the amputation of both legs necessary, and for which he now claims damages. Some point was made as to whether the injuries were caused by some part of the train striking the right side of the wagon, or by the horse running away and striking the left wheel of the wagon against the brick abutment, as he endeavored to turn from the passing cars into the avenue; but the main question was, whether the injuries were caused, as charged, by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant; and if so, whether there was such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as to prevent his recovery.

defendant moved *for a non-suit, on the ground that the evidence did not prove negligence on the part of the defendant, but, on the contrary, showed contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and that section 1529 of the General Statutes, which, as it was alleged, places railroad corporations before the courts under a rule of evidence or of legal liability other than that applied to natural persons under like conditions, is unconstitutional and void. The judge refused the motion and the defendants made their defence.

The defendant proposed no requests to charge, but the plaintiff made several, some of which were refused and need not be stated, but the following were allowed:

I. "That by the act of 1878 the defendant is required to cause the place where its railroad track crosses the State road, at or near the fork of the road on Charleston neck, to be constantly guarded by a person of care and discretion, whose duty it shall be, in the day time by flag and in the night time by a lantern, to give notice of the approach of a locomotive or train on the railroad guarded by him, and to continue giving such signal until the said locomotive and train has passed the crossing.

II. "That if the testimony satisfies the jury that the requirements of the act were not complied with, or imperfectly complied with, and such failure contributed to the casualty, then from such failure the jury can find that the defendants were negligent.

III. "That by the statute law of this State the railroad company is required to have a bell of at least 30 pounds weight and a steam whistle placed on each locomotive engine, and such bell shall be rung or such whistle sounded by the engineer or fireman, at the distance of at least 500 yards from the place where the railroad crosses any public highway or street or travelled place, and be kept ringing or whistling until the engine has crossed such highway or street or travelled place. Gen. Stat., § 1483.

IV. "That if the testimony satisfies the jury that the plaintiff was injured in his person by collision with the engine or cars of the defendant at the crossing in question, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by section 1483, and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the defendant corporation is liable for all damages caused by the collision * * unless it is shown that in addition to a mere *want of ordinary care the person injured was at the time of the collision guilty of gross or wilful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law, and that such gross or wilful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury. Gen. Stat., § 1529."

After a very full and clear charge, the jury, on June 27, 1885, rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $7,500, and thereafter, on August 3, the defendant made a motion on the minutes of the court "for a new trial upon several grounds," alleging that parts of the charge, indicated and copied, were calculated to mislead the jury, and that the preponderance of the evidence was on the side of the defendant; and also "that the judgment upon the verdict be arrested on the ground that the complaint does not state specifically the facts required by the statute, to fix the liability of the defendant, and cannot therefore support the judgment." The judge refused the motion for a new trial, saying: "As to my charge I have read it most carefully, and it seems to me throughout to lean slightly to the side of defendant. It was not so intended." &c. He also refused the motion in arrest of judgment, saying: "The complaint contains allegations entirely sufficient to sustain the verdict; and when that is so, I do not know of any case which authorizes the arrest of judgment after verdict."

The defendant appeals to this court from the verdict and judgment and rulings of the presiding judge. The exceptions are long and numerous, containing 22 principal heads, with half as many more additional subdivisions. They are all in the brief and need not be restated here.

First. As to the alleged error in refusing to grant the non-suit. The judge held that "prima facie proof of negligence on the part of the defendant is sufficient to compel the judge to send the case to the jury, and prima facie proof of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is not sufficient to withdraw the case from the jury, because whether the plaintiff contributed to the negligence or not is a fact which no judge should determine on prima facie evidence." It seems to us that this ruling was correct in principle, and in accordance with the decided cases in this State. "The defendant is entitled to a non-suit when there is a total failure of evidence to sustain the plaintiff's case; but if *there is any testimony, the force and effect of which must be determined, the case should go to the jury." Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 19 S. C., 20 [45 Am. Rep. 754].

In reference to that class of cases where damages are claimed for negligent injuries, this court in the case of Couch v. C. C. & A. R. R. Co. (22 S. C., 562), held as follows: "In considering such an issue is it necessary that every case in which there is any testimony as to facts should be sent to the jury? As we understand it, negligence is not a simple fact in itself, but is rather an inference from facts. It is defined to be 'want of ordinary care,' and is generally understood to be a mixed question of law and fact. It is certainly the duty of the judge to define what it is; and it seems that it is also his right to determine as a preliminary question, whether there is any evidence to make a prima facie case, and if not he may grant a non-suit. Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 19 S. C., 23 [45 Am. Rep. 754]. In other words, as some one has expressed it, it is for the judge to say whether there are any facts in evidence, from which negligence may be reasonably and legitimately inferred, and it is for the jury to say whether from these facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred. Hooper v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 21 S. C., 541 [53 Am. Rep. 691]; Pierce R. R., 313; Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall., 122 [22 L. Ed. 780]. This is the utmost extent to which we have gone or can go, in ruling that a judge may determine the force of testimony upon a question of fact. In this case the judge held that there was a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant, and sent it to the jury. In that we see no error.

The question of contributory negligence is secondary, and does not arise until there is some proof of negligence on the part of the defendant. It is a matter of defence, and the burden of proving it is with the defendant. Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Co., supra; Crouch v. C. & S. R. R. Co., 21 S. C., 495. In the case of Carter the court say: "Where the plaintiff has contributed to the accident to the extent of furnishing a proximate cause thereof, the defendant is exempt from liability as matter of law, and the judge should so charge; but whether a particular fact, if proved, shall amount to such contribution, is a matter for the jury and not for the court. What is negligence, is defined in the *books, and is a question of law, and it is the same whether it comes from the defendant or the plaintiff; but whether it is proved to be present in a special case, is a question of fact for the jury."

The plaintiff had the right to pass down the plank road, a public thoroughfare. It was not an illegal act to return home from his business; and if in doing so he was negligently injured by the defendant, we agree with the Circuit Judge, that the proof of contributory negligence on his part, in order to have the effect of dispensing the law and absolving the defendant from all liability, was required to be clear and convincing. It is not to be assumed that a man in his senses will heedlessly imperil his own life. The question of carelessness on the part of the plaintiff was stoutly contested, and after reading the testimony with great care we cannot say that the judge erred in declining to take it from the jury. "Culpable negligence of the plaintiff, properly so called, which contributed to the injury, must always defeat the action, but the nature of the primary wrong has much to do with the judgment, whether or not the alleged contributory fault was blameworthy. If it was of a negative character, such as lack of vigilance, and was itself caused or would not have existed, or no injury would have resulted from it but for the primary wrong, it is not in law to be charged to the injured one, but to the original wrong-doer." Walsh & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Central Trust Co. of N. Y. [C. C.] 23 Fed. Rep., 738.

But subdivision a, exception 3, still further alleges error in refusing the non-suit, "Because the proof offered by the plaintiff attempted to show that defendant was liable because of the alleged omission of certain statutory signals, and was addressed wholly to these issues; whereas the complaint alleged no fact constituting a cause of action arising out of any one of such statutory requirements." The motion for non-suit was made at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, and this ground at that time was not taken. We could hardly rule it error in the judge because he failed to grant a non-suit on a point not brought before him. But we think the counsel for the defendant does himself injustice in the suggestion that the omission may have *been caused by his own oversight. If the point had been made, it could not have been sustained as a ground for non-suit.

We do not consider this as an action under the act of 1878, requiring a guard to be kept at the crossing, or under the provisions of the railroad law contained in sections 1483 and 1529 of the General Statutes; but as an ordinary action for damages, with the right to show in evidence the precautions on the part of the defendant required by the said statutes. The common law required the giving of such signals at highway crossings as were reasonable in view of the situation and surroundings "to put individuals using the highway on their guard." Pierce R. R., 349, and notes. The signals required by the aforesaid statutes did not supersede these reasonable signals which were before necessary. They did not take away the common law right of action, by giving in lieu thereof a new cause of action under the statutes, but simply declared what were proper signals, and expressly made them "cumulative." See Gen. Stats., § 1545, and Pierce, 350.

The very circumstance that they are declared to be "cumulative" merely, makes this case essentially different from that of Williams v. Hingham & Quincy Bridge & Turnpike Corporation (4 Pick. [Mass.] 341), relied on in the court below and in the argument here. That was a case for damages on account of an injury at a toll bridge. The general turnpike laws of Massachusetts had the effect of repealing the common law upon the subject, and made the proprietors of a toll bridge liable for damages only to those from whom toll was demandable. The plaintiff did not allege in his declaration that he was one of those from whom toll was demandable, but had a verdict for $600. The court held that the judgment must be arrested, on the ground that the common law remedy had been repealed, and the plaintiff had not brought his action within the terms of the statute authorizing damages.

But in this case the exact opposite is true. The old remedy was not changed or repealed, but expressly affirmed with the additional precautions deemed necessary. It will not do to say that all other signals were dispensed with by those expressly directed, and if the complaint charging negligence does not refer specifically to them, there can be no recovery at all for a failure to give proper warning. If, considering the exceptionally dangerous character of the place, the signals required and habitually given were proper, the failure to give them might be negligence without reference to the statute, and in that view it was sufficient for the complaint to allege generally that the injury was caused by the defendant carelessly and negligently. &c. Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C., 213. The judge says: "No motion was made to exclude testimony. There was no request to charge the jury that the acts of negligence set forth in the statute were not applicable to the complaint. The case was contested in the proofs and arguments on both sides as if the case were under the statute; and after such waiver it is now too late to raise the point. If it had been raised at the proper time, and I had felt bound by the case cited from Massachusetts, I would still have sent the case to the jury as a question of fact, whether without the statute any omission of any of the signals relied on by plaintiff, if proved, was not a want of due care under the circumstances of the case." We cannot say that this was error, or that there was any error in refusing the non-suit.

Exception 3, b, c, d, e, as also 14, relate merely to facts and the preponderance of evidence, and, while they may have been proper before the judge on motion for a new trial, cannot be considered here.

Exceptions 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, in different forms, in effect make the question as to the constitutionality of sections 1483 and 1529, General Statutes (general railroad law). Section 1483 requires a bell of a certain weight and a steam whistle to be placed on each locomotive engine, and that such bell shall be rung and such whistle sounded by the engineer or fireman at the distance of at least five hundred yards from the place where the railroad crosses any public highway, &c. Section 1529: "If a person is injured in his person or property by collision with the engine or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by this chapter (chap. XL, general railroad law), and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the corporation shall be liable for all damages caused by the collision, * * * unless it is shown *that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured or the person having charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or wilful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law; and that such gross or wilful negligence, or unlawful act, contributed to the injury," &c.

The judge said: "The question of the constitutionality of that act is raised, and the argument upon that point would impress me very deeply if this were a matter of business which the railroad company had the right to carry on without the license of the legislature. If they were conducting a business as individuals do, without any license from the legislature, this thing of special legislation would not be allowed; but I hold that where the business was carried on by license of the legislature, and could not be carried on without that license, the legislature is not guilty of special legislation when it attaches conditions to that license. One of the conditions attached in this case is, that if it fails to do certain things, to give certain signals, it shall be responsible for the consequences, unless it proves gross negligence on the part of the party injured," &c. Was this error?

No weight is to be given to the objection that the provisions assailed are obnoxious to section 20, art. 2, of the Constitution, which requires that "every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." This court has held that the codification of the statutes adopted in 1882 under the requirements of the constitution is valid, notwithstanding it did not relate to but one subject, and was without a title. Woodside v. McDaniel, 19 S. C., 114.

Nor do we think that the objection to the word "license" is well taken. It was used in giving the reasons for the ruling, and was not the ruling itself. But the word was forcible, and calculated to convey the idea with clearness. It is manifest that the judge meant precisely what was said in the case of the C. & G. R. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 24 S. C., 60, "that corporations are artificial bodies, creatures of the State, and as the State may or may not call them into existence, so she may limit their existence and mould and form them in precise accordance with her view of what is right or politic." If by the phrase

"special legislation" is *meant simply legislation which does not apply to all, then the grant of every charter is an act of special legislation. But if it is intended to express the idea of unjust discrimination in establishing a rule of law for incorporations different from that under which other "persons" are judged "under like conditions." It seems to be assumed that as soon as a corporation is created it necessarily has the same rights in all respects as a natural person, when, in fact, it has only the rights, more or less, which are consistent with its charter. The provision does apply to all "under like conditions," to all railroads, whether owned and operated by individuals or corporations. State v. Berlin, 21 S. C., 292 [53 Am. Rep. 677].

The franchise cannot exist without the authority of the State, and in granting it the State may, for the protection of the public, reserve the right of future control; and in such case, when that right is exercised, it cannot be held to be oppressive or unconstitutional. The Northeastern Railroad Company was chartered in 1851, subject to the 41st section of the act of 1841, which provided: "That it shall become part of the charter of every corporation, which shall at the present, or any succeeding session of the general assembly receive a grant of a charter, or any renewal, amendment, or modification thereof. * * * that every charter of incorporation granted, renewed, or modified, as aforesaid, shall at all times remain subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the legislative authority." The constitution of 1868 (sec. 5, art. XII) also provides that the laws "shall regulate the public use of all franchises which have heretofore been, or hereafter may be, created or granted by or under the authority of the State." So that there can be no doubt whatever that the company accepted its charter subject to amendment by the legislature.

But it is said that the provision in regard to the proof of negligence was not really an amendment of the charter, but a change in the law of evidence. If this were so, it would not make it unconstitutional. "The right to have one's controversies determined by existing rules of evidence is not a vested right. Like other rules affecting the remedy, they must therefore at all times be subject to modification and control by the legislature." Coel. Con. Lim., 452, 453. We do not, however, consider that by the aforesaid provision the main object of the legislature was to *make a change in the law of evidence, but to induce compliance with the previous requirement as to signals. The rule of evidence as to negligence was made to apply only in case of failure to give the required signals, and it is manifest that the purpose was to give an additional sanction to the provision requiring the signals to be given.

Besides the matter of charter and vested right, Mr. Pierce says: "A railroad company, although no power is reserved to amend or repeal its charter, is nevertheless subject, like individuals, to such police laws as the legislature may from time to time enact for the safety and health of citizens and the general convenience and good order. Its property and essential franchises are, indeed, protected by the constitution; but the company itself is not thereby placed above the laws. It was not the design of that instrument to disarm the States of the power to pass laws to protect the lives, limbs, health, and morals of citizens and to regulate their conduct towards each other, and the mode of using property so that different owners may not injure each other. Such laws may incidentally impair the value of franchises or of rights held under contracts, but they are enacted diverso intuitu, and are not within the constitutional inhibition." Pierce on Railroads, p. 460, and numerous authorities. Cooley Con. Lim., 710; People ex rel. Kimball v. B. & A. R. R. Co., 70 N. Y., 570; State v. Berlin, 21 S. C., 292 [53 Am. Rep. 677]; Messenger v. Penn. R. R. Co., 36 N. J. Law, 407 [13 Am. Rep. 457].

In the case last cited Chief Justice Beasley, of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, expressed it thus: "A company of this kind is invested with important prerogative franchises, among which are the rights to build and use a railway, and to charge and take tolls and fares. These prerogatives are grants from the government, and public utility is the consideration for them. Although in the hands of a private corporation, they are still sovereign franchises, and must be used and treated as such. They must be held in trust for the general good." We do not think it was error in law to hold that the sections aforesaid were constitutional.

Exceptions 10 and 11 allege error only in disconnected parts of the charge, which are cited. They are too general. We have *read the charge as a whole with care, and we must say that we agree with the judge, that it "leaned slightly to the side of the defendant." At least, we have not been able to discover wherein the defendant has a right to complain of it.

Exceptions 12 and 13, a, b, c, allege that the judge, undertaking to state to the jury the facts of the case, confined his statement to only a part of the testimony, which was misleading. We cannot consider such matters as good cause for setting aside a verdict. In the conduct of a cause below, something must be left to the judgment and impartial discretion of the trial judge. McPherson v. McPherson, 21 S. C., 261.

Exceptions 15 and 16 complain that the judge committed error in suggesting a hypothetical case. He charged, "that it is not material in law whether the injury results from direct collision or the damage is done by the injured one being thrown under the train, without actual collision with the wagon." We cannot say that this was entirely hypothetical or erroneous. See Dyer v. Erie Railroad Co., 71 N. Y., 228; Prescott v.

Eastern R. R. Co., 113 Mass., 370. "If the neglect of the duties incumbent on the defendants caused the plaintiff to approach so near the passing train that his horse took fright from it, and the injury thereby occurred, he being in the exercise of due care, the defendants' negligence was such a proximate cause of the injury that they are liable therefor, although the circumstances of the rush of the train and the fright of the horse intervened between the negligence and the injury."

Exceptions 17, 18, and 19 are aimed at certain reasons assigned by the judge for refusing to grant the motion for a new trial. The judge did not refuse the motion on the ground that he had not the power to grant it, but on the merits: and whether the views he expressed as leading him to that conclusion were or were not satisfactory, they are no part of the case upon appeal in this court. Warren v. Lagrone, 12 S. C., 51.

Exceptions 20, 21, and 22 substantially complain that the judge erred "in suffering judgment to be entered on the verdict when the proof of negligence was confined to the alleged omission of certain statutory signals, and the complaint did not allege the fact of the omission of either of the said statutory signals, which *constituted the cause of action." We think it a misapprehension to suppose that the omission of the statutory signals was alone relied on as the cause of action, or that the proof of negligence was "confined" to them. The complaint alleged that the defendant "carelessly and negligently" caused the injury to the plaintiff, and the defendant, making no objection to the form of the complaint, answered, denying that "at any time or in any way the plaintiff was injured by the negligence or carelessness of the defendant." This made the issue. This is a civil action for damages, and there was no necessity for the same reiteration and specification in detail which is required in an indictment for a criminal offence. "In actions for negligence a general allegation is necessarily allowable, the ultimate fact pleaded, i. e., the fact to be established by evidence is negligence. Facts and not evidence of them must be pleaded." Bliss Code Pl. § 211; 2 Thomp. Negl. § 22.

But in considering the grounds for a nonsuit we have already determined the nature of this action, and we will not repeat what was there said. In the view there expressed, "the complaint contains allegations entirely sufficient to sustain the verdict," and that being the case we know of no principle or practice which would have justified the judge in directing that it should not be entered. Section 286 of the Code provides that "upon receiving a verdict, the clerk shall make an entry in his minutes, specifying * * * the verdict, and either the judgment entered thereon or an order that the cause be reserved for argument or further consideration. If a different direction be not given by the court, the clerk must enter judgment in conformity with the verdict." It was certainly proper to withhold the judgment until the motion for a new trial was heard, but that was refused, and the judge declining to give a different direction, the judgment was entered in conformity with the verdict, which, as we have held, is supported by the record.

We cannot consider this as a motion within a year under section 195 of the Code to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, &c. The relief allowed by that section "is only given to parties who, by reason of some mistake or inadvertence, may *have lost the opportunity to be present at the trial. In this case the defendants were ably represented at the trial and made vigorous defence." Steele v. C. & A. R. R. Co., 14 S. C., 331. So we say in this case. The defendants were present at the trial, and their defence has been conducted with industry, ability, and indomitable perseverance. The point is purely technical. There has been no surprise whatever. The defendants were not ignorant of the requirements of the statutes; indeed, were properly acting in obedience to them, and the case from the beginning to the end was conducted in all respects as if the complaint had referred in express terms to the aforesaid statutes and their requirements. We conclude in the words of Chief Justice Parker in delivering the judgment of the court in the case of Williams v. H. & Q. Bridge and Turnpike Corp., supra: "It is always unpleasant to arrest the course of judicial proceedings on account of (alleged) defects, which have nothing to do with the real merits of the matter in dispute."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SITTON v. MACDONALD.

[Reported and annotated in 60 Am. Rep. 484.]

[1. Damages ⇨ 40.]

In action for damages for failing to repair a cotton-tie punch, the loss of stock on hand rendered valueless by the detention of the punch, may be considered as a measure of damages, but not the profits which might have been realized from the use of the punch, unless the peculiar circumstances were known to the defendant, and his contract to repair was made with reference thereto.

[2. Damages ¶ 22.]

The difference between the profits realized and the profits which might have been realized, is not recoverable as damages. The rule making the difference in price at two different dates the measure of damages in certain cases, does not apply to a case where there is a mere difference in profits, where profits are excluded as too remote to be recovered as damages.

Before Cothran, J., Greenville, July, 1885.

*This was an action by J. W. Sitton against R. M. Macdonald, commenced September 24, 1884. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Nix, Shuman & Nix, for appellants.
Mr. A. C. Welborn, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for damages under the following circumstances: The plaintiff made a business of buying old cotton-ties and manufacturing them into new ties. He alleged that in this business he had occasion to use a peculiar "punch," worth some ten dollars, which could neither be made nor repaired by an ordinary blacksmith; that this punch getting out of repair, he, in July, 1882, engaged the defendant, who is the proprietor of the "Greenville Machine Works and Iron Foundry," to repair it, which he undertook to do, and return it on a given day; that on the day named he called for it, but it had not been repaired; that this occurred several times until the season of 1882 was lost, for which he claimed damages $350. That the defendant promised to have the punch repaired by July, 1883, but the same disappointments followed, until he lost the season of 1883, for which he claimed damages, $450. The same was repeated until he had lost half the season of 1884, when he purchased another punch, and sued the defendant for damages, $1,000. The defendant put in a general denial and special defence "that the cotton-tie punch was broken and useless when left at the shop of defendant."

Upon the trial, the plaintiff offered to prove

"as damages the amount of profits he would have earned in the ordinary employment of the punch during the time it was detained by the defendant, viz.: during the seasons of 1882, 1883, and half of 1884. Defendant objected on the ground that such damages were too speculative, remote, and contingent. Objection sustained." The presiding judge then turned to the plaintiff, who was on the stand, and said, "If you can show that you laid in a stock of ties, &c.: if you can prove that you had made contracts to repair ties for others, or to furnish ties when repaired, &c.; if you can prove *that hands were employed by the plaintiff, &c., he would be entitled to be re-imbursed their wages actually paid." The plaintiff, in accordance with this announcement, testified that "he had laid in about nine ($9,000) dollars worth of old ties to manufacture in 1882, from which he would have realized one hundred dollars profit if defendant had repaired his punch according to his promises. He kept this stock on hand until he got his new punch in 1884, after the commencement of this action, when he manufactured it into new ties, realizing from said nine dollars' worth of stock twenty-seven dollars profit." The judge charged the jury that if they believed this testimony, they should find for the plaintiff the difference between the profits he would have made out of the stock of 1882 and the profits he did make out of said stock in 1884; and that it was a question of fact for them to determine whether plaintiff, by his negligence, contributed to the loss thus sustained.

The jury found for the plaintiff $42. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, and that being refused, he appeals to this court upon the ground "that his honor erred in ruling that plaintiff could offer evidence, and the jury find as damages the difference between the profits made on material manufactured during the fall of 1884, which the plaintiff had on hand in July, 1882, with a view to manufacturing and selling it in that year, but which he did not manufacture and sell in consequence of the alleged breach of contract, and the profits which the plaintiff would have made if he had manufactured and sold such material during the fall of 1882," &c.

We do not understand that this was an action on the case for vindictive damages, for intentional misrepresentation, deceit, or fraud, but simply an action for damages for the breach of a contract. The rule as to the proper measure of damages is not always free from difficulty. It is not the same under all circumstances, but necessarily varies to meet the varying cases as they arise. It is different in actions ex contractu from those in tort. In the former it is more restricted, the fundamental principle being that the damage must be "the primary and immediate

ley, *180. In this latter well-considered case it was held that "for the breach of an executory contract, without fraud or imposition, the jury can only give such damages as fairly and naturally result from it, and which can be measured by a pecuniary standard; remote and consequential damages cannot be allowed."

This is undoubtedly the rule, but it is not always easy to fix the exact limit between what is primary and secondary, or what is immediate or consequential and remote. If the breach is merely in the tardy delivery of property intended for sale, it is obvious enough that ordinarily the damage would be the difference in the price realized from that which might have been obtained at the proper time. But if the breach is in the non-delivery of an article not intended for sale, but for use in some particular business, other considerations intervene, and the matter is not so clear. In this class of cases the courts have endeavored to lay down certain rules to assist in fixing the damages upon proper principles. In Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch., 341), which seems to have been considered a leading case both in England and America, the following rules are indicated: "First, that damages which may fairly and reasonably be considered as naturally arising from a breach of contract, according to the usual course of things, are always recoverable. Second, that damages which would not arise in the usual course of things from a breach of contract, but which do arise from circumstances peculiar to the special case, are not recoverable, unless the special circumstances are known to the person who has broken the contract." See Wood Mayne Dam., § 14, and notes.

Now, apply these rules to this case. It is not perfectly clear, but possibly the loss of the stock on hand (nine dollars' worth) rendered valueless for the time by the detention of the punch, might be reasonably considered as naturally arising from a breach of the contract to repair the punch within a certain time. But, surely, the very remarkable profits which in the opinion of the plaintiff might have been realized from the use of the punch, could not be so considered. It certainly was not "in the usual course of things, but peculiar to the special case," that damages to the extent of hundreds of dollars, should result from delay in repairing a punch entirely out of order, and never worth more than ten dollars; *and if so, according to the second rule above stated, such damages could not be recovered against him, unless these peculiar circumstances were known to the defendant and his contract to repair was made with reference to them, which was not made to appear. In this view, the first ruling of the judge was correct that such possible profits "were too speculative, remote, and contingent."

But subsequent to this general ruling, the plaintiff (who was on the stand) stated that he had on hand stock to the value of $9, and after he got a new punch in 1884, he worked up that old stock at a profit of $27; whereas, if he could have used it in 1882, his profit would have been $100, and the judge then charged that the jury might give the difference as damages. Was this error? We are not able to see how this difference (although arising out of the old stock) ceased on that account to be profits. As it seems to us it was still speculative profits, and as such not recoverable as damages. We are aware that there are circumstances under which one who, by a breach of contract, has delayed a sale until there is a fall in the marketable value of the property, may be charged as damages with the difference in price; but we do not see that such principle applies to a case where the only question is as to more or less profits, which as a whole, as profits, are excluded as too contingent, remote, and speculative.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

SALE v. MEGGETT.

[1. Jury ⇨13.]

Where a defendant in an equity cause sets up a title to land, the subject of the action, which title, if sustained, would defeat the action, he is entitled to a trial by jury of his claim of title; but if the title asserted be not paramount to the title alleged in the complaint, but only incidental thereto, it may be adjudicated by the judge.

Mr. Justice McIver dissented as to K.'s right to a jury trial.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, July, 1885.

This was an action by W. W. Sale, as clerk of the court, to foreclose a mortgage. It was commenced in November, 1881, in Colleton County, and afterwards transferred to Charleston County by order of the court. On motion of plaintiff's attorney, the order of reference, stated in the opinion, was passed, the brief not stating whether the defendant, Klinck, assented or objected, but it would seem that it was done without his knowledge.

Upon the matters considered by this court, the master's report was as follows:

It will be necessary to dispose first of a question which lies upon the threshold of the case. It is claimed by the defendant, Klinck, that he cannot be called upon to meet or answer the allegations of his co-defendant, Susan Meggett, her answer never having been served upon him; that the affirmative relief claimed in her said answer could only be obtained by her filing a cross-bill in the cause, making the proper allegations and prayer for relief, and serving the same on Klinck; that the bringing of the action in the name of a clerk is a covert attempt on the part of the Meggetts to avoid showing their hands; that the effects of the bill and the answer of Klinck is to raise an issue on his plea *in bar, viz., that the mortgage cannot be foreclosed against him, being in possession under a paramount title, which issue cannot be tried in a foreclosure suit; and that the bill must be dismissed as to Klinck, and the parties left to their action at law upon the question of title.

If this position be sound, there is of course an end of the case. But it seems to me to be based upon a fallacy. The only point necessary to be determined here is: Was Klinck a proper party to these proceedings? To this question there can, I apprehend, be but one answer. As is said in Cruzer v. Daniel, McMull. Eq., 196, "The tenant in possession of the land is always a proper party to a bill for foreclosure." Of course, if he holds by a paramount title, he can plead it. But in what is Klinck's title "paramount" to that of the mortgagor's? Both claim under the common ancestor, and the judgment is admitted to have been subsequent to the mortgage.

The case of Cruzer v. Daniel, supra, really decides this whole point. As was said by Chancellor Harper in that case: "This is not, as suggested, an action to try title in the Court of Chancery. Both parties concur in the title of David Murray, and claim under him, and upon equitable principles the defendant cannot avail himself of any title subsequently acquired. If defendant claimed by a title paramount to that of complainant's intestate, as that David Murray, or any one under whom David Murray claimed, had conveyed to him, or any one under whom he claims, before the mortgage to Charles Murray, he would have had a right to have this question tried at law. But he alleges no such title, and he was bound to allege it if any such existed."

This disposes of Klinck's contention as to his "paramount title." It is true that he alleges his title to be paramount, but the very statement of his claim shows that whatever title he may have was acquired subsequently to the mortgage.

I think it is clear, without multiplying authorities, that Klinck was a proper party, and that his plea in bar must be overruled. As to the question with relation to the regularity of the proceedings under which the judgment was obtained, the defences that might have been pleaded against the note, &c., which are raised in the answer of Susan

Meggett, it is sufficient to observe *that, whatever their value may be, they cannot properly be raised or considered in the present proceedings. All such defences should have been pleaded by the executor, and the issues raised were concluded by the judgment, which cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding. Fraser & Dill v. City Council of Charleston, 19 S. C., 384; Huggins v. Oliver, 21 Id., 147. So far, therefore, as the judgment of Klinck is concerned, its validity cannot be attacked in this case.

All other matters necessary to a proper understanding of the case are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rutledge & Young, for appellants.
Messrs. Mitchell & Smith, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The purpose of this action was to foreclose a mortgage, executed by the Meggetts, defendants, devisees of James C. Meggett, late of Colleton County, and covering a certain tract of land located in said county. G. W. Klinck, among others was made a party defendant, because he was in possession of the land, claiming as purchaser at sheriff's sale, under an execution issued on judgment obtained against the executor of the said James C. Meggett, deceased. The plaintiff demanded judgment of foreclosure, that Klinck be required to account for rents and profits, and that the rights of the parties be adjudged. The Meggetts answered, admitting most of the allegations in the complaint, and joining in the prayer thereof; also alleging that Klinck's judgment and execution was null and void and should be set aside. Klinck answered, stating that James C. Meggett during his lifetime was indebted to Klinck, Wickenburg & Co., and that after his death his executor gave his promissory note for said debt, amounting to $231.15, as acknowledgment of said debt, upon which judgment had been obtained, and under execution issued thereon he had purchased the land in question, and to perfect his title he had also purchased said land at a tax sale, and now claimed that he was seized in fee, and prayed that he might be dismissed with costs.

*It was not proved that the answers of the other defendants, or any of the papers in the case except the summons and complaint, had ever been served on Klinck.

The case was referred by his honor, Judge Cothran, to the master to take the testimony and report upon the issues of law and fact involved in the pleadings, with leave to report any special matter. The reference was made on motion of the plaintiff's attorney. The attorneys of the parties, including those of Klinck, appeared at the different references, with evidence and argument. It is stated by the referee that Klinck, through his attorney, objected to being called upon to meet the allegations in the answer of Mrs. Meggett, claiming affirmative relief against him, as said answer had never been served upon him; and also, as he claimed the land by paramount title, that the question of title could not be tried in a foreclosure suit, and that the parties should be left to their action at law upon the question of title. These objections were overruled by the master, and he made his report upon the whole case, stating the facts fully, which will be found in the "Case," concluding with a recommendation that the mortgaged property be sold, the proceeds to be applied to the mortgage after the payment of costs, &c., and that Klinck be decreed to account for rents and profits from November 30, 1881, to be applied to the deficiency of the mortgage debt.

His honor, Judge Pressley, heard this report upon exceptions from Klinck. He decreed that Klinck, claiming as he did a paramount title under a judgment against the executor of defendants' (Meggetts) ancestor, his title was good if the heirs were not in exclusive possession at the time, but bad if they were in such possession, which he held was a question of fact, upon which "Klinck was entitled to a trial at law, which he could not try, though all the facts were before him under the master's report." He therefore "ordered, that the case be dismissed as to Klinck without costs, he being a proper party, but dismissed only on his claim of trial at law. Further, that the remaining parties have leave to apply for such further order as may be necessary for foreclosing said mortgage."

The plaintiff has appealed, denying Klinck's right to a trial by jury, and claiming that the question of title raised by Klinck was *a mere incidental question raised in a case of acknowledged equity jurisdiction, which the judge had the right to try, and that he erred in not so holding. Besides, that Klinck by his conduct had waived a jury trial. And further, that the judge erred in not deciding that Klinck had no title, as appeared from the record, proved by himself, in reference to the sealed note taken from the executor in payment of Klinck, Wickenburg & Co.'s account against the deceased, which he had sued to judgment and under which he had purchased the land. And in holding that whether the possession of the heirs was exclusive possession of such a character as to prevent the sale on a suit against the executor, was a question of fact, &c. And further, in not deciding the questions of law and fact raised in the master's report, and especially whether Klinck had not lost all claim against the estate, by his own inexcusable neglect in not pursuing the assets in time, &c.

It will be seen at once that the main and the first question in the case is, whether Klinck was entitled to a jury trial, as to the title set up by him. There is no doubt of the fact that the title of Klinck to the land is involved here, and it is equally clear that where title to land is involved, the parties litigant have the right, as a general rule, to demand a jury, if they so desire: therefore, unless the position of the appellant is tenable, that this is an equity cause in all of its prominent features and purposes, and being so, it draws within the jurisdiction in which it is heard all questions arising therein and incidental thereto, like the one here, or unless a jury trial has been waived, then the law suggested above must apply.

The doctrine as to the first question seems to be this: where a title is set up which, if proved to exist as alleged, would be superior to the plaintiff's title, then, in such case, the existence of such title is a matter for the jury, under the instruction of the judge as to the law involved; but where, even admitting the title claimed by the defendant, as alleged, yet if it is inferior to that of the plaintiff, and as matter of law would not defeat his claim if sustained by the verdict of the jury, then there is no necessity for the judge trying an equity cause to submit the title to a jury, for the reason that, in fact, the title is not really involved, as the *defendant can claim nothing under it, and therefore it would be wholly useless to encumber the proceeding with a separate trial in reference thereto; the judge himself may adjudicate the rights of the parties. Cruger v. Daniel, McMull. Eq., 157.

The question, then, of Klinck's right to a jury trial, independent of the question of waiver, depends upon the fact whether he has set up a superior title to the plaintiff, or rather a title which, if proved to exist, as alleged by him, would in law defeat the plaintiff's claim or right to a foreclosure. Now, he founds his title upon a purchase under judgment and execution against the executor of the deceased, whose land it is admitted was sold upon a debt which he alleges was a debt of the said deceased. Can the lands of a decedent be sold under judgment and execution obtained against his representatives on a debt of his? They can under certain circumstances—briefly, where the lands have not gone into the possession of the heirs; otherwise they cannot. When they have gone into the exclusive possession of the heirs, although they do not escape liability for the debts of the ancestor entirely, yet they can then be reached only by a direct action against said heirs; before alienation a judgment against the representative having no effect, except to establish the debt against the personal assets.

In the case before the court it is true that Klinck has not alleged that at the time of his judgment against the executor and the sale thereunder the land in question had not gone into the hands of the heirs, and was therefore liable to the debt, yet he alleges that it was sold under an execution obtained against the said executor on a debt of the ancestor, and he claims to be seized in fee by virtue of his purchase under a sale made under said execution. And has he not the right to show by evidence all the facts necessary to his claim of seizin in fee, under the allegation of such seizin? Whether his title would be good under that sale, would be a question of law applicable to the facts when found, but whether the evidence would show the necessary facts to bring his title under said law, would be a question of fact, upon which as it appears to us, he would have the right to demand a jury. For instance, whether the note given by the executor was intended as payment of the *account, or a mere acknowledgment thereof, and whether the heirs were in exclusive possession of the land at the time of the sale, &c., would involve to some extent questions of fact for the jury, determining under the law whether or not Klinck's title is superior or subordinate to the mortgage. Because if the judgment, as matter of fact, was obtained on a debt of the ancestor, and the sale made before the heirs had taken exclusive possession, then it would be paramount to the mortgage of the heirs.

But these questions of fact cannot be tried by the judge. He could say what effect they would have as matter of law on the title, but before applying the law he must have the facts, and they can be solved only by a verdict. We do not think that this case falls under that class of cases where the title raised is a mere incidental question to the main issue and may be adjudged by the judge; but it is a case where a party has interposed a title, which if sustained (and that must depend upon the facts in reference thereto), will defeat the opposing claim altogether. And it is therefore a question of paramount title, which if so, as the appellant admits, belongs to a jury.

Next, did Klinck waive his right of trial by jury? Under the code a party may waive a jury trial in one of three ways: 1. By failing to appear at the trial. 2d. By written consent in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk; and 3d. By oral consent in open court, entered on the minutes. Code, § 288. In such waiver the court is authorized to try the case. There is no admission in the "Case" that Klinck waived his right by either of these modes. The position is that he waived it by "conduct." The code does not provide for such waiver. But, besides, the judge did not try the question of title, which would have been his duty in case of a proper waiver, because the effect of such waiver is to throw the trial upon the judge. The judge here referred to the master all the issues of law and fact involved in the pleadings, for his report with leave to report any special matter. It is not necessary to determine here when a jury trial has been waived whether the judge could refer such a case to the master or a referee, because we have seen that there was no waiver here.

But independent of a waiver it may be said that all and any *issues in an action may be referred by order of the judge. See Code, § 292. This is true with the limitation that such reference can be ordered only on the written consent of the parties, or where they do not consent, in cases involving a long account on either side where said accounting is necessary for the information of the judge, or where a question of fact other than upon the pleadings shall arise in any stage of the action. It cannot be contended that Klinck's right of trial by jury was lost under either of the provisions above.

The question now arises, admitting that Klinck had not lost his right to a jury, does it follow that the case should have been dismissed as to him? We think not. Under the code an equitable issue and a legal issue may be involved in the same action. The plaintiff may combine an equitable cause of action and a legal one in the same suit, and the defendant may set up a legal or an equitable defence to one or both, and they may be all tried—true, not on the same side of the court, but tried without the necessity of separating the causes and ordering a dismissal as to one with leave to bring separate action in reference thereto, if so advised. But the equity cause can be heard by the judge, and the legal cause or defence by the jury, as in a regular case at law. Now, how does this principle apply to the case before us? The plaintiff instituted his action upon a cause of equitable cognizance on the equity side of the court, the defendant was made a party, perhaps under that provision of the code which enacts that any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, &c. And any persons claiming title or a right of possession to real estate may be made parties in an action to recover real estate. Code, § 139. See Donthit v. Hipp, 23 S. C., 205; Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 Id., 545.

The defendant claimed title adverse to the plaintiff. He was made a party defendant, he appeared and answered without protest or objection, and in his answer he set up a legal defence. Thus the issue was made up and was on the docket for trial. Why could not that issue be tried under the practice and principle suggested above, by simply withholding for the time the equitable cause and entering upon the legal defence, with a jury, as *in cases at law? Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C., 108; Smith & Co. v. Bryce, 17 Id., 544; Chapman v. Lipscomb, 18 Id., 232; McGee v. Hall, 23 Id., 388. This mode of the trial of causes and defences is claimed to be one of the excellences of the code practice, as it dispenses with multiplicity of actions and economizes in matters of costs and expenses.

We think under the section of the code referred to above (139), Klinck was legitimately made a party defendant. In fact, under the old equity practice being in possession, and claiming title adverse to the plaintiff, he was a proper party, so that the land, if ordered to be sold, might be sold free from a cloud overhanging it.

Appellant's other exceptions involving errors assigned as to the facts, such as whether the heirs were in the exclusive possession, &c., we think are untenable for the reason, as we have already said, while the judge might charge the law upon such facts, the existence of such facts was a matter of evidence—they were probative facts involved in the question of title, and should go to the jury.

The Circuit Judge seems to have passed upon all matters so far as the plaintiff and all other defendants, except Klinck, are concerned, in his order that the remaining parties have leave to apply for such further orders as may be necessary for foreclosing the mortgage, and the only matter left open is the title of Klinck, and his accountability for rents and profits. We concur with the Circuit Judge that Klinck's title is a jury question, of course under the charge of the judge as to the facts necessary to constitute title in a case of this kind; but we do not see why the case should be dismissed as to Klinck, in order to give him the right he demands. It would involve unnecessary expense and delay to proceed with the foreclosure and then let the purchaser contest Klinck's title in a separate action for possession. The parties are now all before the court, all questions at issue can be tried under the procedure allowed by the code, without violating Klinck's right to a jury.

It is the judgment of this court, that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as dismissed the complaint as to Klinck be reversed, and that the case be remanded for trial by jury of the question of title raised by Klinck, and the amount *of rents and profits, if the judge should hold him accountable therefor.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I dissent. I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court as to the right of the defendant, Klinck, to demand a trial by jury, but upon this point concur in the view taken by the master. The pressure of other more imperative official duties forbids my entering into any discussion of the question, and I must, therefore, confine myself to a simple dissent. As to the other points involved I concur with the majority.

New trial granted.

[Partnership \S 77, 183.]

The managing member of a partnership, whose books were open to the inspection of the other partners, purchased in his own name a house and lot and paid for the same in largest part with a check on the bank drawn by him in the firm name, and in part with a debt due to the firm by the vendor. At that time the firm was solvent. Shortly afterwards the purchaser conveyed this house and lot to himself as trustee for the benefit of his daughter. This voluntary deed was drawn by another member of the firm, who was also the attorney for the firm. In these transactions there was no concealment or conspiracy. Held, that the partner might appropriate the partnership funds to the purchase of property and take title thereto in his own individual name; that he thereby became a debtor to the partnership to the extent of the money drawn out by him; but upon subsequent insolvency and dissolution of the firm, the receivers could not recover this property as partnership assets. Maybin v. Moorman, 21 S. C., 346.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. \S 145, 323; Dec. Dig. \S 77, 183.]

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, July, 1883.

In this case Hon. W. H. Wallace, Circuit Judge, sat in the place of the Chief Justice.

The facts of this case are stated in the opinion of the court. The Circuit decree, omitting its findings of fact, was as follows:

*The object of this action is to set aside this conveyance of Webb, and subject the property to the debts of the said copartnership. The case was argued on the Circuit chiefly on the ground of fraud. It was contended by the plaintiffs that the voluntary deed of the defendant, Webb, creating a trust in the lot of land in favor of his daughter and her children, was fraudulent and void, as against creditors, under the statutes of Elizabeth. It, however, presents another aspect. In so far as the property was paid for by Webb from the assets of the firm, a trust resulted in their favor, and the property may be made liable to that extent to the demands of these plaintiffs.

The other doctrine, if applicable at all, would apply to the transaction only as a case of the voluntary conveyance of property in derogation of the rights of existing creditors, inasmuch as I find no actual fraud in the case. Regarding it as a case of constructive fraud of this character, the plaintiffs here would have no right of action. A voluntary deed is not void per se, but voidable as against existing creditors whose debts have not been paid. Such a creditor could not bring an action to set aside a deed, and subject the property to the payment of his debt, without having first exhausted his legal remedies. He must first have sued the debt to judgment, taken out execution, sold all the property liable to the same, and procured a return of nulla bona before he could bring such an action. Hall v. Joiner, 1 S. C., 186; Suber v. Chandler, 18 Id., 526; Verner v. Downs, 13 Id., 450; Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 Id., 96; Eigleberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill Ch., 113 [26 Am. Dec. 192]; 2 Story Eq., 1521.

At law the deed is considered as a mere nullity. Creditors whose demands exist at the date of the deed may so regard it. Having obtained judgments, they may levy their executions and sell the lands conveyed by the deed. The purchaser under such sale may bring his action of ejectment and recover the land. In such an action it would be wholly immaterial whether the debtor was, at the time the deed was made, solvent or insolvent. It would only be necessary for the plaintiff to show that the deed was voluntary, that his debt existed at the time it was made, and that his debt remains unpaid. Richardson v. Rhodus, 14 Rich., 96.

*I will now proceed to apply these principles to the case in hand. If when the defendant, Webb, drew the money from the firm, which he invested in the lot in question, he left eight thousand dollars to his credit in the concern, he did not use the money of the copartnership to make the purchase. But to the extent that he reduced the amount below eight thousand dollars, he did so use the money of the firm. The balance to his credit on that day, January 6, 1873, as shown by the books of the firm, of which he was the managing partner, was $5,780.55.

Though the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to show, affirmatively, that Webb did use the money of the firm in making said purchase, yet, prima facie, they have established this fact by showing from the books that he had reduced the balance to his credit below eight thousand dollars, which sum it was his duty to contribute to the capital stock of the business. If any proper credits were omitted from this account, it devolved upon the defendants to show them. This they attempted to do by testimony tending to show that Webb had not received credit for the real estate contributed by him, estimated at twenty-five hundred dollars in value. But the complaint alleges that the sum of $11,315.68, for which Webb was allowed credit, included the real estate and all the answers admitted this allegation.

Defendants also insist that Webb should be allowed an additional credit on the account of $1,000 for his services as manager. Though the year had not expired, the demand seemed to me reasonable, since it was not said in the agreement that he should not draw his salary at any time during the year. With this exception no other credit has been made to appear in Webb's favor. It might be that a different state of the accounts would have been shown had the whole partnership account been taken before a referee. But it was upon the defendant's own motion, against the insistence of the plaintiffs, that the trial proceeded without this accounting.

From what has been said, it appears that the amount to the credit of Webb January 6, 1873, was only $6,780.55, and consequently Webb had no money in the firm which he had a right to apply to the purchase of property on his own account. To the extent, therefore, of the amount drawn from the firm and so *applied, the property purchased is charged with a trust in favor of the firm, and is liable for their debts. These plaintiffs, as receivers, are charged with the duty of collecting the assets and paying the debts of the copartnership. The resulting trust in favor of the firm is cognizable only in equity, and, therefore, could only be enforced by an action of this character. The plaintiffs, therefore, are properly in court, so far as regards that fund.

But a further question arises, whether they are entitled in this action to anything beyond the amount of $1,500 belonging to the firm, and applied to the purchase of the property. If the property should sell for more than fifteen hundred dollars, the overplus might be regarded as a gift by Webb to his daughter, void under the statute as a constructive fraud, as against existing creditors. In that view of it that balance would be equitable assets for the payment of the debts of W. H. Webb, but not copartnership assets, and, therefore, these receivers, as such, could not have an action to recover them. They are charged with the collection of the assets of the copartnership only, and have no authority to pursue the individual assets of the members of the firm in order to subject them to the debts of the copartnership. As to such balance, therefore, the plaintiffs would have no right of action, and would be entitled to no relief here. The creditors are not parties, and must be left to pursue such remedies as they may be advised that they have otherwise, if any.

As I do not find any fraudulent intent on the part of W. H. Webb, and the parties beneficially interested in the property are innocent of any wrong, the recovery here will be limited to the sum paid from the funds of the firm, without arrears of interest, and the defendant, Margaret E. Harrington, will be allowed to redeem, if she so desires, within a reasonable time.

It is ordered and decreed, that the defendant, Margaret E. Harrington, or W. H. Webb, as trustee, be at liberty to redeem the said lot of land, with the appurtenances, by paying to the plaintiffs the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, with interest thereon from the date of this decree, and the costs of this action. And in case of their failure so to redeem, that the master proceed, on the first Monday of January next, or some other convenient *salesday thereafter, to sell the said lot of land for cash and pay the proceeds thereof, first, to the costs of this action and the expenses of sale, and any taxes due on said property at the time of sale. Next, that he pay therefrom to the plaintiffs the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, with interest from the date of this decree, and that he hold any balance which may remain after such payments, subject to the trusts declared in the said deed of W. H. Webb in favor of the defendants, Margaret E. Harrington and her children, until proper orders be made by the court in respect of the fund, upon the application of Mrs. Harrington and her children, or any other person duly authorized on their behalf, and such orders may be taken here-in at the costs of said applicants.

From this decree defendants appealed upon several exceptions; but they need not be considered, as this court considered only one point.

Mr. Geo. Johnstone, for appellants.

Messrs. Y. J. Pope and Geo. S. Mower, contra.

May 1, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice WALLACE. On the first day of April, 1872, W. H. Webb, W. C. Parker, and L. J. Jones entered into a contract of partnership for the purpose of carrying on the business of tanning leather, making and selling saddles, harness, and shoes and of selling buggies, guano, corn, and other articles of merchandise. It was stipulated between them and stated in the memorandum of agreement signed by each of them, that each should contribute the sum of eight thousand dollars to the partnership capital, and that each should share equally in the profits and losses of the business, and that the business should be managed by Webb, with the consent of the other partners, and that books, exhibiting the business, should be kept by him which at all times were to be subject to inspection by the other partners.

When the partnership was entered into Webb was engaged in manufacturing, buying, and selling leather and leather goods. His stock on hand, tools of the trade, and the real estate owned, occupied, and used by him in the conduct of his business, were *transferred to the new concern at an agreed valuation, as his contribution to the capital stock. He was credited upon the books of the firm with the sum of eleven thousand, three hundred and fifteen dollars and sixty cents. For the amount of the excess in value, contributed by Webb, over the eight thousand dollars which he had agreed to contribute to the capital stock he was to receive the note of the firm. Jones and Parker, too, were engaged in the business of tanning leather. It was agreed that all their stock, fixtures, and real estate owned and used by them in their business should be transferred to the new concern at an agreed valuation, as their contribution to its capital. Accordingly Jones and Parker were credited with the agreed value of this property, to wit, with the sum of twelve thousand, eight hundred and forty-four dollars, and they, too, it was agreed, should receive the note of the firm for the sum of any excess in value contributed by them over the eight thousand dollars to be contributed by each partner. Parker owned an interest in the property contributed by him and Jones, estimated at about twenty-five hundred dollars. That all the property turned over to the concern by Webb is covered by the credit of eleven thousand, three hundred and fifteen dollars and sixty cents, is denied by Webb. The determination of this question is not necessary to the decision of the case according to the view we take of its essential issues.

In pursuance of the agreement between the partners, the firm entered upon the prosecution of its objects and transacted a large and flourishing business under the management, mainly, of Webb, who, it was agreed, should receive for his services as manager the sum of one thousand dollars per annum. Taking the statement of the books of the concern as to the amount of capital actually contributed by Webb as correct (and it may be assumed to be so for the purposes of this case), on January 6, 1873, Webb had reduced this credit to the sum of five thousand, seven hundred and eighty dollars and fifty-five cents. On that day there is nothing to show that the firm was not perfectly solvent. On that day Webb drew a draft on the account of the firm in bank for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars. This draft was cashed by the bank and charged to the firm. It was drawn and delivered *by Webb in part payment of the purchase money of a house and lot. The contract of purchase had been previously made for the sum of two thousand dollars. Other payments on the purchase had been made by Webb. One of these consisted of supplies furnished the vendor out of the partnership goods. At the time of the purchase Webb caused the conveyance to be made to himself, and he put his daughter, Mrs. Harrington, into possession of the property. On September 23, 1873, Webb conveyed this house and lot to himself as trustee for his daughter. This latter deed was drawn by L. J. Jones, one of the partners.

The partnership of Webb, Parker & Jones was dissolved by an order of this court, made in a proper proceeding before it on February 16, 1874, and receivers were appointed to administer the assets of the firm. At the date of this order the concern was insolvent. The receivers have brought this action to set aside the trust deed and to subject the property conveyed by it to sale for the payment pro tanto of the partnership debts. This relief is sought upon two grounds: First, Because this deed was a voluntary conveyance to the prejudice of creditors. Second, Because the property was paid for with partnership funds.

The first ground is decided against the plaintiffs by the Circuit Judge, and from this part of the Circuit decree no appeal has been taken. This question is not, therefore, before this court. It may be added, however, that this court concurs with the Circuit opinion upon this point, on the case as made on the trial below.

The second ground questions the right of a partner to acquire individual title to property paid for with funds drawn from the partnership. The law upon this question in this State has been stated in the recent case of Maybin v. Moorman, 21 S. C., 346. The Circuit decree in this case was filed before the opinion in the case of Maybin v. Moorman, was delivered. A brief statement of the facts of that case will show that it is conclusive of this. Moorman, Maybin, and Chick were partners in a mercantile business. Moorman was bookkeeper. The other partners had access to the books. Moorman was paid a salary for keeping the books. He took one thousand dollars of partnership funds *and paid for bank stock with it and took the stock in his own name. There was no intentional fraud or wrong doing of any sort. Moorman and Chick died, and the firm proved to be insolvent. Maybin, the surviving partner, brought an action against the executor of Moorman to recover the bank stocks as partnership assets to pay debts. This court decided that Moorman had acquired individual title to the stock and was indebted to the firm for the one thousand dollars paid for it.

With reference to the case in hand, nothing appears in connection with the original purchase of this property or the subsequent change in the nature of Webb's tenure of it which points to any purpose to prejudice the rights of creditors or partners. There was no concealment, for the check for fifteen hundred dollars was charged on the books of the firm to Webb on the day of its date. The conveyance to himself as trustee was drawn and approved by Mr. Jones, his partner and the attorney of the firm. There is no evidence of conspiracy, for at that time both Jones and Webb were men of means, and, as far as appears, able to respond individually to any existing liability of the firm. Under these circumstances the case of Maybin v. Moorman, supra, clearly decides that a partner may appropriate partnership funds to the payment of the purchase money of property for his own use, and become a debtor to the partnership for the money so used while he acquires individual title to the property so purchased.

It is, therefore, the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

25 S. C. 89

SMYTHE & ADGER v. BROWN.

(November Term, 1885.)

[1. Reference ¶50.]

In an action of foreclosure brought by the assignees of the mortgagee, the mortgagor denied the assignment and alleged, that if made, there were certain equities between the assignors and himself, binding upon the assignees. The cause was referred to the clerk of the court, as referee, to compute the amount due and report upon the questions of law and fact arising on the pleadings. Pending the reference, the referee, on defendant's motion, passed an order, giving defendant leave *to amend his answer and requiring the plaintiffs to make the original mortgagees parties. Plaintiffs at once appealed to the Circuit Court, and the judge, having no report from the referee but on the pleadings alone, reversed the order of the referee. Held, that the reference here not being for trial in its full sense, the Circuit Judge had the power to revoke the referee's order and require him to proceed with the case. The proper practice is by motion, but this was in substance what was done here. It may be different where all the issues are referred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 79; Dec. Dig. ¶50.]

There is nothing in the pleadings to show that the original mortgagees were necessary parties to the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1279; Dec. Dig. ¶427.]

[This case is also cited in Cartee v. Spence, 24 S. C. 554, and distinguished therefrom.]

Mr. Justice McIver and Mr. Justice McGowan concurred in the result, under the terms of section 791 of General Statutes.

Before Wallace, J., Lancaster, March, 1885. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Ira B. Jones and M. J. Hough, for appellant.

Messrs. Wylie & Wylie, contra.

May 4, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. These two actions between the same parties, were brought each on a separate note and to foreclose a mortgage in each case. These notes and mortgages had been executed by the defendant to Twitty & Connors, in 1882 and in 1883. Both mortgages had been recorded in due time. The said notes and mortgages were afterwards assigned, as alleged, to the plaintiffs, who brought the actions. The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the papers, but denied the assignment, and also the amount claimed, and for further defence upon the supposition that an assignment had been made, he interposed certain equities as against Twitty & Connors, the assignors, growing out of their transactions as factor and customer, and payments made to the said Twitty & Connors, both in their own right and as agents of the plaintiff. He further claimed, that if the assignments were made, they were made as collaterals with other collaterals to a large amount, which he urged should be made to bear a portion, at least, of the debt of plaintiff.

*When the case came up for trial, his honor, Judge Aldrich, by consent of all attorneys, ordered it to the clerk of the court, to compute and ascertain the amount due; and, further, to report upon the questions of law and fact arising on the pleadings. Pursuant to this order Mr. Williams, clerk of court, held a reference and had taken the testimony offered by the plaintiff, when the defendant's attorneys moved said clerk for leave to amend defendant's answers, and to make Twitty and Connors parties defendant, which motion was granted by order directing the summons and complaints to be amended by adding H. D. Twitty and Connors as defendants, giving them twenty days after service of summons within which to answer. From this order the plaintiffs served notice of appeal to the Circuit Court, on the ground that Twitty and Connors were not necessary parties.

This appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Wallace, who upon the pleadings alone (the referee not having made any report, either as to his conclusions or the testimony taken), granted an order rescinding the order supra of the referee, with ten dollars costs to the plaintiffs. From this order the defendant has appealed to this court, upon two grounds: 1st. Because his honor had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the order of the referee in the absence of a report by said referee to the Circuit Court. 2nd. Because Henry D. Twitty and Charles T. Connors are necessary parties to a complete determination of the issues in said actions, and the Circuit Court erred in holding the contrary.

The order of Judge Wallace, as already stated, was made upon the pleadings, the testimony taken by the referee not being read, nor requested to be read by either party. The questions raised then come before us as they came before Judge Wallace. Could he hear an appeal from the referee as to an intermediate order like the one under consideration before the whole report came in? Did it appear, from the pleadings, that Twitty and Connors were necessary parties to a complete determination of the issues raised therein? The first is a question of practice, under the code, and it involves the powers and duties of referees appointed by the court, and also the control over said referees reserved to the court after appointment.

We have no decided case upon the precise point raised here in our own reports—at least, we have found none, nor have the appellants referred us to any. There is a case, however, found in 53 Barbour [N. Y.] 532 (Ford v. Ford), where the practice pursued here, in substance, was adopted and sustained. In that case, after the case had been referred to a referee, the referee on the trial granted an order to the defendant to amend his answer by adding the defence of the statute of limitations. Previous to the final hearing of the cause, the plaintiff, on notice, applied to the court by motion to set aside the order of the referee, and for a direction that he proceed to hear and determine the case upon the issues referred to him. This motion was granted, the court saying: "That it was perfectly clear that the referee had not authority to make the order: * * * but it is insisted (says the court) that the plaintiffs have mistaken their remedy; that they cannot have relief by motion before verdict, but must except to the referee's ruling, and appeal to the general term after judgment. It is no doubt true that the order of the referee was subject to exception, and might doubtless be reversed on appeal from any judgment that might be entered on his report. But the plaintiffs were not restricted to that course of redress; they had the right to seek a more expeditious and less expensive mode. The special term, in my judgment, possesses the power to set aside any order made by a referee, in the progress of the cause, which he had not authority to make, and also to compel him to proceed to the trial of the issues referred to him for his determination. Such was, in substance, the decision of the court in Union Bank v. Mott (18 How. Pr. [N. Y.] 506), and in my judgment that ruling should be followed."

This case, it is true, is not authority with us, but it comes from a State where the code has prevailed longest, and its reasoning seems sound, and especially applicable in a case like that before the court, a case in chancery, where it is evident that the reference was made not for trial in the full sense of that term, but to give the court information as to the amount due on the notes in suit, and to report to the court upon the questions of law and fact arising on the pleadings. The code, it is true, provides a mode for reviewing the actings and doings of referees (§ 294), which may be adopted where the report has been made; but whether *this mode may also be adopted upon some intermediate order of the referee, and whether the order here is one of that character, it is not necessary for us now to determine, as we think the principle and practice pursued in the case of Ford v. Ford, supra, is proper here, the reference here being simply to compute the amount due, and to report on the questions of law and fact arising on the pleadings, and not for trial. Under that principle there was no necessity for the plaintiff to appeal; his remedy was a motion to set aside and vacate the order of the referee. This in substance he did do, although in form his notice and motion was presented as an appeal.

It is not intended to announce here that the actings and doings of a referee, as to all matters referred to him and properly under his jurisdiction, can be reviewed by the Circuit Court by piecemeal, and before the final report, nor that all intermediate orders of his can be at once reviewed, in advance of the final report. These questions must depend upon the application of section 294, to the case when made. They are not involved here, the question here being whether the Circuit Judge had jurisdiction in this case to hear the motion made before him in the absence of a report by the referee. We think he had such power whether the reference here was made by the Circuit Judge to aid him in reaching a conclusion, or as special master during the vacancy of the office of master under the recent act providing for said office in Lancaster and other counties; and, therefore, there was no error in hearing it.

Next, Does it appear from the pleadings that Twitty and Connors were necessary parties? We think not. The complaint was an ordinary complaint by plaintiffs claiming as assignees of Twitty and Connors of the notes and mortgages sued on, and we can see no necessity, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, why Twitty and Connors should be made parties. The plaintiffs claimed nothing from them, nor was their presence necessary as parties in order to enable the plaintiffs to enforce their rights against the defendant under the assignment. Nor do we see anything in the answer, or in the defences set up by the defendant, which required the presence of Twitty and Connors as parties defendant, to protect the other defendant. No doubt, their *presence was necessary as witnesses, but as parties we can see none.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The other Justices concurred in the result for the reason stated in a separate opinion herewith filed, as follows:

This action was pending in the County of Lancaster, and it seems that the provisions of the code as to the appointment of referees have been repealed so far as that county is concerned. See act of December 24, 1880, Gen. Stats., § 782. It does not appear whether a master has been appointed for Lancaster under the above provision. If so, and the reference had been to him, he would have had the power given by it, "to grant leave to amend pleadings and make new parties. * * * But all such orders shall be subject to the revision of the presiding judge at the next succeeding sitting of the court, or of the resident Circuit Judge, at chambers," &c. Gen. Stats., § 791. The reference in this case was not made to the master, but, by consent of parties, to D. A. Williams, clerk of the court, and as the office of referee and the practice of referring cases to referees as provided for in the code, no longer exists in the County of Lancaster, it seems to us, that in this case the clerk was not invested with the powers of a referee under the code, but that all his orders under the act were subject to the revision of the presiding judge, without an intermediate appeal in form, precisely as if the reference had been to a master. See the last judgment of this court in the case of Roberts v. Johns, 24 S. C., 580. For this reason we concur in the result.

Judgment affirmed.

YOE v. HANVEY.

(November Term, 1885.)

[Homestead ⚭ 141.]

Upon the petition of the widow of an intestate, a tract of land belonging to the intestate's estate was assigned to her as a homestead in 1879. She had no children of her own, but there were children of the intestate by a former marriage. These children being all of age, and none of them residing with the widow on this homestead, two of them instituted this action against the others and the widow for partition. Held, that the widow was entitled to retain this homestead during life, and that therefore the complaint was properly dismissed.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson concurred in the result, and Mr. Justice Melver dissented.

Before Cothran, J., Abbeville, June, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Samuel C. Cason, for appellant.

Mr. M. P. DeBruhl, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Edward Hanvey died intestate in 1877, leaving a widow, Sarah J. Hanvey, and the plaintiffs and other defendants, his children, who, with the widow, were his heirs at law. Sarah J. was a second wife and had no children of her own. The intestate was indebted and was seized and possessed of very little personal property and a small tract of land containing 150 acres and valued at $500. Soon after the death of the intestate, the widow, Sarah J., filed her petition for homestead, and on January 31, 1879, the entire tract of 150 acres, set down at the value of $500, was assigned to her as homestead, after publication of notice in the county paper as required by law. No other notice was given. All of the children of Edward Hanvey are of age, and none of them live with Sarah J. Hanvey. The probate judge, in the settlement of the estate of Edward Hanvey, stated that "various claims were presented, but this sum (namely, $126.48, which constitutes the personal estate) is to be divided among the medical accounts for last illness and funeral expenses." Those claims amounted to $214.

Two of the children of Edward Hanvey by his first wife, instituted this proceeding against the widow, Sarah J., for partition of the little tract of land which had been assigned to her as homestead. They claimed that as heirs at law of Edward Hanvey, *deceased, they were entitled to have partition of the same. The cause, by consent, was heard by Judge Cothran at chambers, who held, "That to partition the land now among the children of the intestate, Hanvey, would entirely deprive the widow of all interest in it (as the act allowing partition of homestead is limited expressly to 'the children of the head of the family'). The time for partition has not come. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the complaint be dismissed," &c.

From this decree the children of Edward Hanvey appeal to this court, on the ground. "That his honor erred in holding that the land described in the complaint was not now subject to partition among the parties to this suit, but that the said Sarah J. Hanvey had the right to hold the same as a homestead against the other heirs during her life."

Appellants' counsel is perfectly correct in saying that there has been some want of clearness and consistency in relation to the multitudinous points, arising in different forms out of the question of homestead. It is comparatively a new subject, as to which the laws, not always consistent with each other or the constitution, have been frequently changed; and the right itself, being in its nature somewhat peculiar, is, in some of its aspects, not at all free from difficulty. This is shown by the fact that the provisions of law in the different States, and the decisions of the different courts upon the subject, are not at all in accord. We may, however, take it as settled in this State, that homestead creates no new estate; that neither the constitution nor the laws in conformity to it, undertake to do the impossible thing, of taking property from one and giving it to another. On the contrary, homestead is not, and cannot be, anything more than an exemption, under certain circumstances, of specified property from sale by creditors, for a particular purpose of policy and humanity.

The facts of this case do not require us to consider whether the exemption from creditors allowed, is, or was intended to be, temporary merely—lasting only, like dower, as long as the particular state of facts exist which called it into existence; or is unlimited and permanent in its nature, authorizing an absolute sale or partition in fee of the property so exempted. See Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 S. C., 138.

*In the case at bar the homestead was not assigned to the debtor, Edward Hanvey, in his life time, thereby giving rise, after his death, to questions between the widow and children under the assignment to the husband and father. But after his death it was assigned to his widow, Sarah J., in 1879. This was before the late amendment of the constitution in relation to homestead (1880), and therefore the assignment must have been made under section 4 of the act of 1873, 15 Stat., 371. But that section was re-enacted verbatim, in the General Statutes of 1882, section 1997, which is as follows: "If the husband be dead, the widow and children, if the father and mother be dead, the children living on the homestead, whether any or all of such children be minors or not, shall be entitled to have the family homestead exempted in like manner as if the husband or parents were living; and the homestead so exempted shall be subject to partition among all the children of the head of the family in like manner as if no debts existed: provided, that no partition or sale in that case shall be made until the youngest child becomes of age, unless, upon proof satisfactory to the court hearing the case, such sale is deemed best for the interest of such minor or minors," &c.

Although the assignment of homestead under this act to Mrs. Hanvey exempted the premises from the debts of her deceased husband, Edward Hanvey, it was, to all intents and purposes the homestead of the widow, Sarah J., as the then head of the family, whether any of her step-children did or did not live with her, or indeed, whether she or her husband ever had any children. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C., 227, and 17 Id., 9; Moore v. Parker, 13 Id., 486. If Edward Hanvey had left no widow, it may well be doubted whether his children, none of whom were minors, or "living on the homestead," could have claimed the exemption in his lands against his debts. At all events, the widow alone applied and the homestead was set off to her as the head of the family, taking the place of her husband. But for the interposition and establishment of her claim, the creditors probably would have sold the land for their debts; and it seems to us that it would really be a strange result if the homestead, which could only be exempted in favor of the widow, *could after exemption be destroyed by others through a sale or partition of it.

We agree with the Circuit Judge that the adult children of Edward Hanvey have no right to partition at this time the land assigned as homestead to the widow; that the widow is entitled to enjoy it like dower during her life and at her death a new question may possibly arise, as to whether it then goes to the unpaid creditors of Edward Hanvey, or may be partitioned among his heirs, as to which we give no opinion.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred in the result.

Mr. Justice MELVER, dissenting. I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court, because it appears to me to be in conflict with the principles upon which at least three of the former decisions of this court rest, viz., Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C., 242; Ex parte Ray, 20 Id., 246; and Chalmers v. Turnipseed, 21 Id., 136; and not in accordance with the proper construction of the homestead law. The intestate having died in 1877, the rights of his heirs then vested, and the question involved in this case must be determined by the law then of force. It is conceded that the 4th section of the act of 1873 (15 Stat., 371) furnishes us with the law, and it reads as follows: "If the husband be dead, the widow and children, if the father and mother be dead, the children living on the homestead, whether any or all such children be minors or not, shall be entitled to have the family homestead exempted in like manner as if the husband or parents were living; and the homestead so exempted shall be subject to partition among all the children of the head of the family in like manner as if no debts existed: provided, that no partition or sale in that case shall be made until the youngest child becomes of age, unless, upon proof satisfactory to the court hearing the case such sale is deemed best for the interests of such minor or minors."

Now, it will be observed that this section contains no restriction upon the general right to partition except in the single instance of there being minor children interested, and then the right to *have partition made is only postponed "until the youngest child becomes of age." But as there are no minor children in this case, I can find nothing in the law which in any way interferes with or postpones the ordinary right which the heirs of the intestate have to demand partition of his real estate. It having been determined in the cases above cited, that the homestead laws do not create any new estate, and certainly do not undertake to divest any previous estate, and that they were not designed "to alter or in any way affect the statute for the distribution of intestates' estates," it seems to me to follow necessarily that when Edward Hanvey died intestate, the title to his real estate immediately descended to and vested in his heirs at law, charged only with a liability for the payment of his debts; and that when relieved of this charge, as it has been by the homestead law, it became subject to partition just as if there had been no debts, there being, as we have seen, no provision in the homestead law which would defeat, or even postpone, this right to partition.

It does not seem to me that the mere fact that the widow, and the widow only, could invoke the protection afforded by the homestead laws, should affect the question in this case. The only obstacle to the right of the heirs to demand partition being the liability of the land to be subjected to the payment of the debts of their ancestor, whenever that obstacle was removed, no matter by whose agency, the real estate of the intestate became at once subject to partition amongst his heirs at law, of whom the widow was one, under the provisions of the act of 1791, in the absence of any legislation modifying or postponing such right to partition. The homestead laws operate simply as a shield to protect the exempted property from the grasp of creditors, leaving the title to such property, with all its incidents, just where it was before such shield was interposed.

It seems to me, therefore, that until the legislature sees fit to modify or postpone the right of partition secured to the heirs of an intestate under the laws, as I understand them now to be written, the right to demand partition of real estate exempted from the payment of debts under the homestead law cannot be denied.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson concurred in the result, and also Mr. Justice McIver upon the ground of laches.

Before Fraser, J., Colleton, February, 1885.
The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. Perry Murphy, for appellant.
Messrs. Edwards & Tracy, contra.

July 6, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On January 10, 1876, W. A. Paul, the then auditor of Colleton County, drew an order on the county commissioners of that county as follows: "To County Commissioners—Gentlemen: You will please pay to W. F. Myers, or order, the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars for clerical services rendered in this office from July 1, to November 20, 1875. The same to be paid out of funds appropriated for this office. Very respectfully, (Signed), W. A. Paul, county ty *auditor." This order was indorsed:

"February 4, 1876. Examined and approved. (Signed), Frank Youngblood, W. M. Shuler, Wm. A. Drille, chairman, county commissioners."

During the same year payments were made, aggregating $170, leaving a balance unpaid in the summer of 1877 of $180, when the claim was rejected by a "commission" appointed for Colleton County by the governor, under an act of the legislature entitled "An act to investigate and ascertain the actual bona fide indebtedness of the various counties in the State, and to regulate the manner of paying the same," 16 Stat., 311. It seems that at that time the claim went out of the list of county debts, and since then every board of county commissioners for Colleton County has refused to pay the claim as illegal and void. In 1883, another effort was made to ascertain all just claims against the County of Colleton. W. P. Howell, Esq., was appointed referee as to all disputed county claims, and this claim being submitted to him he rejected it, and refused to re-instate it in the list of the unpaid indebtedness of the county, on the ground that "the claim was for clerical services rendered in the county auditor's office. The A. A. of 1871 (Gen. Stat. of 1872, p. 78) provided for the payment of 'assistant assessors,' to enable the auditors to complete the assessment within the time provided by law. Even if Myers was an 'assessor,' he has been paid more than the amount he would have received as such. (Signed) W. P. Howell, referee."

After this, on September 24, 1884, application was made for a writ of mandamus, requiring the defendants, the present county commissioners of Colleton County, to pay the balance of said claim. The commissioners answered, denying the right of the petitioner to have the writ of mandamus upon various grounds, and among them, that the claim is wholly null and void, the services therein charged for not being allowed by law, or verified or itemized as required; that the claim had been rejected by the "commission" appointed by the governor, under the act of the legislature aforesaid, and by every subsequent board of county commissioners; "that the respondents are advised that it appears by reference to the records in the county auditor's office that more than one thousand dollars has already been paid for assistant assessors for the fiscal year against which said claim is charged;" *and denying that it is the plain legal duty of the respondents to pay said claim in preference to other claims, or to pro rate the claims against the county. This return was not traversed, and the facts stated must be taken to be true.

Judge Fraser granted the writ of mandamus, and the county commissioners appeal to this court, upon the following grounds: "1. Because it was not the plain legal duty of the county commissioners to pay the relator's claim. 2. Because the relator, having submitted the bona fides of his claim to the board of county commissioners, appeal and not mandamus was the remedy. 3. Because the services charged for in relator's claim, to wit, county auditor's clerk, is not a proper charge against the county. The claim is null and void, and payment should not be compelled by mandamus."

Mandamus is a high prerogative writ—the highest known to the law—and according to all the authorities, only issues when there is a specific legal right or a positive duty to be performed, and when there is no other appropriate remedy. When the legal right is doubtful or the performance of the duty rests in discretion or there is other adequate remedy, the writ of mandamus cannot rightfully issue. Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C., 322. Has the relator, Myers, a specific legal right, clear and beyond doubt, to require the present board of county commissioners to cause to be paid the balance of his claim as a plain ministerial duty resting upon them?

For obvious reasons the law is very particular in its requirements that the county commissioners shall audit none but strictly county claims; and that all accounts for labor performed, fees, services, and disbursements, &c., shall be made out in items, and be accompanied with an affidavit of a particular character, and that no allowance beyond legal claims shall ever be made. There can hardly be a doubt that this claim was not properly audited. There was no itemized account, but simply a written order of the auditor that the commissioners should pay the relator his check, $350, "for clerical services rendered in his office from July 1st, to November 20th, 1875;" upon which order the commissioners simply made the endorsement, "examined and approved." This was not such an examination as is required by the word "audit." *Nor do we think that this is one of those cases in which it should be presumed that the officers did their duty, for the requirement of the law is positive, and there is no room for "presumption" as their action in the matter actually appears.

But this is not a proceeding to set aside the alleged audit, and, assuming that the claim was of such a character as to require the exercise of discretion and judgment on the part of the commissioners in making their audit, then their approval, although possibly irregular and erroneous, was quasi judicial and originally binding upon the county until set aside on the ground of mistake or fraud. Richland County v. Miller, Clerk of Commissioners, 16 S. C. 236. It does not, however, necessarily follow that the relator may at any future time or under any and all circumstances, have the writ of mandamus to enforce payment of his claim. "In such proceeding (mandamus) the de-defendant may excuse himself by showing that the relator on his own showing is not entitled to the writ, or by traversing some material fact alleged, or by alleging fresh matter as an answer to the prosecutor's case." 2 R. & L. Law Dict., title Mandamus.

We do not think that the rejection of this claim by the "commission" appointed by the governor, under the "Act to investigate and ascertain the actual bona fide indebtedness of the several counties of the State, and to regulate the manner of paying the same" (16 Stat., 311), should be regarded as a conclusive adjudication of the illegality of the claim. In the case of Wheeler v. County of Newberry (18 S. C., 132), this court held that "the act of 1877 (16 Stat., 311), authorizing the appointment of a commission to ascertain the indebtedness of the several counties of the State, did not constitute such a commission a court; and therefore an adjudication by it, upon a claim against the county, not submitted to it by the claimant, is no bar to a subsequent action upon the claim." &c.

But it seems that in 1883, the relator and the then county commissioners made some arrangement by which this claim, along with other disputed or rejected county claims, was referred to M. P. Howell, Esq., as referee, and that he having decided that it was not a valid bona fide claim against the county, refused to restore it to the list of the unpaid indebtedness of the county. *The respondents claim that this was certainly a final decision and end of the matter, and that after and in the face of this second rejection, it would not be "their plain duty" to pay the same. The relator admits that under the advice of his counsel he submitted his claim to the referee, but insists that in so doing he reserved all his legal rights, and therefore he is not bound by the decision. He says, "that being delighted to secure his just dues, this claim has been (by advice of counsel and without prejudice to his legal rights) examined by M. P. Howell, Esq., a referee appointed by a subsequent board of county commissioners, and was by him rejected," &c.

It does not very clearly appear what were the precise terms of the reference, but we confess we do not see how the matter could be referred by consent, with the reservation claimed. That could hardly be called "a reference," which was to have no effect whatever, unless the decision was favorable. It seems to us that this voluntary reference was in the nature of a submission to arbitration, and that the parties were bound by the result. The reference to Mr. Howell was not to him as referee under the code, for no cause was pending between the parties. They, however, had a dispute, and they selected an indifferent person as the judge between them. "An arbitrator is a disinterested person to whose judgment or decision matters in dispute are submitted by consent of parties." 3 Black. Com., 16. "Arbitration by consent is effected by a submission. If no action has been commenced concerning the matter in dispute, the submission takes the form of an agreement, called an agreement of submission. * * * An award is conclusive and binding on the parties unless set aside, or the matter is referred back to the arbitrators for re-consideration." &c. 1 R. & L. Law Dict., 103. "As between the parties the award of the arbitrator is the law of the case, and must be regarded as final and conclusive." Mitchell v. De Schamps, 13 Rich. Eq., 9.

But if in this there should be error, it is manifestly the policy of the law, in reference to the administration of county affairs, to keep separate and distinct the accounts of each fiscal year, chargeable as they are upon the levy for that year; and to that end great promptness is necessary in the presentation and settle*ment of county claims. Indeed, a recent act of the legislature (1882) declares that "all claims against a county, not presented in the fiscal year in which they are contracted, or the next thereafter, shall be forever barred." In this case the application for the writ of mandamus was not made until September, 1884, nearly nine years after the old board of commissioners endorsed the order of relator, eight years after the last payment thereon, and more than six years after its rejection by the "commission," and formal notice of refusal to pay it. Under these circumstances the respondents insist that "eight years having elapsed since the claim was declared invalid and not a part of the bona fide indebtedness of Colleton Comty, the relator has lost his right to the writ by his laches." The relator insists that there has been no laches on his part as shown by the fact that he has not slept over his rights; but during the whole period indicated continued to demand payment of his claim.

We do not understand that the question is in any way affected by protests, duns, and demands, short of the assertion of a legal right. The question is not whether the relator continued to make the claim, but whether during that time he failed to assert in the proper manner his legal rights. In this respect we are unable to distinguish this case from that of The State ex rel. Cummings v. Kirby (17 S. C., 564), in which it was said in regard to a state of facts precisely analogous: "There is no special limitation to a proceeding by mandamus, and the statute of limitations does not apply to such a proceeding. The rule, however, is that where there is unreasonable delay the court will, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to issue the writ (citing the authorities). * * * It is a mistake to suppose, as was argued, that there was a continuing admission of the validity of these claims on the part of the county commissioners, by placing them on the list of the past indebtedness of the county, for that allegation is distinctly denied in the return, which is not traversed. So, too, the return alleges that those claims were decided to be illegal as far back as 1875 (1877), and since that time payment of the same has been frequently refused. We are unable to discover any sufficient, or indeed any reason at all, for this extraordinary laches on the part of the relator, and there*fore in the exercise of that discretion to which such an application appeals, we feel bound to refuse the writ prayed for, especially as the return, which is not traversed, and which therefore must be taken to be true, points out manifest errors in the accounts upon which these claims are founded," &c.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the application for a writ of mandamus refused.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred in the result; and Mr. Justice McIVER concurred upon the ground of the relator's laches in invoking his appropriate legal remedy.¹

Ex parte JOHNSON.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Descent and Distribution ⇨70, 72.]

A compromise agreed to by plaintiff in full discharge of all her interest in her father's estate approved by a judgment of the Circuit Court, included and released a fund derived and held by one of the executors as trustee for her under her father's will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Release, Cent. Dig. § 81; Descent and Distribution, Dec. Dig. ⇨70, 72.]

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, December, 1885.

This appeal was heard only by Mr. Justice McIVER and Judge HUDSON, acting associate justice, the other two justices of this court having been of counsel in the cause. The opinion of this court, and the statement of the case in [Dickerson v. Smith] 17 S. C., 289, are sufficient for a proper understanding of the point involved in this appeal.

Mr. George Westmoreland, for appellant. Messrs. Holmes & Simpson and Ball & Watts, contra.

May 19, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice HUDSON. The cause in which the aforesaid petition is filed, came, before this court on appeal at the November term, A. D. 1881, and the judgment then rendered is *reported in 17 S. C., pp. 289-313. Pursuant to that judgment the Circuit Court for the County of Laurens, September 25, 1882, by an appropriate order, made the judgment of this court the judgment of the Circuit Court, and referred it to C. D. Barksdale, master, "to state the accounts of the executors of the last will and testament of John Smith, deceased testator, for the purpose of carrying into effect the judgment of the Supreme Court," &c.

At a subsequent date, the present petitioner, Henry S. Johnson, was appointed trustee of the estate of Lucy W. Dickerson arising under the will of her father, John Smith, in the place of the former trustee, W. T. Smith, who was relieved of the trust. All the parties necessary to the determination of the controversy concerning the rights, interest, and estate of Mrs. Lucy W. Dickerson, and her children, having been thus brought before the Circuit Court, the master was ready to proceed with the reference. The object of the original action was to recover of the executors of John Smith's will, and of the trustee of the portion of Mrs. Dickerson and her children, all the estate devised and bequeathed to them by said will. The purpose of the reference to the master was to ascertain this entire interest under the principles laid down in the aforesaid judgment of this court.

The reference promised to involve a tedious accounting, the result of which was reasonably uncertain. In this attitude of the litigation, the parties agreed upon a settlement by way of compromise, the terms of which were that W. T. Smith and John E. Smith, executors, should pay to the trustee of Mrs. Dickerson and children the sum of eighteen thousand dollars "in full for their interest in the estate of John Smith," by a day stated, and should pay also the costs of the action, with a proviso, that the settlement should be sanctioned and approved by the Circuit Court. On due report of this compromise it was approved by the court, and its terms fulfilled and performed by the said executors, one of whom, W. T. Smith, was former trustee of the share of Mrs. Dickerson and children.

After this compromise settlement had been thus fulfilled, the present trustee, Henry S. Johnson, filed his petition in said original cause in which he seeks to recover of the former trustee, W. T. Smith, seventeen hundred dollars of Georgia Railroad and Banking Company stock, which he alleges was in his hands as the property of said beneficiaries, and was not included in the agreement of compromise. This is resisted by the said executors, and upon a hearing on Circuit, that court adjudged that this stock was covered by the agreement, and dismissed the petition. The trustee, Henry S. Johnson, has appealed to this court to reverse said judgment.

We concur with the Circuit Judge in holding, that the eighteen thousand dollars is expressed to be "in full" of the share of Mrs. Dickerson and children in the estate of John Smith, deceased, and that there is no reservation of a right to make any additional demand of the executors or of the trustee, W. T. Smith. The compromise was in full of their entire share in said estate, and necessarily included whatever was in the hands of W. T. Smith, trustee, as well as what was in the hands of W. T. Smith and John E. Smith, as executors. The demand of the trustee, Henry S. Johnson, is in violation of the compromise, and was properly refused by the Circuit Court.

Wherefore it is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

25 S. C. 108

Ex parte SMITH.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Appeal and Error ⚡S33.]

This was an application to restore to the docket of this court the case of Dickerson v. Smith (17 S. C., 289), and to have the same re-considered so far as it affected the interests of petitioner. But the petitioner having given no notice of appeal in that case, having joined in one of the exceptions then considered, and having taken no steps to bring his present claim to the attention of the court before the remittitur was sent down, his petition was refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3232; Dec. Dig. ⚡S33.]

In this case Judges HUDSON and FRASER sat in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. F. P. McGowan and Geo. Westmoreland, for petitioner.

*Messrs. Holmes & Simpson and B. W. Ball, contra.

May 31, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. This is an application to restore the above stated case to the docket of this court, and "that this court re-consider the said case so far as it relates to the interest of Basil H. Smith." The judgment of this court, a re-consideration of which is here asked for, will be found 17 S. C., 289.

It appears from the case as reported, the brief used in that case at the hearing, and now on file with the records of this court, and other papers used at the hearing of this application, that Basil H. Smith, the petitioner in this application, was one of the defendants in the cause; that the Circuit decree was filed February 27, 1881; that notice of the filing of the Circuit decree was served on some of the counsel on January 31, 1881, and on the others February 8, 1881; that notice of intention to appeal was served on the part of plaintiffs on February 5, 1881; that no notice of intention to appeal has been given by the petitioner, Basil H. Smith, who was one of the defendants; that on due application an order was made extending the time for making up the case and exceptions; that the exceptions on the part of plaintiffs were thereupon served March 31, 1881; that in one of these exceptions Basil H. Smith claimed to have joined, and it is stated as follows: "As to the settlement of the personal estate (and in these exceptions the defendant, Basil H. Smith, joins with the plaintiffs)." The case as prepared for the hearing in the Supreme Court was consented to by all the counsel in the case and contained the above stated exception. The judgment of the Supreme Court was rendered on the appeal and the remittitur has been duly filed with the clerk of the Circuit Court. In the judgment of the Supreme Court there is no order either affirming, reversing, or modifying the judgment of the Circuit Court as to Basil H. Smith.

There has never been any notice of appeal, or of an intention to appeal, on the part of Basil H. Smith, and unless there had been such notice within the ten days required, as allowed by law, the right of appeal will be lost. It is not necessary here to consider whether there may not be in any case a waiver of the failure *to serve the notice in time, either by express agreement or by not making it a ground of a motion to dismiss the appeal. Whenever, before the final judgment of this court, it is brought to its notice that the notice of appeal has not been given and has not been waived, the fundamental jurisdictional fact is wanting to give this court control over the case, and the appeal must be dismissed.

The appellant may put into his grounds of appeal whatever pleases him, and the respondent is without any remedy to prevent it. He can only submit his rights to the court on the hearing, and he is in no way estopped by anything contained therein. Basil H. Smith was not before the court as an appellant, and it is the proper and natural result from that fact that the Supreme Court should, as it has done, make no order in reference to his interest in the matters under litigation in the cause. If, however, it is assumed that Basil H. Smith was properly before the court as an appellant, he is concluded by the judgment of the court, just as much as he would have been if he had been named and an express order made in reference to his interests.

Out of abundant caution, this court has adopted a rule allowing ten days after its judgment is filed with the clerk before a remittitur is sent down to the Circuit Court, in order that parties may file a petition for a re-hearing, and even a provision for staying the remittitur for this purpose. If the petitioner had any interests which were overlooked by this court, it is his misfortune that he has failed to move in the matter until now, when this court has no right to re-open the case.

It is, therefore, ordered that the motion be dismissed.

*Messrs. Townsend & McLaurin, for appellant.

No counsel contra.

June 17, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The appellant was convicted of bastardy and judgment was rendered "that the said defendant, Addison E. Quick, be committed to prison, to wit, to the county jail of Marlboro, there to remain until he shall enter into recognizance, with two good and sufficient sureties, in the penal sum of three hundred dollars conditioned for the annual payment of the sum of twenty-five dollars, for the maintenance of the said child till it reaches the age of twelve years, and so save harmless the said county aforesaid, and that the said recognizance be made payable in annual instalments, beginning with September 4, 1885, the day said child was born, and in default of defendant giving said recognizance, that execution for the said amount and for the costs do issue against the property of the said defendant, as in case of defendants convicted of misdemeanor."

From this judgment defendant appeals substantially upon the ground that the Circuit Judge erred in imposing the punishment of imprisonment in default of defendant entering into recognizance for the support of the child. The authorities cited by the counsel for appellant (General Statutes, section 1582, and State v. Glenn, 14 S. C., 134) fully sustain the ground taken by him. We are not aware of any statute, and none has been brought to our notice, which authorizes the imposition of punishment by imprisonment upon a person convicted of bastardy. On the contrary, the statute above cited expressly provides that a person convicted of this offence "shall be required to give the security or recognizance hereinbefore required, and in default thereof shall be liable to execution as are defendants convicted of misdemeanors."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it requires the appellant to be imprisoned until he shall enter into the required recognizance for the maintenance of the child, be reversed.

Before Aldrich, J., Sumter, October, 1885. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, for appellants.

Messrs. Haynsworth & Cooper and H. Frank Wilson, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Separate judgments were obtained by the testators of the plaintiffs on January 22, 1870, in the Court of Common Pleas for Sumter County against one John J. Shaw, ancestor of the defendants, in each of which was included attorneys' costs for the plaintiff, E. W. Moise. These judgments were upon demands which antedated the constitution of 1868.

Executions were issued, but no further steps taken for the collection of the debts. At that time the debtor, John J. Shaw, was in possession as owner of a certain tract of land, containing some two hundred and twenty-five acres, located in Sumter County, upon which it is alleged that these judgments had a valid and subsisting lien.

On November 26, 1873, John J. Shaw was upon his own petition adjudged a bankrupt; among the debts included in his schedule were these judgments. In 1875 he was discharged from all debts due by him on the said November 26, 1873. The tract of land above mentioned, of which he was in possession, was in some way excepted from the operation of the bankrupt proceedings by some claim of exemption made under the laws of the State. The above judgments were not proved in the bankrupt court, nor did the plaintiffs receive any dividend from the bankrupt assets. John J. Shaw died in 1878 intestate, leaving the defendants his heirs at law, who are in the possession of the above mentioned tract of land as said heirs.

Under this state of facts the action below was instituted on the equity side of the court in which the plaintiffs demanded judgment. 1st. That the lien creditors of the said John J. Shaw be called in; and 2d. That the said lands be sold and the proceeds be applied to the payment of said judgments, &c. His honor, Judge Aldrich, who heard the case, dismissed the complaint with costs, on the ground that plaintiffs having failed to enforce their judgments, while of active energy with lien on the land in question, and having failed to apply to the bankrupt court for relief during the bankrupt proceeding and before the bankrupt's final discharge, and having adequate remedy at law at one time, which had been lost by the laches and neglect of the plaintiffs, "there was now no equitable ground for the interference of the court."

The plaintiffs have appealed upon several exceptions, all of which, however, may be reduced into the single question, whether under the facts of the case it was error to deny the plaintiffs the equitable relief demanded? The decision of this question, in our judgment, has rendered the consideration of the other questions raised unnecessary. In giving the reasons, therefore, for our judgment, we will confine ourselves to the question, whether or not the facts of the case warranted the court on its equity side to take jurisdiction.

We remark, in the first place, that the destruction of the old Court of Equity and the combination of equity and common law principles within the jurisdiction of the same court, to wit, the Court of Common Pleas, has by no means extended or enlarged the class of cases in which equity principles may be administered. It is true that the mode of reaching the court and of invoking its aid has been materially changed by the code, but this change has not given rise to any new equity rights different from those formerly existing. On the contrary, these remain as before, and a party seeking the aid of the Court of Common Pleas now, on its equity side, must come in with a case over which the old Court of Equity would have had jurisdiction in former times, or he will fail. So that, to test a question of jurisdiction now in a given case, we have only to inquire whether the old court could have heard it. Let us apply this test to the case before us.

We find in the heading to the first chapter in Judge Story's Equity Jurisprudence the following expression: "Courts of Equity afford relief in regard to those rights, recognized by the jurisprudence of the State, where the remedy at law is doubtful, inadequate, or incomplete." And again, at section 33 of the same chapter, this eminent author condenses in a few words the foundation of equity jurisprudence, as understood and administered in the English and American courts, where he says: "Perhaps the most general, if not the most precise, description of a Court of Equity, in the English and American sense, is that it has jurisdiction in cases of rights recognized and protected by the municipal jurisprudence, where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy cannot be had in the courts of common law." Under the old courts, then, two things were necessary to give them jurisdiction, to wit, a recognized right, one entitled to protection in the party seeking their aid, and the absence of power in the common law courts to give adequate and complete relief.

Were these two things present below in the case as presented in the pleadings? The plaintiffs sought by their action to have certain lands in the possession of the defendants sold and the proceeds applied to their judgments. Now, did they have a recognized right, either legal or equitable, to have these lands sold at the time their action was instituted? And, if so, was there no adequate remedy to this end existing at law? These two conditions must appear, or the action has no foundation in equity. Do they exist here? In a general sense every creditor has the right to make his claim out of the property of his debtor if necessary; that is, he has the right to reduce his claim to judgment, and by execution issued thereon make his money by sale of the debtor's property.

*But this is not the right sought to be enforced here. The plaintiffs' claims have already been established and reduced to judgment, with the right to issue execution thereon, and they are not now seeking new judgments with the accompanying right to issue execution thereon, but they are seeking to sell the debtor's land by a direct order from the court. Have they any such right? While, as we have said, a creditor in a general sense has the right to enforce his claim against the property of his debtor, or other wrong-doer, yet this can be done only through certain established forms and modes of procedure. For instance, it may be done by a direct order of the Court of Equity, if necessary, in all those classes of cases over which that court has acknowledged jurisdiction, such as trusts, frauds, mistakes, &c., creditors' bills, the sale of real estate in aid of personality, and the marshalling of assets in the estates of decedents, &c., or it may be done in a law court by means of judgment obtained and execution thereon.

It is not pretended that the right claimed here belongs to any of those cases mentioned above as of acknowledged equity jurisdiction. Does it belong to the last class? Have the plaintiffs the right to sell the land in question under their judgment, and are they seeking the aid of equity jurisdiction to enforce said sale because no adequate and complete means at law exist to that end? No, they have no such right. True, they once had it, but it has been lost, and they are seeking the aid of equity because of the fact of this loss. In other words, they are asking equity to reinstate their right, and then to enforce it, not by execution, but by a direct and independent order of sale. We know of no authority or established equity doctrine by which this can be done. We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge was right in dismissing the complaint on the ground stated above.

And even if the case, as above, was doubtful, we think the case of Williamson v. King (McNull. Eq., 41) would be conclusive against the appellants. In that case it was said: "When a party has once had a plain and adequate remedy at law, which he has lost by his own laches, it may well be doubted whether this court will aid him with another remedy, of which he might have availed himself in the ordinary forum had he acted promptly."

*Here the plaintiffs once had a legal right to sell Shaw's land, with a plain, adequate, and complete remedy for the enforcement of this right. This state of things existed for several years. The plaintiffs failed to act, and by this failure their right was lost. Under such circumstances we do not see that equity can aid them.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. ⇨78.]

Before Hudson, J., Sumter, February, 1885. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, for appellants.

June 17, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. About the 1st of March, 1882, the defendants, appellants, became the agents of the plaintiffs, respondents, for the sale of "Robson's C. & C. Fertilizer," under instructions to sell at $37.50 per ton in cash, and $47.50, or 475 lbs. of middling cotton, per ton, including freight, to be paid on the first day of November, 1882, all deferred payments to be secured by agricultural liens on the crops of the purchasers for the year 1882, and duly filed in the property office according to law. Under this agency the defendants received one hundred and ten tons of said fertilizer, which it is alleged in the complaint they sold or otherwise disposed of, accounting for six tons sold for cash, for twenty-one and 5-8 tons sold for cotton, and delivering to the plaintiffs agricultural liens for twenty-four and one-fourth tons thereof, leaving fifty-eight and one-eighth tons unaccounted for. The action below was brought to recover the value of said 58 1-8 tons, which is alleged in the complaint to be worth $2,470.31, and for which the plaintiffs prayed judgment, the defendants having failed and refused to account therefor.

At the trial the defendants requested the presiding judge (his honor, Judge Hudson) to charge: "That if the jury believed that the defendants did not take or file liens in all cases, yet the plaintiffs can only recover such sum as may be shown to result in loss from the failure to take liens and record them, and this cannot be guessed at by the jury, but the plaintiffs must prove what damage resulted from such failure. The jury must have some proof that the taking and recording liens would have saved the plaintiffs from loss." His honor declined to charge as requested, and instead thereof charged as follows: "That if the jury concluded that the defendants were agents, with authority to sell on credit only in cases where they should secure payment by note and lien duly recorded, and that they failed to take liens of purchasers and record the same; and if they further find that the plaintiffs have lost a certain number of tons in hands of the defendants, for which the defendants have not accounted, then the burden of proof is cast upon the defendants to show what has become of the unaccounted guano, and that the same has not been lost through their neglect or fault; in other words, they must show that they have not been at fault, but have complied with the terms of the agency," &c.

The appeal involves the correctness of the rulings of the judge, both as to the charge, and his refusal to charge defendants' request, and also his refusal to sustain an oral demurrer of the defendants, "that the facts stated in the complaint were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action;" and further, that his honor refused to grant a new trial.

As to the demurrer. Although the refusal to sustain it is *made a ground of exception, yet this exception has not been pressed or urged in the argument, and we suppose that it was abandoned by the appellants. Be this, however, as it may, we have considered the exception, and find nothing in it. If the allegations of the complaint be true, they certainly constitute a cause of action. An agency is alleged, and the receipt by the agents of a certain number of tons of "Robson's C. & C. Fertilizer," for a portion of which it is alleged that said agents have failed and refuse to account. What more was necessary to constitute a cause of action, we cannot see.

The main point, however, upon which the appellants rely, is the fact that his honor declined to charge, that it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prove damage resulting from the failure of the defendants to take and record agricultural liens in the sales of the unaccounted guano, and that the taking and recording said liens would have saved the plaintiffs from loss. It seems to us that the defendants, in raising this exception, have misconceived the gist and scope of plaintiffs' action. They seem to regard it as simply an action for the breach of an agreement on the part of the defendants to take and have recorded agricultural liens in such sales as they might make on a credit. If this was the cause of plaintiffs' action, and nothing more, then defendants' position would doubtless be correct. Because then it would have been incumbent upon the plaintiffs to prove the agreement, its breach, and that damage had resulted from said breach, as appears from the authorities cited and relied on by the appellants.

But plaintiffs' action was not founded upon, nor limited to, an agreement of the kind suggested. It is true that it was a part of the instructions under which the appellants undertook the agency, that all deferred payments were to be secured by agricultural liens on the crops of the purchasers for the year 1882, and duly filed in the proper office according to law, and a failure to observe this instruction, resulting in damage to the plaintiffs, would have been actionable; but the plaintiffs do not complain of such failure as the cause of action. They allege that defendants received one hundred and ten tons of their fertilizer, to be sold under the instructions mentioned; that all of said fertilizer had been properly accounted for except 58 1-8 tons, which had *not been accounted for, and which the defendants had refused to account for, the same being reasonably worth $2,476.31.

The Circuit Judge, instead of confining the case to the question whether the loss to the plaintiffs had resulted from the failure on the part of the defendants to take and record agricultural liens, with the burden of proof on the plaintiffs, instructed the jury, "that if they found that the plaintiffs had lost a certain number of tons in the hands of the defendants, for which the defendants had not accounted, then the burden was cast upon the defendants to show what had become of the unaccounted for guano, and that the same had not been lost through their neglect or fault; in other words, they should show that they had not been at fault, but had complied with the terms of the agency." Regarding the action as an action for the value of the unaccounted for guano, which the plaintiffs alleged had been lost in the hands of the defendants, there was no error in the charge of the judge.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

Before Fraser, J., Georgetown, May, 1885.
The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker and Walter Hazard, for plaintiff.

Mr. R. Dozier, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, given to secure the payment of an ordinary money bond, the plaintiff claiming to be the owner and holder thereof, by various successive assignments from the original obligee and mortgagee. Upon hearing the pleadings it was referred to a referee "to inquire into the facts set forth therein and to report the testimony to this court." The case came on for a hearing before Judge Fraser on the pleadings and testimony taken by the referee, and he, after suggesting several difficulties and doubts as to the sufficiency of the testimony adduced to establish the several assignments through which the plaintiff claimed, but without deciding definitely any of the points suggested, declined to proceed to a consideration of the merits of the case, or to determine any of the issues in the action, and passed an order recommitting the case to the special referee, in which he directed that the referee "do take and report to this court such further testimony in reference to the various assignments as may be produced before him in the manner provided by law, by the plaintiff or defendant in this case."

From this order both parties appeal—the plaintiff, substantially, upon the ground that the testimony reported by the referee was sufficient to establish his case, and that the Circuit Judge erred in declining to render judgment of foreclosure as prayed for in the complaint; the defendant upon the ground, substantially, that the testimony reported by the referee was insufficient in law to establish the plaintiff's right to the bond and mortgage, and therefore the defendant was entitled to a judgment dismissing the complaint, and the Circuit Judge erred in declining to render such judgment.

Before this court can enter upon any discussion or render any decision upon the points raised by the several grounds of appeal, we must first determine a preliminary question, which meets us at the very threshold, and that is whether we now have jurisdiction of such points. This depends upon the inquiry whether the order complained of is appealable. Section 11 of the Code of Procedure declares what shall be reviewable by appeal *to the Supreme Court, as follows:

"1. Any intermediate judgment, order or decree, involving the merits in actions commenced in the Courts of Common Pleas and General Sessions, brought there by original process, or removed there from any inferior courts or jurisdiction, and final judgments in such actions. * * * 2. An order affecting a substantial right made in an action, when such order, in effect, determines the action, and prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, or discontinues the action, and when such order grants or refuses a new trial; or when such order strikes out an answer, or any part thereof, or any pleading in an action. * * * 3. A final order affecting a substantial right made in a special proceeding, or upon a summary application, in an action after judgment."

It is quite clear that the order of Judge Fraser does not fall under subdivision 3 of the section just quoted; and we think it equally clear that it does not fall under subdivision 2. For to bring it under that subdivision it must be not only an order "affecting a substantial right," but it must also, in effect, determine the action or prevent a judgment from which an appeal might be taken, or it must discontinue the action. Now, even if it should be conceded that the order appealed from does affect a substantial right, it is quite clear that it does not, in effect, determine the action, or prevent a judgment from which an appeal could be taken, for on the contrary, it determines nothing as to any of the issues in the case, and so far from preventing a judgment, its declared object is to obtain such further light as would enable the court to render judgment. Nor do we think it can be regarded as an order, either granting or refusing a new trial, for the trial of the issues was arrested before any conclusion, either one way or the other, was reached. There has never yet been any trial of such issues, for though it was commenced, yet the Circuit Judge, in the exercise of his discretion, deeming it necessary for a proper determination of the questions involved to have further testimony, practically continued the case until such further testimony could be obtained.

The only remaining inquiry, therefore, is whether the order in question falls under subdivision 1 of section 11 of the Code. That subdivision embraces two classes: 1st. Intermediate judgments, orders, or decrees, involving the merits; and, 2nd. Final judgments. As the order here under consideration is, manifestly, not a final judgment, our inquiry is narrowed down to the question whether it is an intermediate order "involving the merits." It certainly is an intermediate order, but does it involve the merits of the action? Precisely what the words "involving the merits," as used in the section of the code above referred to signify, may be difficult to define so as to cover every possible case that may arise. In Henderson v. Wyatt (8 S. C., 112) it is said: "An order to involve the merits must finally determine some substantial matter forming the whole or a part of some cause of action or defence in the case in which the order is entitled." This language is quoted with approval in Westfield v. Westfield (13 S. C., at page 484), where it was applied to a case which, in principle, was like the case now under consideration. There, where a claim was presented under a proceeding to marshal assets, the Circuit Judge not being satisfied under the testimony offered, either to allow or reject the claim, recommitting it for further proof, and it was there said that such an order was not appealable. See, also, what is said in Watkins v. Lang (17 S. C., at page 21), where an order recommitting a report of the master for further testimony is spoken of as a matter resting in the discretion of the Circuit Judge, with which this court will not ordinarily interfere.

It is true that there may be cases in which an order recommitting a case to the master or referee for further testimony might present errors of law, involving the merits of the action, which would render it appealable; but we do not think that the present is such a case. We do not understand that Judge Fraser decided any of the questions involved in the case, but as a prudent precaution desired further testimony before proceeding to make any decision. This was a matter clearly within his discretion, and we cannot say that it was improperly exercised. The courts of this State have gone very far in recognizing the discretionary power of the Circuit Judge as to the time of receiving further testimony in a case, when it is deemed necessary to secure the ends of justice, sometimes permitting it to be offered even after a motion for non-suit has been made and argued, and even after *the opinion of the judge has been indicated in favor of the motion (Browning v. Huff, 2 Bail., 179; Poole v. Mitchell, 1 Hill, 404), and sometimes permitting a case to be withdrawn from the jury and continued with a view to obtain further testimony necessary to establish plaintiff's case. Cook v. Cottrell, 4 Strobl., 61, recognized in Wilson v. Dean, 21 S. C., 327. Indeed, as is said in Mathews v. Heyward (2 S. C., at page 247), the conduct of a case on Circuit, "so far as relates to the time of the introduction of testimony on the one side or the other, must be regulated by the particular circumstances then existing, of which the presiding judge can properly alone decide."

In the case now under consideration, the Circuit Judge, after hearing such testimony as had been taken by the referee and reported to the court, not feeling satisfied that he had sufficient testimony before him to enable him properly to determine the issues involved in the case, declined to pass upon the merits of the action, and practically continued the case for further testimony, and we do not think his order to this effect is appealable. This being so, it would be premature now to consider or determine the questions presented by the several grounds of appeal.

The judgment of this court is, that the order appealed from be affirmed.

Mr. A. J. Green, for appellant.

Mr. John T. Sloan, jr., contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff brought the action below on a money demand, a statement of his cause of action in the complaint being as follows:

"Second, for a second cause of action: That heretofore the defendant, by one P. H. Joyner, her agent duly authorized thereto, made her promissory note in writing, dated on the 23rd day of April, 1884, at Eastover, S. C., and thereby promised to pay to the plaintiff, under the style and firm name of Dowie & Moise, eight hundred and twenty-six dollars and fifty cents, on the first day of November, 1884;" and after acknowledging certain credits thereon, which reduced the sum due to $526.50, demanded judgment for that sum with interest at 7 per cent. per annum. For answer to this, the second cause of action: "The defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint in regard thereto."

By consent, the case was referred to the master, with leave to either party to review by exceptions his conclusions. On the trial before the master, a paper, of which the following is a copy, was introduced by the plaintiff in support of the cause of action above, to wit:

"Collateral note for fertilizers. $826.50. Eastover, S. C. April 23, 1884. On November 1, next, I promise to pay to the order of Dowie & Moise, eight hundred and twenty-six and 50-100 dollars at 1st Nat. Bank of Charleston, for value received in fertilizers. And to secure the payment of this note, I hereby agree on or before May 15, next, to pay to the said Dowie & Moise all moneys collected from sales of said fertilizers, and to deliver to them all notes given for purchase of same, inclusive of freights on said fertilizers, as said collateral security for the payment of this note. That on or about September 15, next, Dowie & Moise agree to return said planters' notes for collection for their account, and that I agree in their behalf to collect the same, *and remit to them the proceeds of such notes as may be collected, or transfer the original notes which, as trustees for them, we may be unable to collect in part or in full, and this agreement to remain in force until this obligation is satisfied. (Signed) P. H. Joyner, Agt."

Endorsements: "November 28, 1884. By cash, account of within note, two hundred dollars. December 26. By cash on account of the within note, one hundred dollars."

It was admitted that P. H. Joyner was the agent of his wife, the defendant, and that he was authorized thereto and did sign the original paper of which the above is a copy. Moise, the plaintiff, proved that the payments above were made by remittances by Joyner as the agent of his wife, and also that certain planters' notes taken in the sale of the fertilizer had been returned to him by Joyner in pursuance of the agreement above.

At the conclusion of this, the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground that the paper above was not a promissory note. 1st, that it contained engagements for something besides the payment of money; and 2d, by implication was payable out of a particular fund. This motion was refused by the master. The defendant then offered in evidence several notes given by planters, found in the "Case," marked C., and finally it was admitted that the terms of the collateral agreement appended to the original note (the one sued on), as to the return of the notes and liens to Joyner for collection, and the return of the same to the plaintiff, had been complied with. The master reported that he had refused the motion for non-suit, because he held that the paper in question, notwithstanding the appended agreement, was a promissory note. He further reported as matters of fact that P. H. Joyner, as agent of defendant, had made said note, that all payments had been properly credited, and that the terms of the appended agreement had been complied with, as admitted above. And he found as conclusions of law, 1st. That plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the first cause of action as set forth in the complaint in the sum of $227.95. 2d. That said full compliance with the terms of the appended agreement as to the return of notes and liens to the defendant for collection, and the return of the same by her to the plaintiff, did not operate as a discharge of defendant's liability on said promissory note. And 3d. That there is now due to the plaintiff on said note, $526.50, with interest, &c., amounting to $550.30, for which, with costs and disbursements, he recommended judgment.

The defendant excepted, claiming that the paper was not a promissory note, and on that account the non-suit should have been granted. 2d. That the master erred in his second finding of law, the same not being warranted under the pleadings or evidence. 3d. That he erred in finding that plaintiff was entitled to recover $550.30 and costs; and 4th. That he should have found that the instrument sued on was a contract for the sale of fertilizers, and should have been declared on as such.

The Circuit Judge overruled these exceptions, and confirmed the master's report, giving the plaintiff judgment, in accordance with the recommendations and conclusions thereof. The appeal of defendant involves the same questions as those raised in the above exceptions to master's report.

The defendant contends, first, that she was entitled to a non-suit as to the second cause of action, because there was no evidence of indebtedness on her part by promissory note as alleged in the complaint, the paper introduced and relied on to support said cause of action being a contract, instead of a promissory note. Suppose it be admitted that the paper in question is not a promissory note, but is, as contended by defendant, a contract, what, then, is the result? Does it amount to more than that the plaintiff has made a mistake in the name which he has given to the paper sued on? Is such a mistake fatal? Doubtless it would have been under the old practice and pleading, where forms even to technical accuracy had to be observed; but can it be so under the code? Besides the liberal spirit which pervades the entire code, especially as to defects in pleading, there are two sections which appear to be directly applicable to a question like this before the court, to wit: section 163 and section 180. In the first, it is provided that the complaint shall contain a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action, without unnecessary repetition. In the second it is provided that in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with *a view of substantial justice between the parties. In addition, see also section 181, where it is provided, that when the allegations of a pleading are so indefinite or uncertain that the precise nature of the charge or defence is not apparent, the court may require the pleading to be made definite and certain by amendment.

Now, when it is remembered that the plaintiff here supposed that he had a cause of action upon that portion of the paper in which defendant had promised to pay him a certain sum of money at a day certain, and that he had no cause of action on the appended or collateral agreement, there having been no breach thereof, does not his complaint contain a plain and concise statement of his cause of action, or, at least, may not the action be sustained by the liberal construction required by section 180, to the end that substantial justice between the parties shall be done? All that is required is, that the defendant shall not be taken by surprise, that he shall be fully informed of the character of the claim made against him, so that he can interpose his defence. If he is doubtful in this regard, section 181, above, enables him to have the complaint made more definite and certain. The defendant did not ask the aid of this latter section, and we can hardly suppose that she was uninformed as to the precise claim made upon her. In this view of the case it is not important what name the plaintiff might have given the paper relied on, whether promissory note or contract. The substance was there, and, as it appears to us, was stated in a sufficiently plain and concise form to meet the requirements of the code on the subject of complaints.

The appellant cites the case of Hogg v. Pinckney (16 S. C., 387), wherein it is said: "That it is well understood that all the facts which the plaintiff is required to prove to entitle him to a verdict should be alleged in the complaint." This is good law, but we do not see that it conflicts with the principles herein above, or that it was violated in the case at bar. We think that the plaintiff alleged in his complaint all that it was necessary to allege, and the evidence introduced, we think, sustained his allegations in substance, even if it be admitted that he gave a wrong name to the paper sued on.

*But did he make a mistake in this respect? That he did not, see the case of the Bank v. Gary, 18 S. C., 285, and the cases there cited. This case, in our opinion, fully sustains the position of the master, affirmed by the Circuit Judge, that the paper in question is a promissory note.

The other exceptions were not discussed by appellant, his appeal in the argument being based entirely upon the question involving the character of the paper sued on, to wit, whether or not it was a promissory note. We may say, however, that the errors alleged therein do not appear.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Before Aldrich, J., Sumter, October, 1885.

This was an action by Sam Boatwright against the Wilmington, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company and the Northeastern Railroad Company, lessees of the Central Railroad Company, for an injury done to him by a train of freight cars on the Central Railroad at Sumter while he was coupling two cars. The plaintiff was a brakeman and car coupler of the train. The accident occurred on the night of September 29, 1883, and this action was commenced September 10, 1885. Other matters are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellants.

Messrs. Moises & Lee, contra.

June 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for an injury sustained by him while in discharge of his duty as car coupler on the Central Railroad of South Carolina, a road under a lease to, and operated by, the defendant companies.

The allegation in the complaint substantially was that by reason of negligence in running the cars on said road, and by reason of the failure of defendants to supply him with proper appliances for the performance of his duties as car coupler, he sustained the injury complained of.

The plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that two kinds of couplers were used on the road, one a straight link, proper to be used when the cars to be coupled were of the same height, and another, a crooked link, called a goose-neck, to be used in coupling cars of different heights, as safer than the straight link; that upon the occasion when the injury was sustained the plaintiff had applied for and failed to obtain goose-neck couplers for the train upon which he was employed, and that when directed by the conductor to couple some cars at Sumter, finding that they were of unequal heights, he said to the conductor, "I don't think I can make this coupling. I'll go back and see if I can find a goose-neck anyhow, because it's a high and low car, and I *don't think I can make the coupling." The conductor replied: "Be in a hurry." Failing to find a goose-neck coupler, he reported the fact to the conductor, and said: "I don't know what to do." To which the conductor replied: "Sam, you had better go in and make that coupling anyhow." Plaintiff said: "I don't like to do it," but he said: "I'll make them come back slow." Whereupon plaintiff replied: "All right, Cap; sign them back slow." The plaintiff then went in to make the coupling, and had his hand so crushed as to necessitate amputation just above the wrist.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, defendants' counsel moved for a non-suit upon two grounds: I. Because the evidence had disclosed the fact that the injury resulted from the negligence of the conductor, who was a fellow-servant of the plaintiff. II. Because the evidence disclosed the fact that the injury resulted from plaintiff's own negligence, and from the hazards incident to his employment.

The motion was refused and the defendants introduced testimony tending to show that the plaintiff's account of the matter was not correct; that the conductor did not insist upon plaintiff's making the coupling against his will; that the plaintiff had not used the proper efforts to obtain the required kind of coupler; and that if he had, he could have obtained it, and that there was really no more danger in making the coupling with a straight link than with a goose-neck, although there was always some danger in making a coupling with either kind of coupler. The defendants also introduced testimony tending to show that plaintiff, very soon after the injury was received, attributed the disaster to the fact that the engineer of the train moved it back too quickly and caught his hand.

The jury having rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, defendants appeal upon the following grounds:

1. Because the judge refused to charge: "That if the jury believe that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the engineer, or co-employé of the plaintiff, the defendants are not liable."

2. Because he refused to charge: "If the jury believe that it was the duty of the conductor to see that his train was furnished *with all necessary and suitable appliances and instruments, and that all such appliances and instruments were kept constantly on hand by the defendants, at a convenient place, subject to the order of the conductor, and that on the occasion of the plaintiff's injury the conductor failed or neglected to procure, call for, or order the said appliances or instruments, and that such injury resulted from the use of an unsafe or unsuitable appliance, then the plaintiff cannot recover."

3. For refusing to charge: "That the plaintiff and conductor were fellow-servants."

4. For error in charging the jury: "The employé does not take the risk of accident happening from the incompetency, ignorance, or culpable misconduct of his co-laborer. When railroads were in their infancy very large franchises were granted in their charters by the legislature, and very liberal constructions were ruled by the courts. Hence, in Murray's case a stringent rule was laid down by the court, which was generally adopted in this country and England. That rule did not give the employé protection against the corporation if the injury resulted from the carelessness, incompetency, or culpable neglect of his co-laborer. But in the course of time, as these corporations increased in number, wealth, and power, developing the immense resources of the country, and engaged in their service an army of employes—engineers, firemen, conductors, &c.—it became not only apparent, but eminently just, that this multitude of workers and bread-winners should be protected against the recklessness and incompetency of those engaged in the same service. Hence that rule has been modified, and I now charge you that the railroad corporation is not only bound to provide the necessary machinery and materials to run their trains, due regard being had to the safety of their employes, but it is also responsible to the employé if he is injured by the want of these, or by the incompetency and criminal negligence of the officers of the road, whose orders he is bound to obey."

5. For error in charging: "That the employé does not take the risk of accident happening from the incompetency, ignorance, or culpable misconduct of his co-laborer."

6. For error in charging: "That the rule laid down in Murray v. So. Ca. R. R. Co. (1 McMull., 385 [36 Am. Dec. 268]) has been modified in this State."

7. For error in refusing the motion for non-suit on the grounds stated above.

Let us proceed to the examination of these several grounds of appeal, though not exactly in the order in which they appear in the record. First, as to the motion for a non-suit. This motion, though nominally based upon only two grounds, really presents four questions: 1st. Whether the injury complained of resulted from the negligence of the conductor? 2d. Whether the plaintiff and the conductor were fellow-servants? 3d. Whether the injury was the result of plaintiff's own negligence? 4th. Whether it was the result of one of the hazards incident to plaintiff's employment? The first was manifestly a question of fact which the judge could not undertake to decide on a motion for a non-suit. Whether the injury sustained by the plaintiff was to be attributed to the fault or negligence of the conductor in ordering the plaintiff to couple the cars with a straight link, in the absence of a safer kind of coupler, or whether the want of the safer kind of coupler was due to the negligence of the conductor, or to the negligence of Milligan, who was in charge of the "supply house" in Charleston, where such articles were kept for the use of the trains, were questions of fact upon which it was not competent for the Circuit Judge to pass. Until, therefore, these questions of fact were solved, the second question presented by the motion for a non-suit could not arise, and need not now be considered.

The third question, that of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, has been so frequently held in this State to be a matter of defence, which cannot be considered on a motion for non-suit, that, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is scarcely necessary to consider the question. The only question which can be considered by the court upon a motion for a non-suit is, whether there is an entire failure of testimony to sustain all or any one of the points necessary to be established in order to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action. Unless there is such a failure the motion must be refused, for where there is any testimony pertinent to, or tending to sustain the plaintiff's case, such testimony must be submitted to the jury to pass upon its truth *and determine its sufficiency. So that even where the testimony adduced by the plaintiff may tend to show contributory negligence on his part, as well as negligence on the part of the defendant, the judge has no power to grant a non-suit, for that would involve the necessity of his passing upon the truth of the testimony tending to show contributory negligence, as well as upon its sufficiency for that purpose, both of which are under our constitution exclusively within the province of the jury, and to that tribunal, therefore, such questions must necessarily be submitted.

The fourth question presented by the motion for a non-suit clearly involved a question of fact which the Circuit Judge could not decide upon a motion for non-suit. It is undoubtedly true that an employee assumes all the risks usually and ordinarily incident to his employment, but the material inquiry in this case was whether such risks had not been enhanced by the failure of the defendants to supply the plaintiff with suitable appliances for doing the work which he was employed and required to do. We think it clear, therefore, that there was no error in refusing the motion for a non-suit.

We propose next to consider the second and third grounds of appeal, both of which are based upon the proposition that the plaintiff and the conductor were fellow-servants, and therefore that the defendants cannot be held responsible for any injury sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the negligence of the conductor. To this proposition we cannot give our assent. The rule as settled in this State by the case of Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co., 18 S. C. 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573], recognized in several subsequent cases, seems to be this: Where the master delegates to any officer or agent the performance of duties which the master owes to his employes, such officer or agent, by whatever name he may be called, becomes the representative of the master. His acts are the acts of the master, and his negligence is the negligence of the master. See Couch v. Railroad Company, 22 S. C., 557; Calvo v. Railroad Company, 23 Id., 526 [55 Am. Rep. 28].

Testing this question by this rule, it seems to us clear that unless the conductor of a railroad train is, while in charge of the train, the representative of the company, then the train is being run without any representa-tative. He has entire charge of the train and every employe on it is subject to his orders. This view is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company v. Ross (112 U. S., 377 [5 Sup. Ct. 184, 28 L. Ed. 787]), where, after reviewing the cases on the subject, Mr. Justice Field, uses this language: "We agree with them in holding (and the present case requires no further decision) that the conductor of a railway train, who commands its movements, directs when it shall start, at what stations it shall stop, at what speed it shall run, and has the general management of it, and control over the persons employed upon it, represents the company, and therefore that, for injuries resulting from his negligent acts, the company is responsible.

If such a conductor does not represent the company, then the train is operated without any representative of its owner."

The first, fourth, fifth, and sixth grounds of appeal will be considered together. We think the Circuit Judge was in error in supposing that the rule as laid down in Murray v. S. C. R. R. Co. (1 McMull., 385 [36 Am. Dec. 268]), has been modified in this State. That case simply established the general proposition that a master is not liable to his servant for an injury caused by the negligence of his fellow-servant, and we do not understand that this general proposition has been in the slightest degree modified by our court. All the subsequent cases, while recognizing the correctness of the general proposition, have turned upon the question whether, in the particular case under consideration, the injury sustained by the plaintiff was occasioned by the negligence of one who stood in the relation of a fellow-servant to the plaintiff, or whether the injury complained of resulted from the negligence of some subordinate officer or agent of the master, who was not a fellow-servant of the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, a representative of the master. In Murray's case, however, no such question was raised or considered. There the action was by a fireman against the railroad company for an injury sustained by reason of the negligence of the engineer, and it was assumed throughout the case that they were fellow-servants, and the only question considered or determined in that case was, whether a master was liable to a servant for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, and it was determined that in such a case the master was not liable.

This, we understand, is yet the law of South Carolina, and that whenever it is ascertained that the servant of a railroad company, or any other employee, has been injured by the negligence of one of his fellow-servants, no recovery can be had against the employer for such injury by such servant, unless it is made to appear by the plaintiff that the employer has himself been guilty of negligence in selecting his servants, or in retaining them in his employment after he knows, or has an opportunity of knowing, that the person whose negligence has caused the injury is not a suitable person to be employed in the service in which he was engaged at the time the injury was sustained. It follows from this that as one is presumed to have assumed all the risks naturally and reasonably incident to the employment which he voluntarily undertakes, one of which risks is, where numbers are employed, the negligence of his fellow-servants, that the Circuit Judge erred in charging the jury that, "The employee does not take the risk of accident happening from the incompetency, ignorance, or culpable misconduct of his co-laborer."

So, too, upon the same ground we think the judge erred in refusing to charge, "That if the jury believed that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the engineer, or co-employee of the plaintiff, the defendants are not liable." If the plaintiff and the engineer were fellow-servants, as we think they were, then, upon the principles above stated, the charge should have been given as requested. The plaintiff and engineer were both co-operating, and necessarily co-operating, to bring about the same end—the coupling of the cars. They were both acting under the common directions of the conductor. The engineer was required to move back the train by the agency of his engine, and the plaintiff was required to take position between the cars as the train was moved back, so as to secure them together by the coupling apparatus, and it seems to us that these two employees, acting under common orders to secure the same result, the action of both being necessary to that end, must be regarded as fellow-servants. According to the testimony, the business of coupling cars is, at best, attended with more or less danger, one material *element manifestly being the manner in which the train is moved back, and when the plaintiff undertook this employment he must be regarded as having assumed the risk arising in every case from a want of proper care on the part of the engineer in moving back the train; and if his injury was the result of the want of such care on the part of the engineer, he should not be entitled to recover from the defendants.

It is true that the case has been argued principally under the view that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was the result of the failure to supply him with proper appliances to make the coupling, but still the point which we have just been considering is made in the grounds of appeal, and we have therefore felt bound to consider it, especially as one of the allegations in the complaint is that the injury was caused by "carelessness and negligence in running and managing said train of cars," and there is some testimony to the effect that plaintiff, very soon after the accident occurred attributed it to the fact that the engineer had moved the train back "too quickly and caught his hand."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. It may be that the underlying principle announced in the case of Murray v. Railroad Company, is, that the company is not liable for damages resulting from the negligence of one who is strictly a fellow-servant. But it seems to me, that some of the doctrines of that early case have been properly explained, limited, and modified by the course of modern decisions. I concur in the result.

*Before Fraser, J., Laurens, December, 1885.

This was an appeal from the following decree:

This case was heard by me at the extra term of the court held for Laurens in December, 1885. Without relying on any of the testimony to which exception was taken, I find the following facts:

This action has been brought to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendant to secure four promissory notes bearing date March 31, 1876—one for $450, due at three months, one for $400, due at six months, one for $400, due at nine months, and one for $400, due at twelve months. These notes were payable to the McCall Manufacturing Company, or order. The mortgage bears the same date. The execution of the notes and mortgage is admitted, and the transfer of the notes to the plaintiff is admitted in the answer. And they were transferred to plaintiff in some way on account of his "share" in the company, of which he was one of the stockholders. It is by no means clear that he would have taken the notes discharged of the equities between the original parties, under these circumstances, even if they had been transferred to him before maturity. Whether it was an incorporated company or not, he stood as a privy in interest at the making of the notes. I take it, however, to be a fact as stated by the defendant, that these notes were transferred to plaintiff after they became due, and plaintiff holds them subject to all the equities between the McCall Manufacturing Company and John Cunningham, the defendant. It cannot affect the case whether there has ever been any protest for non-payment.

The defence set up is failure of consideration. The McCall Manufacturing Company had become the owner of certain patents for the Rhind Patent Safety Lamps and established a manufactory for them in New York. The consideration of these notes, as set out in the deed of assignment by the said company, delivered to the defendant contemporaneously with the execution of the notes and mortgage, was "the sole and exclusive right to sell and dispose of all goods made by the McCall Manufacturing Company under said letters patent in and for the County of Kings, in the State of New York, and in no other places." *This deed shows that this consideration extended in all to $1,600, and the parol testimony shows that the remaining $50 incorporated in the first note for $450 was in payment for goods or lamps to be furnished to the defendant to enable him to commence the business of selling under the assignment. So much of the testimony as goes to show that the patent was of no value in use, and that lamps made with the alleged improvement were unsalable is irrelevant, as a purchaser of these patent rights takes title, as to these matters, at his own risk, unless there is some guaranty as to them. There is none here.

My difficulty, however, as to the consideration in this case is not as to the value or salability of the lamps, but that what is called in this deed by the company to the defendant, "the exclusive right to sell and dispose of," seems to be really no right at all. There is no mutuality or reciprocity of obligation. The company never bound itself to sell the lamps to the defendant at any reasonable price, or at any price at all. It did not obligate itself to transfer the right to manufacture these lamps to other parties, or not to cease the manufacture of them, and not allow any other parties to engage in it. So that it would have been impossible for the defendant to have enjoyed any benefit from sales of lamps. The company, however, continued to make lamps. But if defendant had applied for lamps and tendered a reasonable and fair price for them, I do not see any remedy for a refusal to sell them to him. The company was under no contract, as far as appears from the evidence, to sell them, and neither a suit for damages or specific performance would have availed him. See Chit. Cont., 15, 46. If, however, in fact, the company had gone on and furnished the lamps at reasonable prices paid for them, the agreement made by the defendant, though originally nudum pactum, might have been made good, at least to such extent as the defendant had enjoyed benefit under the deed of the company to him. See Miller v. McKenzie [95 N. Y. 575] 47 Am. Rep., 85, a New York case.

To my mind it seems to have been the duty of the plaintiff in this case to have shown the facts which could convert what, on its face, is an invalid claim to a valid one, and to show either that the defendant did enjoy benefit under the deed, or, then, *that it was his own fault that he failed to do so. The burden of proof on this point was on the plaintiff. In the sharp conflict of testimony as to who was to blame for the defendant's failure to receive any benefits under the arrangements and the clear proof that in fact he did not receive any benefit, I must hold against the plaintiff, whose duty it is to have, at least, a preponderance of testimony. I am inclined to think, however, that whatever may have been the value of these lamps, the company was too exacting to allow defendant to reap any benefit from their sale. I therefore hold that the collection of these notes cannot be enforced, except as to the $50 included in the note for $450, for the price of lamps to have been furnished to defendant to commence business, and as to so much of this sum as is due, plaintiff is entitled to foreclose his mortgage, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

It is ordered that it be referred to the master to inquire and report how much goods or lamps were furnished by the McCall Manufacturing Company to the defendant on account of said $50, and that he report such sum and interest thereon in order that further orders may be made thereon. The master may use the testimony heretofore taken in this case, with the right to the parties to introduce such other competent testimony as they may desire.

From this decree plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor erred in holding that the notes and mortgage described in the complaint herein were transferred to the plaintiff after they became due in some way on account of his share in the McCall Manufacturing Company, and that plaintiff holds them subject to all the equities between the said company and the defendant.

II. Because his honor erred in holding that plaintiff was a stockholder in the McCall Manufacturing Company, and was a privy in interest at the making of the notes.

III. Because his honor erred in holding that there was no mutuality or reciprocity of obligation between the McCall Manufacturing Company and the defendant, and that the agreement was nudum pactum, and the right granted defendant under said agreement was no right at all.

*IV. Because his honor erred in holding that it was the duty of plaintiff to show that the defendant did enjoy benefit under the deed of McCall Manufacturing Company, or that it was his own fault that he failed to do so, and that the burden of proof on this point was on the plaintiff.

V. Because his honor erred in holding that the defendant did not receive any benefit from the sale of lamps under the assignment of the McCall Manufacturing Company, and it was because the said company was too exacting of him.

VI. Because his honor erred in holding that the collection of the notes complained upon cannot be enforced, except as to the $50 included for the price of lamps.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for appellant.

Messrs. Cuninghame & Harris, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. (Omitting his statement of the case.) We have confined ourselves to the consideration of the questions raised in these exceptions. The first two involve questions of fact principally, and under the rule that findings of fact, even when they are within our cognizance, will not be disturbed, unless wholly unsupported by the evidence, the findings here must stand, as we have not found them thus unsupported.

The third brings up the main question in the case, and it is a question of law involving the construction of the contract between the parties. The Circuit Judge held that there was no mutuality or reciprocity of obligation between the parties, and therefore that the agreement was a nudum pactum. The defendant bought the exclusive right to sell the lamps in question in a certain county in the State of New York, which lamp the McCall Manufacturing Company alone had the right to manufacture. The enjoyment of this exclusive right depended, therefore, on the McCall Company furnishing him with the lamps needed for sale. If they were under no obligation to furnish the lamps, the right of the purchaser was the merest bagatelle. The right to sell an article, without the power to procure it for sale, amounts to nothing.

*We cannot say what may have been the intention of the parties outside of their written agreement, or how far the McCall Manufacturing Company would have supplied the defendant, or how promptly or how free from difficulty. We must construe the contract by its terms, and looking at the deed from that standpoint, there is certainly no mutuality or reciprocity of obligation in it. The company did not bind itself to furnish a single lamp to the defendant. In fact, it failed to bind itself to do anything. It only assigned the exclusive right to sell, retaining the right to prevent sale by failing to stipulate to furnish the article to be sold, and with no power in the defendant to compel it to furnish said article. Such being the construction of the agreement, we think the Circuit Judge was correct in holding it to be a nudum pactum, and therefore in declining to enforce collection of the notes, except as to the $50.

4. No doubt that had the plaintiff shown that defendant was furnished with lamps by the company, and the defendant enjoyed the benefit of the contract, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover, but this was not shown, and we agree with the Circuit Judge, that under this peculiar agreement the burden of showing this was upon the plaintiff. The 5th involves a question of fact. The 6th is disposed of by what has already been said.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, July, 1885.

This was an action by J. F. Walker against the Columbia & Greenville Railroad Company, commenced in January, 1885, to recover damages for three mules and two colts, alleged to have been negligently killed by a freight train of the defendant on December 26, 1884. The plaintiff proved the killing of the stock on the railroad track and their value, and that at the place where killed, the railroad ran through a pasture used by plaintiff and an adjoining land owner. Defendant then moved for a non-suit, which was refused.

The character of the testimony for the defence and other matters are stated in the opinion of this court. The jury found a verdict for $881.30 in favor of plaintiff, the amount claimed with interest to date of verdict. Defendant gave notice of motion for new trial on the minutes, whereupon plaintiff's attorney entered an order remitting the interest, leaving the judgment for $850. The motion for new trial was then refused, the judge saying: "There was some evidence to sustain the jury if they believed it. It conflicted with Duren's statement, but they had the right to take the one and reject the other, and I cannot, whatever would have been my deduction from the testimony, invade their province and set up my opinion on a question of fact against theirs. Moreover, the jury were given an opportunity of investigating the matter of distances and possible length of view on the road at that point by an inspection of the locus in quo. They were not misled by the charge of the presiding judge, and the new trial is refused."

The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his honor erred in refusing the defendant's motion for a non-suit in said cause.

*II. Because his honor erred in refusing to allow defendant to rebut plaintiff's evidence as to the date and locality at which stock had been killed on former occasions near the scene of the killing, which is the cause of the present action, on the ground that it was plaintiff's evidence in reply, when in fact it was new matter.

III. Because his honor erred in refusing to allow defendant to rebut and reply to plaintiff's evidence as to stopping of trains and the distance in which they were stopped, on the ground that it was in reply, whereas it was new matter, which the defendant had a right to reply to, and his honor should have so held.

IV. Because his honor erred in instructing the jury that they could find in addition to what they believed the value of the stock killed, the interest upon said value from the date of the killing to the date of the verdict.

V. Because his honor erred in admitting plaintiff's evidence in reply, which evidence was not properly in reply, but was in fact matter only admissible in chief.

VI. Because his honor erred in refusing to set aside the verdict as found by the jury, and to grant a new trial.

Mr. John C. Haskell, for appellant.

Messrs. F. W. McMaster and Andrew Crawford, contra.

June 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON: The plaintiff recovered a verdict against the defendant for $850, the value of three mules and two colts killed on the track of defendant's railroad in Richland County. The defendant appealed, assigning error to the presiding judge, in substance as follows: 1. That he erred in refusing defendant's motion for non-suit. 2. That he erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial. 3. That he erred in permitting the plaintiff to introduce new matter in reply to defendant's testimony. And 4. That he erred in refusing to permit the defendant to reply to the new matter introduced by the plaintiff, in his reply to defendant's testimony.

First, as to the non-suit. The plaintiff was introduced as a *witness, who proved the killing with some other facts, and closed, when the defendant moved for a non-suit. This motion was refused, and we cannot see how the Circuit Judge, under Danner's case, and several cases since that case, could have done otherwise than refuse it. With these cases before the judge, instead of its being error on his part to refuse the non-suit, would it not have been legal error to have granted it?

The appellant, in his argument, however, contends first, that the rule in Danner's case had its foundation in the stock law, then of force, which law having since been materially and radically changed, the rule which rested upon it must also change into some new rule in harmony with the new stock law; that the foundation of the old rule having fallen, the rule resting upon it must fall also. This argument would have much force if it were true that Danner's case rested upon the foundation suggested. But did it so rest? We had occasion in the recent case of Jones v. this same defendant (20 S. C., 254), to look into and examine this question, and we then came to the conclusion that the rule in question was established upon the principle that the facts and circumstances of the killing, upon which the issue of negligence in cases of this kind must be determined, being in most such cases entirely within the knowledge of the party committing the injury, it was right and proper that said party should be required to explain and exculpate.

The court said in Danner's case, "That the company did not produce witnesses to show how the damage occurred, nor explain why they omitted to do so, tends to induce the belief that they could make no defence. They had the witnesses under their control. The plaintiff may not have been present when the cattle were killed, and may not be able to discover who were the persons employed on the train when the damage was done. When a party is charged with an act or declaration which may subject him to an action, and does not deny it, his silence is construed into an admission. The same construction may be put on a party's omission to offer testimony in his defence when it is in his power to produce witnesses who might exculpate him." Besides, as we said in Jones's case, supra, there is not a word, or an intimation in Danner's case, from beginning to end, involving the stock law then existing, as being an element in the decision establishing the rule. On the contrary, it was established upon principle and authority—several cases being cited and relied upon, these cases having no reference whatever to the then stock law.

It is true, in the subsequent case of Murray v. R. R. Co. (10 Rich., 232 [70 Am. Dec. 219]), the court did make some reference to the fact that cattle under the law could roam at large, and, therefore, that where the owner permitted them so to do, he was not guilty of legal negligence such as would embarrass his recovery from a person who, through negligence, hurt his cattle, thereby implying that if cattle were not allowed to roam at large, there might be greater difficulty presented to a recovery, when injured, than as the law then stood, but not that such a fact should require a different rule as to the effect of proof of killing. There is no intimation of that sort, and Judge Wardlaw, in delivering the opinion in Murray's case, follows what is said above with this: "The court acquiesces, too, in the reference which the recorder made to Danner's case for the presumption which arises from the killing of the horse by a train of cars established and unexplained, and for the unfavorable inference raised by the absence of all the defendant's agents who were at the killing. Negligence, rather than accident, is shown by proof of damages done by a train of cars when nothing more appears."

Our conclusion in Jones's case, supra, was: That the rule in Danner's case not having been established originally on the foundation of the stock law as then existed, it stood unaffected by the recent statutes requiring stock to be kept enclosed, and we see no reason for a departure from this conclusion. See Jones v. C. & G. R. R. Co. (20 S. C., 254).

As we have said before in one or more of the cases on this subject, the rule in Danner's case does not create any greater liability than existed before, nor does it dispense with negligence as a necessary element in liability. Nor does it increase or enlarge the care or modify it in any way previously required, so as to disprove negligence. It simply determines the force and effect of a proved fact. It says that the fact of killing being proved, then there is a prima facie case of negligence, and this presumption arises in every case where cattle are killed by a railroad, whether they are trespassing or not, for the reason that even as to trespassing cattle it is not impossible that the killing may in some cases result from negligence. True, in the latter class of cases it would be much easier for the railroad company to disprove negligence than in the former, as the care required as against trespassers is not so great as in the other class. While, however, the law does not hold railroad companies to such strict accountability for injuries done to trespassers, as will be enforced when an injury is done to one not a trespasser, yet these companies cannot claim exemption upon the ground, simply, that the party injured was trespassing. It is possible that a trespasser even may be injured from negligence.

The rule in Danner's case does not interfere with the principles above stated. It does not make railroads liable where they were not liable before. It does not enlarge the degree of care required to exempt them from responsibility. It only goes to the extent of declaring, that the fact of killing, or injury done, presumes negligence, prima facie, and it then leaves the defendant with the burden of overthrowing this presumption, by such proof as the circumstance in the special case may enable him to do. If it be a case arising out of the trespass of the plaintiff, this is matter of defence, and may be set up as limiting the degree of care required to be proved in order to overthrow the presumption; or, on the other hand, if it be not a case of trespass, then the proof of greater care would be required to remove the presumption. Now, in all these cases, the party doing the injury is especially presumed to have information as to all the facts and circumstances attending it, and there is no hardship in requiring him to bring these facts and circumstances forward to his exculpation, if they exist, and upon failure to do so that he shall be presumed to have committed the injury, which has been traced to his hands, through negligence.

Nor do we agree with the appellant, that this principle discriminates against persons as compared with cattle, placing a higher estimation upon cattle than upon human beings. On the contrary, the tendency of the principle is directly towards the safety of passengers, and the protection of the lives of those who travel on railroads. It is in their interest. Railroad cars are, perhaps, as frequently endangered and thrown from the track by running over cattle as from any other cause. Would the overruling of the rule in Danner's case or the relaxing of it, have a tendency to lessen the number of these occurrences? Would the fact that killing stock raises no presumption of negligence, make those who run trains more watchful? Would the knowledge that railroad companies could not be made liable except upon affirmative evidence of facts and circumstances showing positive negligence, when it is well understood that in most of such cases the plaintiff is utterly unable to prove anything more than the injury, knowing nothing of the attending facts or circumstances, increase the vigilance of railroad employees, &c? Care, close and constant care, in the interest of safety to passengers and to the protection of the lives of those who are on board, is at all times needed at the hands of those who run railroad trains; and if a change of the rule under discussion would increase this care, there would be reason for the change. But does not the rule, as established, afford a stronger motive to the exercise of care than would be the case without it? It certainly does not weaken incentive to care; on the contrary, we think it strengthens and adds greatly to such incentive.

We see no sufficient reason for overruling this rule, on any of the grounds urged by appellant. It may be, that it is not in harmony with all of the American railroad decisions on this subject. It is true, perhaps, that some of the other States have held differently, but with us it has been established long since. It has been affirmed and re-affirmed, and standing as it does, not only upon the authority of these several decisions, but upon sound and correct principles, it should not be disturbed.

Next, as to the new trial. This involves questions of fact, and is, therefore, beyond our cognizance. The judge held that the preponderance of the evidence was not opposed to the verdict, and his judgment is final.

The other grounds involve an inquiry, whether the Circuit Judge admitted evidence of new matter by the plaintiff in reply, as alleged, to defendant's testimony in defence, and also whether he refused to permit the defendant to reply to new matter thus introduced. In other words, whether the evidence admitted and objected to was new matter, such as the defendant should have been allowed to reply to.

The defence rested very materially upon evidence that the runner in charge of the engine, did not see, nor could have seen, the mules and colts, at a point sufficiently far from the place where they were killed to have stopped the train in time to prevent the accident. In this way the defendant undertook to disprove negligence, and to overthrow the presumption arising from the killing, the defendant relying upon two facts: First, the distance between the point where the runner saw the animals, or could have seen them, and the point where they were killed; and, 2nd, the impossibility of stopping the train between these two points. Now, it cannot be denied, that upon the close of defendant's evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to rebut by counter evidence defendant's testimony on these points. Nor can it be denied, that if such testimony is confined to such rebuttal, that the defendant is without the right of reply. See 2 Phil. Evid., Pt. 1 (C. & H. notes), 712-715.

We have examined the testimony reported and found in the "Case" at the several folios where objection was made, and have found that said testimony was in rebuttal of defendant's witness on some one of the facts testified to by him, to wit: either as to the point where the animals mounted the track, as to the distance they could be seen, or as to possibility of stopping the train within the distance from the point of vision to the point of killing. As far as we have been able to discover, defendant's objections were made at folios 120, 122, 127, 128, and at folios 162, 163. Without prolonging this opinion by stating the questions and answers, we say that the Circuit Judge is sustained in his rulings therein by the law of evidence, as administered in this country. See the early case of Scott v. Woodward, 2 McCord, 161; 3 Wait Prac., 124, 125. Besides, these matters should be left very much to the discretion of the trial judge. 3 Wait Prac., 124.

The interest embraced in the verdict having been remitted, the question as to that matter is eliminated.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

4. Whether the executor himself might not have the erroneous calculation of interest in the judgment corrected by a proper proceeding for that purpose, is a question not raised in this appeal.

Before Witherspoon, J., Kershaw, February, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. W. H. R. Workman and J. T. Hay, for appellants.

Mr. W. D. Trantham, contra.

June 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was originally commenced sometime in the year 1880, for the purpose of settling up the estate of W. B. Huckabee, according to the terms of his will. On February 10, 1879, the respondent, John M. Mickle, recovered a judgment by default against A. A. Huckabee, as administrator of the estate of W. B. Huckabee, on a note of which the following is a copy:

"$500.00. Camden, January 10, 1874.

"Twelve months after date we, or either of us, promise to pay to J. T. Mickle, or bearer, five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month, for value received. Witness our hands and seals.

"J. J. Huckabee, [L. S.]

"W. B. Huckabee, [L. S.]"

*Credited as follows: "January 15, 1875. Received ninety dollars on the within note, interest for one year, ending January 10, 1875. February 10, 1876. Received on the within ninety dollars, interest to January 10, 1876," both of which credits are signed by the payee, J. T. Mickle. By the terms of the will of the testator, his executor was directed to sell all of the estate both real and personal, and divide the net proceeds amongst the six children of the testator named in the will; and testator's son, A. A. Huckabee, was appointed executor, duly qualified as such, sold the estate, and, according to his returns, appears to be indebted to the estate in an amount more than sufficient to pay the judgment above referred to.

On February 5, 1882, the judgment creditor, John M. Mickle, had a house and lot in the town of Camden sold under his said judgment, and the proceeds of sale not being sufficient to satisfy the same, he subsequently caused the sheriff to levy upon another piece of real estate belonging to the testator, to satisfy the balance due on his judgment. Thereupon the parties interested under the will of W. B. Huckabee filed a supplemental complaint, alleging these facts, and the further fact that the judgment was taken for a much larger amount than was really due on the note, inasmuch as, in ascertaining the amount, interest was calculated, after the maturity of the note at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, to the date of the judgment, instead of at 7 per cent., as it should have been, and asking that the judgment be reformed accordingly, and in the meantime the judgment creditor, John M. Mickle, who was made a party defendant to the supplemental complaint, be enjoined from enforcing the judgment. In addition to this a notice, bearing date July 12, 1884, signed by the attorney for the plaintiffs in the action, and by the attorney for A. A. Huckabee, as executor of W. B. Huckabee, addressed to the judgment creditor, John M. Mickle, seems to have been served, to the effect, "that on the hearing of this case a motion will be made, upon the part and behalf of the defendant, A. A. Huckabee, executor of the last will and testament of W. B. Huckabee, deceased, and the heirs of his estate, to modify and reduce" the judgment hereinbefore referred to by correcting the alleged erroneous computation.

of interest. To this supplemental *complaint the judgment creditor answered, denying the right of the parties to review and revise his judgment, or to have same reformed and reduced, claiming that the judgment was properly and legally entered, and for no more than was justly due.

All the issues of law and fact were referred to the master for trial, who made his report setting out the facts in detail, and finding as his conclusions of law: 1st. That the lands of a testator can be sold under a judgment against the executor. 2nd. That the legatees had no right to be made parties to the action in which the Mickle judgment was recovered, the executor being the only proper party. 3rd. That A. A. Huckabee, the representative of the estate of Willis B. Huckabee, is bound by the said judgment, and cannot now in this action have the same reformed or reduced. 4th. That A. A. Huckabee, the executor, being bound, the legatees named in the third item of the will of the testator, being his privies in estate and represented through him, are also bound. 5th. That the said judgment, as the judgment of a competent court having jurisdiction of the subject matter, is absolutely conclusive against all the parties and must stand as rendered. 6th. That the interest did not commence to run on said note until after its maturity, and then according to its terms at the rate of one and a half per cent. per month."

To this report the attorney for the plaintiffs and the attorney for the executor, A. A. Huckabee, excepted as follows: "They except to the master's 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th conclusions of law as being erroneous, and so far as the third conclusion of law is concerned, because no point was made before the master as to the way in which these questions are brought up." Upon this report and these exceptions the case came on for hearing before Judge Witherspoon, who held, in substance, that the Mickle judgment was conclusive and cannot be assailed by the plaintiffs in this action. He then went on to say: "I cannot, however, concur with the master in his conclusions as to the interest on the note, as I think the note drew interest at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month, from date up to maturity, and only the legal rate of interest after maturity. It is ordered and adjudged that the report of the master in the above case, filed December 31, 1884, be confirmed and become the judgment of this court, *except as to the sixth (6th) conclusion of law, with reference to the interest upon the note, and plaintiffs' exception to said sixth conclusion is sustained, and all other exceptions to said report be overruled," and then proceeded to order that the injunction previously granted restraining the judgment creditor from proceeding to enforce his judgment be dissolved.

From this judgment plaintiffs appeal upon the ground that the Circuit Judge having determined that the interest on the note was erroneously calculated, should have directed the same to be corrected, and that he erred in holding that the judgment was conclusive in the sense that it could not be so corrected. The judgment creditor also appeals, upon the ground that the judge erred in holding that the interest was erroneously calculated upon the note, and upon the further ground that the judgment is conclusive as to the heirs and distributees of W. B. Huckabee and cannot be reviewed or reformed under these proceedings. The executor, A. A. Huckabee, does not appear to have appealed.

We will first consider the appeal of the judgment creditor, Mickle. We think it clear that his first ground cannot be sustained. The question in all such cases is, what was the intention of the parties, as gathered from the terms used in the written contract sued upon? We look, in vain, into the terms of this note for any word indicating an intention that the makers undertook to pay anything more than the legal rate of interest after the maturity of the note. It is nothing more than a promise to pay a certain sum of money, with a specified rate of interest, at a future specified time, without a single word indicating what shall be the rate of interest, or whether, indeed, there shall be any, after that time arrives. It is in effect a promise to pay five hundred and ninety dollars twelve months after the date, and the liability to pay any interest after that date only arises by operation of law, and not by virtue of express contract, by which alone can a rate greater than the usual legal rate be claimed.

The other grounds presented by this appellant are taken under a misconception of the true intent and effect of the Circuit decree, or perhaps out of abundance of caution: for we think that the judgment appealed from really establishes the very positions contended for in the second and third grounds of ap-

ceeding." He then orders and adjudges that the report of the master, except as to his sixth conclusion of law, with reference to the proper mode of computing the interest, "be confirmed and become the judgment of this court," and finally directs that the injunction previously granted restraining the judgment creditor from enforcing his judgment be dissolved. Now, when it is seen that the master in his fifth conclusion of law, which has been confirmed and made the judgment of the court, had found that the judgment in question "is absolutely conclusive against all the parties, and must stand as rendered," it is quite clear that this appellant has no cause of complaint against the judgment appealed from, as it gives to him everything he demands by his second and third grounds of appeal.

What was said in the Circuit Judge's decree as to the sixth conclusion of law reached by the master, was, no doubt, for the purpose of negating the idea that the Circuit Judge concurred with the master as to the construction which he placed upon the terms of the note, and not for the purpose of affecting his general conclusion as to the issues involved. The question presented for adjudication was whether the judgment could be reformed in this proceeding. This involved two inquiries: 1st. Whether there was error in the judgment; and, 2nd, if so, whether such error could now be corrected. The master determined the general question adversely to the plaintiffs for two reasons: 1st, because the judgment was conclusive and could not be inquired into, and, 2nd, because if inquired into, no error would be found. The Circuit Judge, while affirming the general conclusion of the master, for the first reason given by him, simply denied the sufficiency of the second reason relied on by that officer.

We come now to consider the appeal on the part of the plaintiffs, whom we regard as legatees of the judgment debtor, W. B. Huckabee. By the third clause of the will the executor is directed to "sell all my estate, real and personal, not hereinbefore disposed of, at his own option, in such manner as he shall think best, at private or public sale, and the net proceeds thereof *shall be equally divided between my six children," &c. Thus it will be observed there is nothing given to the children but the proceeds of the sale, and they are therefore to be regarded simply as legatees. It is a mistake to suppose, as has been argued, that this direction to the executor to sell was not absolute and positive, but simply discretionary, and therefore cannot have the effect of converting the realty into personalty. The only discretion conferred upon the executor was as to the manner of making the sale, and not as to whether he should or not make the sale, for nothing is given to the children but the proceeds of the sale. This being so, we think it clear under the cases of Fraser & Dill v. City Council of Charleston (19 S. C., 384), and Huggins v. Oliver (21 Id., 147), that the plaintiffs as legatees could not assail this judgment recovered against the legal representative of the testator. He was the only proper party to the action in which it was recovered and it is conclusive against him and the plaintiffs who are his privies.

Whether the executor himself might not by a proper proceeding for that purpose under the authority of the cases of Mooney v. Welsh, 1 Mill. Con. R., 133; Bank v. Condy, 1 Mill. 209; Patton v. Massey, 2 Mill. 475; Ashmore v. Charles, 14 Rich., 63, and other cases of that class, have any errors of the kind complained of rectified, is a question not presented by this appeal, and cannot, therefore, now be considered. It is true, that the executor did unite with the plaintiffs in giving notice of a motion to have the judgment reformed by a proper calculation of the interest, but this does not seem to have been followed up by any application by the executor for an order to that effect. On the contrary, no further notice seems to have been taken of it. There is nothing said in the report of the master in reference to it, and no exception to his report bringing this question to the attention of the Circuit Judge. Accordingly we do not find it alluded to in his decree, and there is no appeal from his decree by the executor. Under these circumstances we are not at liberty to consider it.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as herein construed, be affirmed.

*OWENS v. OWENS,

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Taxation ⚭679.]

Land offered for sale in 1871 for the non-payment of taxes, and no bid received, became forfeited and the legal title vested in the State, there having been no irregularities in the tax proceedings up to that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1361, 1362; Dec. Dig. ⚭679.]

[2. Taxation ⚭855.]

But this land having been afterwards resold by the county auditor as forfeited land, without a compliance with the provisions of law regulating such sale, the purchaser's deed from the auditor was invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1672; Dec. Dig. ⚭855.]

[3. Partition ⚭16.]

Such resale, however, having resulted in a payment to the State of all taxes, penalties, and costs claimed by the State, the former owner or owners were possessed of an equitable title, which, if in more than one person, is subject to partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 52; Dec. Dig. ⚭16.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Chester, May, 1885.

The Circuit decree fully states the case. It may be added, however, in view of subsequent changes in the law, that land forfeited to the State for want of bidders at a tax sale, under sections 124 and 125 of the act of 1868 (14 Stat., 63) was directed to be resold by the act of March 12, 1872 (15 Stat., 164); and it was under this act of 1872 that the county auditor of Chester attempted to sell this forfeited land on June 3, 1872. The Circuit decree was as follows:

William Owens died intestate in November, 1866, seized and possessed of two hundred acres of land in Chester County, leaving as his heirs at law his wife, Sarah Owens, and the above named plaintiff and defendants, his children and grandchildren. Sarah, the wife of William Owens, was insane at the death of her husband, and remained in this condition up to the period of her death in 1882. Jeremiah Mise administered upon the personal estate of William Owens, and has been discharged as such administrator by the Probate Court for Chester County. Sarah Owens at the time of her death had no personal property, her entire estate consisting of her one-third undivided interest in the real estate of her deceased husband. She also died intestate, leaving the plaintiff and defendants as her heirs. There has been no administration upon the estate of Sarah Owens. The defendant, Mary Ballard, is a minor, represented by her guardian ad litem, W. A. Sanders.

*The plaintiff is a daughter and an heir at law of William and Sarah Owens, and seeks in the above entitled action: I. To have the real estate of William Owens partitioned. II. To have the defendant, Archy Owens, a son of William and Sarah Owens, to account for rents received from the land, as well as the proceeds of wood and cross-ties sold off of the land in excess of his proportionate share thereof. III. Out of the undivided one-third interest of her mother, Sarah Owens, in the land, plaintiff seeks payment of a reasonable compensation for the care and maintenance by plaintiff of her insane mother from 1867 to the death of her mother in 1882.

All of the defendants, except Margaret Mise, answer the complaint, denying plaintiff's right to compensation for the care and maintenance of her mother. The defendant, Archy Owens, in his answer, also denies that plaintiff and the other heirs of William Owens have any right, title, or interest in and to the lands described in the complaint. The defendant, Archy Owens, claims title to said land in himself by virtue of a deed from James L. Ralph, dated December 30, 1872, as well as by adverse possession under color of title.

All of the issues were referred to a special referee, who filed his report October 9, 1884, and the cause came on to be heard before me upon the referee's report, and exceptions to said report on behalf of the defendant, Archy Owens. It appears that after due advertisement, the Owens land was offered for sale by the county treasurer of Chester County as delinquent land in June, 1871, and that there was no bid made for the land. On May 30, 1872, the land was again advertised, and on June 3, 1872, was sold by the county treasurer as "forfeited land," and bid off by the defendant, Archy Owens, for $100, who agreed that one James L. Ralph should advance the money and take and retain the county auditor's title to the land until he, Archy Owens, could refund the $100 advanced by Ralph. James M. Brawley, county auditor, on June 3, 1872, made a deed of the land to James L. Ralph, in consideration of $100. On December 30, 1872, James L. Ralph, in consideration of $100, conveyed the land to the defendant, Archy Owens. After diligent search, no record *can be found in the county auditor's or treasurer's or comptroller general's offices of the alleged delinquent or forfeited sale.

The defendant, Archy Owens, in support of his title, introduced before the referee his deed from James L. Ralph, December 30, 1872. Having proved that after diligent search the records required by law to be kept could not be found in the auditor's or treasurer's office, the defendant, Archy Owens, examined the county auditor and treasurer as to the proceedings had with reference to the Owens land having become delinquent and forfeited. At the instance of the plaintiff and the other defendants, and under a subpoena duces tecum, the defendant, Archy Owens, was required to produce before the referee the deed from James M. Brawley, county auditor, to James L. Ralph, dated June 3, 1872. The referee states in his report that there is no evidence that the county auditor ever designated on the delinquent land list the Owens land as "forfeited," or that the "forfeited land record" was ever certified officially by the county auditor, or that he ever made a copy thereof to be transmitted to the State auditor, as required by sections 124 and 125 of an act of the legislature, approved September 15, 1868. See 14 Stat., 63.

The referee concludes, as matter of law, that the deed from J. M. Brawley, county auditor, to James L. Ralph, June 3, 1872, conveying the Owens land as "forfeited," is void, for the following among other reasons assigned in the report: I. Because the sale of the Owens land in June, 1872, as forfeited, was not advertised for two weeks, as provided under 3d section of the act of March 12, 1872. 15 Stat., 164. II. Because the deed of the Owens land, as "forfeited," from Brawley, county auditor, to James L. Ralph, June 3, 1872, did not have the great seal of the State attached thereto. The referee also concludes, as matter of law, that the defendant, Archy Owens, is not entitled to hold the Williams Owens land by adverse possession. The referee, therefore, concludes that the plaintiff is entitled to have the William Owens land partitioned.

I concur with the referee in the conclusion that the deed from James M. Brawley, county auditor, to James L. Ralph, June 3, 1872, is void upon the grounds above set forth. As the defendant, *Archy Owens, claims through this deed, he has no valid title to the land in dispute. I also concur with the referee in the conclusion that the defendant, Archy Owens, cannot claim the land by adverse possession. But it must appear that the title to the Owens land is still in the plaintiff and the other heirs of William Owens in order to entitle the plaintiff to have the land partitioned. The referee finds that the Owens land became delinquent for taxes in 1871, was duly advertised and offered for sale as delinquent land, and there was no bidder for said land. There is no exception to these findings, and no effort has been made to show any irregularity in the proceeding prior to the delinquent sale in 1871.

The next inquiry, then, under the evidence, is whether or not the Owens land ever became forfeited, and the title thereto vested in the State according to law. If the title to the land has vested in the State, the plaintiff's action cannot be maintained. When does land become forfeited, and the title thereto vest in the State, and what is the evidence of such forfeiture of land, and vesting of title in the State? Section 124 of the act of 1868 provides that when land is offered for sale, as provided by law, and not sold for want of bidders, it "shall thereby become forfeited to the State of South Carolina, and thenceforth all the right, title, and interest of the former owner therein shall be vested in the State of South Carolina." Section 125 of said act provides that the auditor shall enter in a substantial book, denominated the "forfeited land record," a list of all real estate forfeited to the State, certifying to the correctness thereof, and sign the same officially, a copy of which he shall certify and transmit to the State auditor, by the county treasurer, when he makes his annual settlement. As the Owens land has been sold at delinquent sale, and there were no bidders, it would seem, under section 124, that if the proceedings conformed to law, the land became forfeited to the State. Under section 125, above referred to, the "forfeited land record" is intended to furnish the evidence of forfeiture, and the vesting of title to the land in the State.

The referee finds that the auditor kept in his office a "forfeited land record," but that it is lost or destroyed. If the "forfeited land record," when produced, would furnish the evidence of *the forfeiture of the land, it seems to me that, upon proof of its loss or destruction, as in this case, the legal presumption would be that the auditor did his duty in making the necessary entries therein, as provided under section 125 aforesaid. This presumption would not be removed until there is some evidence to show that the auditor did not keep this record according to law. There is no such evidence in this case, or any attempt to show that the "forfeited land record" was not properly kept by the auditor. The certified copy of the entries in the "forfeited land record," directed to be furnished the State auditor, I do not think is intended as part of the evidence of forfeiture, but merely to enable the State auditor and county treasurer to have a correct annual settlement.

I am constrained, by the evidence in this case, to conclude that the title to the Owens land has vested in the State by forfeiture for non-payment of taxes, and the plaintiff is not entitled to have said land partitioned. In this view of the case it will not be necessary to consider the other points raised by the exceptions to the referee's report.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the eighth exception of the defendant, Archy Owens, to the referee's report herein, alleging error in said referee's failing to find that the William Owens land had become forfeited and the title thereto vested in the State be sustained, and that plaintiff's complaint herein be dismissed with costs.

The appeal raises the points stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. E. C. McLure, for plaintiff.

Mr. W. A. Sanders, for defendants, appellants.

Mr. Ashbel G. Brice, for Archy Owens, respondent.

June 25, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, Mary Owens, sought by the action below to partition a certain tract of land situate in Chester County between herself and the other parties named above as heirs at law of her father, William Owens, *deceased, and also that defendant, Archy Owens, in possession, should account for rents and profits, &c. She sought further to subject the interest of her deceased mother, Sarah Owens, in said land to a claim which she desired to set up for attention and services to her said mother, since the death of her father, the said Sarah being all that time, and up to her death in 1882, insane and incapable of taking care of herself. All of the parties answered, except Margaret Mise, who did not answer. Mary Ballard, being a minor, answered by guardian ad litem. All but the defendant, Archy Owens, joined in the prayer for partition: they denied, however, the claim of the plaintiff, Mary, for the compensation demanded. The defendant, Archy, claimed the land as his own by virtue of a deed to him from one James Ralph and by adverse possession, and he denied that it was subject to partition between the heirs at law of the said William Owens, his father. He also resisted the claim of the plaintiff, Mary, for services rendered to her mother.

The case was finally heard by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, upon exceptions to referee's report. His honor, concurring with the referee, held, first, that in so far as the defendant, Archy, claimed under the deed from Ralph, his title was invalid, because Ralph claimed under a conveyance from the county auditor by purchase at a tax sale, which sale, not having been made according to law, was invalid. He also held that Archy could not claim the land by adverse possession under the evidence. Notwithstanding, however, that the defence of the defendant setting up title in himself could not avail, yet he denied the partition, because he found the title to the land in the State, the same having been forfeited to the State in 1871 as delinquent land, with no bidders. Reaching this conclusion, he declined to consider and adjudge the other points in the case, and he ordered and adjudged that the 8th exception of defendant to the referee's report, alleging error in said referee's failing to find that the William Owens land had become forfeited and the title thereto vested in the State, be sustained, and that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed with costs.

Mary Owens, Jane Craig, Chester Pertuis, Elizabeth Jacks, Mary Ballard, David Owens, and Isabella Bennett excepted and *appealed, raising in the main but two questions: First. That his honor erred in holding that title to the land in dispute had vested in the State by forfeiture; and, second. The county treasurer having received one hundred dollars at the forfeited land sale, and thereby the State and county taxes and all costs being paid, the title in equity, if not the legal title, is in the heirs of William Owens as tenants in common.

We agree with the Circuit Judge, that the land became forfeited and the title thereto vested in the State in 1871, when it was exposed to sale with no bidders. The Circuit Judge and the referee agree, that up to this time there had been no irregularity in the tax proceeding. The referee found that the land became delinquent for taxes of 1871, was duly advertised and offered for sale as delinquent, with no bidders, and the judge says there were no exceptions to these findings. All the conditions were present at that time to cause forfeiture. The land was placed on the tax duplicate, the taxes had not been paid, it was exposed to sale, and there were no bidders, and under our act it was forfeited. There was no necessity for "inquest of office." The language of the act is definite and distinct. Section 124, act of 1868, 14 Stat., 63. See, also, Burr. Tax., § 110, on this subject; McMillan v. Robbins, 5 Ohio, 28; United States v. De Repentigny, 5 Wall., 211 [18 L. Ed. 627].

We agree, too, with the Circuit Judge, that the irregularities connected with the subsequent sale, which resulted in a conveyance from the county auditor, Brawley, to Ralph, under which the defendant, Archy, claims, were so great as to render that deed invalid, and therefore that it did not divest the title from the State; and we think the Circuit Judge was right in declining to decree partition upon the legal title of plaintiff.

But under the circumstances of this case we are of opinion that there were equitable grounds for the partition worthy of consideration, or, at least, there was enough in the case in that direction to entitle the plaintiff, and the other parties asking partition, to have those grounds considered and adjudged. There seems to be no doubt that the State has been paid for the land, all taxes, costs, and penalties appear to have been settled in a sale which the tax officials made of the land after it had been forfeited, and *the State now has no further claim upon it, so that the equitable title, at least, is in some one other than the State. Whether that equitable title is in the heirs at law, as a whole, or in some one of them alone, is a question to be determined by investigation, and is involved in the claim of the plaintiff for partition. So, too, the matter of rents and profits, in the event that it should be determined that there exists an equitable right to partition, would be involved. Also the claim of Mary, to subject her mother's interest in the land, in the event that partition is decreed, is a matter which should be considered.

Now, to the end that these matters may be considered and adjudged, it is the judgment of this court, that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as dismisses the complaint, be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court so that the other questions suggested above, raised by the exceptions to the referee's report, and not considered in the decree herein appealed from, may be heard and determined upon the referee's report, including the testimony taken by him and the exceptions thereto.

PEARSON v. YONGUE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Waste ⇐12.]

Contingent remaindermen in land have not a right to ask the judgment of the court in advance, as to what will be the ultimate rights of themselves and of a party in possession of the land, at the time that this remainder becomes vested; nor to demand the payment of damages for waste committed by the party in possession.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rabb v. Flenniken, 29 S. C. 282, 285, 7 S. E. 597.

For other cases, see Waste, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

Mr. Justice McIver concurred in the result.

Before Wallace, J., Fairfield, February, 1885.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

It is beyond question that G. B. Pearson, jr., had only a life estate in the land to which this action relates. It was bought and sold, and he was put in possession of it, with that understanding in writing. If he had sold himself, he could only have sold an estate of that degree, and could not have, by such sale, divest*ed the rights of his children as remaindermen. The sheriff could do no more at an execution sale than he could for himself.

Defendant, however, claims the protection of his purchase upon the ground that he is an innocent purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice. Even upon this ground it would seem that the deed from the sheriff to Jones only conveyed the "right, title, and interest" of Pearson, and Jones's deed to Clowney, by the erasure pointed out above, distinctly refused to warrant generally, and conveyed his right, title, and interest and both these deeds were recorded before the purchase of the Yongues. These significant facts appearing upon the face of the deeds would have sent a prudent man upon enquiry, and he would have found the Pearson deed to Fenly, and then found Fenly and gotten from him all that was necessary to enlighten him as to the nature of G. B. Pearson's interest in that land.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, volume II., section 626, uses the following language: "Whenever a purchaser holds under a conveyance and is obliged to make out his title through that deed, or through a series of prior deeds, the general rule is firmly established that he has constructive notice of every matter connected with or affecting the estate, which appears either by description of parties, by recital, by reference, or otherwise, upon the face of any deed which forms an essential link in the chain of instruments through which he must derive his title," &c.

I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the remainder in the land, if they survive their father, G. B. Pearson, jr. And it is so adjudged. The testimony upon the subject of waste by the present occupant is very conflicting, and I am persuaded that, comparing his improvements with his injuries to the place, there would be a very small balance either way. So I will leave this question open to be settled hereafter at a more proper time, when all the parties who may be hereafter interested in it may be before the court.

Mr. E. B. Ragsdale, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In March, 1849, one George B. Pearson, senior, and his wife, Elizabeth M. Pearson, executed a deed by which they conveyed a certain tract of land, situate in Fairfield County, containing some fifteen hundred acres, to one D. D. Fenly, in trust, first, to secure the rents and profits to the exclusive use of the said Elizabeth; * * * second, upon the further trust, that the said D. D. Fenly, whenever called upon by the said Elizabeth, should allot and lay off, in such manner as she should elect, such portion of said land as she might desire to her son, George B. Pearson, jr., to be conveyed to trustees for the use of the said George B. Pearson, jr., for life, in such way as not to be liable for his debts, with remainder to his lawful issue, if he should leave such living at his death, with contingent remainders to the children of Mary P. Boyce and Emmeline S. Herbert. * * * Third, to hold the remaining portion of said land not so allotted as aforesaid, at and after the death of the said Elizabeth, for the use of her children for life, with remainder to the lawful issue of their bodies. And fourth, with power to the said Daniel D. Fenly, as trustee, at the request of the said Elizabeth, to change the investment, the substituted property, whether real or personal, to be subject to the same trusts and limitations as were therein declared upon said land.

Shortly thereafter Fenly, as trustee, and at the request of the said Elizabeth, allotted and laid off to the said George B. Pearson, jr., seven hundred and eighty six acres of said land, and in December, 1856, at the request of the said Elizabeth and of the said George B. Pearson, jr., and in consideration of the sum of $14,000, to him paid by one James S. Milling, he, the said Fenly, granted, bargained, and sold said 786 acres to the said James S. Milling; and in 1858 thereafter, with a part of the said $14,000, he purchased a certain other tract of land, containing some 244 acres, for the said George B. Pearson, jr. No deed, however, was ever executed either to himself or to any other trustee of this land, but instead thereof, an informal and temporary agreement was delivered by the vendor thereof to the said D. D. Fenly as trustee, reciting briefly that the land was purchased by the *said Fenly, as trustee for said George B. Pearson, jr., and that said purchase was made at the request of George B. Pearson, jr. George B. Pearson was put in possession immediately as cestui que trust for life, and he has occupied it until it was afterwards sold, as hereinafter stated.

While George B. was in possession, one Robert T. Yarborough obtained a judgment against him, under and by virtue of which the said land was levied upon and the interest of the said George B. sold by the sheriff in 1867, one James Jones becoming the purchaser. At this sale notice was given that only the life estate of George B. Pearson was sold. James Jones subsequently sold to Samuel B. Clowney, who afterwards sold all "his right, title, and interest" to the defendant Hazel H. Yongue, and one William P. Yongue, warranting the title only against himself and his heirs. After this Hazel H. Yongue sold and conveyed his interest to the aforesaid William P. Yongue, who some time after this re-conveyed all of his interest to the said Hazel H. Yongue, who is now in possession.

George B. Pearson is still living, and the plaintiffs are his children. They have brought the action below, alleging that they are the owners in fee of said tract of land in case they survive their father, the said George B. Pearson, junior, by virtue of the original trust deed; that the defendant pretends to be the owner thereof, and although often requested so to do, has refused to acknowledge in writing or otherwise the rights of the plaintiffs, or that they have any interest or ownership therein; that the defendant Hazel H. Yongue, has committed and is committing great waste, * * * and they demand judgment that the trust in their favor covering the land may be declared, the said Hazel H. Yongue being entitled to hold the land for the life of the said George B. Pearson, jr., with remainder to these plaintiffs and any other children of the said George B. Pearson, jr., who may be living at his death. That the said defendant may pay damages in the sum of $5,000 for the waste already committed, and may be restrained from all further waste, &c.

The defendant, admitting most of the allegations in the complaint, yet denied the title of the plaintiffs, and the allegations *of waste, &c., and for a further defence interposed the plea of bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, &c.

His honor, Judge Wallace, who heard the case, decreed, first, that the interest of George B. Pearson was an estate for life; that this was all that was or could have been sold by the sheriff; that the plea of bona fide purchase without notice was not sustained by the evidence; that the plaintiffs are entitled in remainder, should they survive their father; and that the testimony in reference to waste was not sufficient to enable him to determine that question. This question, therefore, he left open, "to be settled hereafter, when all parties who may be hereafter interested in it may be before the court."

The defendant in his exceptions contests the correctness of his honor's rulings upon several points involved, but in his argument here, before reaching these exceptions, he has raised a preliminary question, by way of oral demurrer, to wit, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This question has met us at the threshold and has been first decided, and from our view of it, the decision of the other points has become unnecessary, or rather, a decision as to those would be premature and wholly inoperative, as the parties now before the court may not be the parties in interest when the necessity for the adjudication of said questions arises. We may say, however, that we have very little doubt as to the correctness of the decree in regard to the estate of George B. Pearson, and as to the plea of bona fide purchaser, under the evidence as presented in this case, and as to the rights of such of the children of George B. Pearson as may survive him; but we do not see that the plaintiffs have such cause of action as warrants them in raising any of these questions, or in fact any question at this time in reference to the tract of land involved. Therefore we decline to pronounce any judgment thereon.

The plaintiffs in their complaint rely upon two alleged causes of action: First, they allege ownership of the land, in the event they survive their father—in other words, they claim that they are contingent remaindermen. They then allege that the defendant has refused to acknowledge their claim, either in writing or otherwise. Secondly, they allege the commission of waste by *the defendant, for which they demand damages. Those two allegations constitute their cause of action.

We know of no principle of law or equity, or precedent, for a contingent remainderman to come into court upon a cause like the one first above suggested, on the ground that the party in possession refuses to acknowledge plaintiffs' right or claim. This matter is in doubt between the parties, or rather it appears that they differ in opinion upon it, and the plaintiffs invoke the court, not for any immediate relief (because in no event are the plaintiffs entitled to any immediate relief), but to have its judgment as to the ultimate rights of the parties, in the event that they are alive and in being at some future time.

As to the second cause, even admitting the commission of the alleged waste, and that a sum might be decreed against the defendant therefor, to whom would this sum be adjudged? Not to the plaintiffs certainly, as the facts now stand because they are admitted to be contingent remaindermen, their interest being dependent upon a contingency which has not happened, and which may never happen, and therefore never placing them in a position where they would be entitled to any portion of said damages. Suppose a decree was made adjudging the amount demanded for waste $5,000, what would become of this sum, in the meantime, before future events determine who shall be entitled thereto? And if it should turn out that other children than those now in being, should become the vested remaindermen, would the decree in this case bind them? It may be said, that unless these plaintiffs are entitled to an action, that here is a case, especially as to the commission of waste by the defendant, of a wrong without a remedy. We think not. It is not for this court to suggest proper proceedings in any case, but we may venture to say that there is a remedy within reach, wherein all the questions raised here could be brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and its full judgment invoked and obtained.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, on the questions determined, be reversed, not that we pronounce said judgment incorrect, but because the said questions *were not ripe for judgment. It is further adjudged, that the case be remanded for such action as may be deemed advisable.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result only, as I am not prepared to assent to all the views herein presented; especially as to the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice.

25 S. C. 168

STATE v. NANCE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Jury ⇨110.]

The Circuit Judge is the trier of the competency of a juror challenged for cause. The law does not prescribe the questions to be asked, but only indicates the points upon which the judge is to be satisfied; and if counsel are not satisfied with the interrogatories propounded, he should object at the time.

[2. Homicide ⇨203.]

Where the deceased, on the day before his death, said he never expected to get over his wound, and stated who had inflicted it, and soon thereafter became speechless, the judge did not err in receiving this statement as a dying declaration.

[3. Criminal Law ☞227.]

During the trial some of the jurors retired, for a few moments, to their room, in which some of the witnesses who had testified were sitting, but it did not appear that any communication passed between them. Held, that this was not such an irregularity as would avoid the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2257; Dec. Dig. ☞272.]

[4. Homicide ☞51.]

The testimony being that the accused, with others, attacked the house of the deceased at midnight and having been driven off renewed the attack, whereupon deceased rushed out again attempting to drive the assailants off, and received the wound from which he died, the Circuit Judge did not err in charging the jury that there was no testimony as to self defence or such as would raise a question of manslaughter.

Where the defendant relies upon an alibi there must be a preponderance of evidence sufficient to establish such a defence, or to raise a reasonable doubt.

The power to grant or refuse a motion for new trial belongs exclusively to the Circuit Judge, and from his decision on the subject there is no appeal to this court. This applies to a motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, July, 1885.
The opinion states the case.

*Messrs. Goggans & Herbert and John B. Jones, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. At the July term of the court for Newberry County a true bill was found against three women, viz.:

Vinnie Nance, Martha Lyles, and Amy Ruth-erford, for the murder of an old colored man, Daniel Kleekley, by striking him with a "rock" or stone. Upon motion of defendants' counsel, the presiding judge ordered a severance, and Vinnie Nance alone was put upon trial. At the request of the counsel for the defendant the jurors were sworn on their voir dire. When a colored juror was called the presiding judge propounded the usual question as to "relationship," &c., to the prisoner; but, the accused being a negro woman, when a white juror was called he omitted the question as to "relationship," and simply asked him "if he knew of any reason why he could not find a just verdict in the case, according to the evidence," and being answered in the negative, ordered him to be presented. No objection was made, at the time, to this mode of proceeding or any motion made "to introduce any other competent evidence in support of objection to any juror."

Sarah Ann Douglass testified "that on the night of June 27, 1885, between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock, three women came to the house of her grandfather the deceased; that she was waked by an altercation between the deceased and one of the women, whom she recognized as Martha Lyles; that when she came out the three women had hold of the old man and were pulling him down towards the woods; that she and her brother (a boy of about 14) and another boy ran out of the house after them; that she ran out with an axe in her hands and they chased the women off, after which she and the deceased and the two boys went back into the house and barricaded the door. Three women came back and attempted to force open the door, but failed. The women then walked round the house, and finally deceased snatched the door open and they all rushed out at them again to run them off from the house. Then one of the *women whom she recognized as Vinnie Nance, the defendant, threw a rock and knocked the old man down. The women then left and she and the boys carried the old man into the house where he died on July 1st, four days thereafter." She testified positively "that she recognized two of the women as Martha Lyles and Vinnie Nance; that she did not recognize the third; and that she saw Vinnie Nance, the defendant, throw the rock that struck down the deceased."

The solicitor then offered in evidence, as the dying declarations of the deceased, a statement made under the following circumstances: Robert Davidson was with deceased several days after he received the injury and until he died, certainly on Tuesday and Wednesday, the latter being the day on which he died. On Tuesday morning, just before deceased became speechless, he said that "he was very badly wounded and he never expected to get over it. Said he never expected to get over this wound," and in the same conversation he said that "big Martha and Vinnie Nance did him so—murdered him up—beat him." Motion to exclude the testimony was overruled.

The defendant introduced testimony principally for the purpose of establishing an alibi. The State offered nothing in reply. Before the commencement of the argument, several of the jurors retired for a short time to the jury room, in which the witnesses for the State had been confined during the trial, several of whom were still in the room. But it did not appear that there was any communication between the parties, thus accidentally thrown together in the same room for a few moments.

There were no requests to charge. The case being submitted to them, the jury rendered a verdict of "guilty." The counsel of the defendant made a motion for a new trial, and, that being refused, they now appeal to this court upon the same grounds, which we will now proceed to consider in their order.

The defendant insists that his honor erred in overruling the motion for a new trial, upon each of the following grounds: First. Because the jurors on their voir dire were not properly examined, the only question asked them being, "Do you know any reason why you cannot find in this case, a just verdict according to the evidence?" Section 2261 of the General Statutes provides that, "The court shall, on motion of either party in suit, examine on oath any person who is called as a juror therein, to know whether he is related to either party, or has any interest in the cause, or has expressed or formed any opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice therein, and the party objecting to the juror may introduce any other competent evidence in support of the objection," &c. In all the cases there is concurrence in the view that the Circuit Judge is the trier to decide the question made by the challenge of a juror for cause. See State v. Coleman, 20 S. C., 240.

We do not understand that the law prescribes any particular formula of questions required to be propounded by the Circuit Judge, but only such as will satisfy him upon certain points indicated. The words of the provision are, "to know whether," &c. If the counsel for the accused considered the examination by the court as perfunctory or otherwise unsatisfactory, the objection should have been made at the time, or other evidence offered to support the objections to any particular juror. It does not appear that there is even an allegation of a well grounded objection to a single juror, who was sworn in the case. When a white juror was called, it seems that the judge did not consider it necessary to make enquiry whether he was "related" to the accused, who was a negro woman, and we cannot say that such omission was error of law. "The presiding judge must determine on the character of the questions proposed and when the examination shall close." State v. Coleman, 8 S. C., 239.

Second. "Because certain statements alleged to have been made by the deceased were improperly admitted as dying declarations." The rule is well settled that, when one who has received a wound, from the effects of which he is about to die, makes a statement as to the circumstances under which he received his mortal injury, such statement may be admitted in evidence as his "dying declarations," provided, "it appears satisfactorily that death was imminent at the time, and that the declarant was so fully aware of it as to be without any hope of life." Two days after he received his injury and the day before his death, the deceased, Daniel Kleckley, said to several persons that he was very badly wounded "and he never expected to get over *it, and that big Martha and Vinnie Nance had done him so." Was this statement made when death was imminent, and the declarant was so fully aware of it as to be without any hope of life? It is true that he said nothing expressly about living or dying or as to approaching death. But it seems to us, that, considering the condition and character of the deceased, he used equivalent words to express the idea: and soon after making the statement, he became speechless and died the next day. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the judge erred in refusing to exclude the testimony. See State v. McEvoy, 9 S. C., 212; State v. Quick, 15 Rich., 342; State v. Washington, 13 S. C., 458; State v. Gill, 14 Id., 415. In the case of Quick, the words were, "Leggett Quick killed me," and in the case of Washington, they were, "I am going to die and Daniel Washington killed me."

Third. "Because certain jurors sworn to try the case, after being empanelled, were permitted to be alone with certain of the State's witnesses in the privacy of the jury room, where the witnesses of the State were confined during the trial." It is true as urged, that in practice, great care should be taken, especially in State cases, to guard the jury against all irregular or improper influences. This is absolutely necessary in order to secure a pure administration of justice. But there may be objections more fanciful than real. In this case it does not appear that the jurors, who, before the argument commenced, retired for a moment into the jury room, held any communication whatever with the witnesses still there: and we cannot regard this accidental circumstance as an irregularity of so grave a character as should set aside the verdict. See McCarty v.

McCarty, 4 Rich., 598; Smith v. Culbertson, 9 Id., 106; State v. Tindall, 10 Id., 212.

Fourth. "His honor erred in charging the jury that a preponderance of testimony was necessary to establish the alibi or raise a reasonable doubt. And that there was no testimony as to self-defence, or such as would raise a question of manslaughter." &c. In charging the jury, a judge cannot be expected to state the whole law, which would often be confusing and misleading; but only such of it as is applicable to the facts *proved. In this case it seems that an old man, living with his grandchildren, was assailed in his house at night by three women. We fail to find in the testimony that the deceased, Kleckley, "rushed out with an uplifted axe and chased some persons down the hill, and when they returned and called him out to speak to him, he again ran out with axe in hand, and was struck the blow while advancing upon them," &c.

The witness, Sarah Ann Douglass, testified that when she first saw them "the three women had hold of the old man (the deceased), and were pulling him down towards the woods; that she ran out with an axe in her hands, and they chased the women off." After which she and the deceased and the two boys went back into the house and barricaded the door; three women came back, and failing to force it open, walked around the house, and finally the deceased "snatched the door open" and they all rushed out at them again "to run them off from the house; that then Vinnie Nance threw a rock and knocked the old man down," &c., of which injury he died. In this midnight attack upon the domicile of this old man, he had the right to defend himself and his premises. The whole trouble was caused by the three women, who were the aggressors from the beginning to the end. We cannot hold that the judge erred in charging that there was no testimony as to self defence, or such as could raise a question of manslaughter.

Nor can we say that he erred in charging the jury that "a preponderance of evidence was necessary to establish the alibi or raise a reasonable doubt." If a party charged with crime pleads a particular defense, such as insanity or an alibi, the fact must be proved as it is alleged by him. Preponderance of evidence is the lowest degree capable of producing conviction. Less cannot be required of one whose duty it is to establish a particular fact, subject, of course, to the general rule that a party charged with crime is entitled to the benefit of all reasonable doubts. "Where the State proves a prima facie case and a special defence, such as insanity or an alibi, is interposed, it must be established by such a 'preponderance of evidence' as will satisfy the jury that the charge is not sustained beyond all reasonable doubt.

If not so established, the defendant should be convicted." State v. Paulk, 18 S. C., 515; State v. Bundy, 24 Id., 439 [58 Am. Rep. 263]; Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. [Mass.] 323 [52 Am. Dec. 711]; Johnson v. State, 59 Ga., 142.

The fifth exception complains that the act of the legislature which fixed the time for holding the court at which the defendant was convicted, was unconstitutional and void. We are not sure that we understand this exception, as the ground of the alleged unconstitutionality is not stated. But the point was not pressed in the argument of defendant's counsel, and we suppose that it was abandoned.

Sixth. The defendant also made a motion before the Circuit Judge for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, which, being refused, she renews in this court. This alleged newly discovered evidence principally tended to discredit the testimony of Mary Ann Douglass, the principal witness for the State, by showing that she had soon after the occurrence, stated that "Martha Lyles and Vinnie Nance were there that night; that they pulled Kleckley down the road, &c., but she did not know which one or who threw the rock that killed the deceased," &c. (See the affidavits printed in the brief.) It does not strike us that the alleged newly discovered evidence was of such a character as to authorize the Circuit Judge to grant a new trial on that ground. But it is not necessary to go into that subject. In the class of cases to which this belongs, this is only a court for the correction of errors at law, and has no power either to hear an original motion for a new trial upon the ground of subsequently discovered evidence, or to review the order of a Circuit Judge refusing such a motion, except in the single case where the Circuit Judge refuses to grant such a motion upon the ground that he has not the power to do so. The power to grant or refuse a motion for new trial belongs exclusively to the Circuit Judge, and from his decision on the subject there is no appeal to this court. See State v. David, 14 S. C., 432; Steele v. Railroad Company, Ibid., 324, and the authorities there cited.

The duty of this court is rendered more painful by the fact that the defendant is a woman; but after a fair trial, and aided by zealous and able counsel, she has been convicted by a jury of the country of the crime of murder, and it only remains for us to announce the penalty of the law, which is, that the judgment *of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the case remanded to that court for the purpose of enabling it to assign a new day for the execution of the sentence heretofore imposed.

STATE v. BARTII.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Criminal Law ⚡776.]

The defendant, in his trial for murder, having introduced testimony of his good character, the Circuit Judge erred in charging the jury that the law limits the effect of good character to doubtful cases, and that only in such cases is it available.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1842; Dec. Dig. ⚡776.]

Before Cothran, J., Berkeley, October, 1885.

Upon the only point decided by the court, the opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Mitchell & Smith, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

July 6, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant was tried at the October term of the court for Berkeley County, for the murder of one James Hutchinson. The principal defence was that the killing was in self-defence, but he was found guilty of manslaughter, with a recommendation to mercy, and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. His counsel made a motion for a new trial, and that being refused, he appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "That his honor erred in charging that the good character of the accused was not a fact like all other facts proved in the case, to be weighed and estimated by the jury, but that its value was limited to doubtful cases; whereas he should have charged the jury that the good character of the accused is a fact fit like all other facts proved in the case to be weighed and estimated by the jury, and its value is not to be limited to doubtful cases.

2. "That his honor erred in refusing to grant a new trial. *when it appeared that there was an improper and illegal influence brought to bear on one of the jurors, to the prejudice of the defendant, by a constable in charge of the said juror, attending to a call of nature, as set forth in the affidavits of R. J. Magill and George F. Haselden.

3. "That his honor should have granted a new trial, it appearing that an impartial trial was impaired by the clothing of the deceased being carried into the jury room during their deliberations, and examined by them, or some of them, without the order of the court or consent of counsel for the prisoner.

4. "That on the motion for a new trial, his honor erred in excluding from consideration the affidavit of George Coleman, one of the jurors empanelled in the case," &c.

As to the first exception. There was uncontradicted testimony as to the good character of the defendant—that he was not given to seek quarrels, and was "peaceable and quiet." The court was requested to charge, "That the good character of the accused is a fact fit like all other facts proved in the case to be weighed and estimated by the jury, and its value is not to be limited to doubtful cases; on the contrary, it may create a reasonable doubt as to evidence, which might otherwise appear conclusive; and such also is the effect of the bad character of the deceased." This request was refused, and instead thereof the court charged as follows: "That request involves the consideration of what appears to be a solecism of law, or rather I should say a paradox. You have heard in every case you have sat upon, that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt; now, here is a request which says that the good character of the accused is a fact, like all other facts proved in the case, to be weighed and estimated by the jury, and its value is not to be limited to doubtful cases. The law does limit it to doubtful cases. That is the only class of cases in which good character is available; yet it looks paradoxical to say that a man would need the benefit of a good character in a doubtful case. Now, what does it mean? It is not a paradox when properly understood. Good character is not of any avail as against positive proof. If it were allowed to raise a doubt in the minds of the jury, it would be tantamount to saying to a man, you may go and commit one crime, and, your *character up to that time being good, the value of that character will raise such a doubt in the minds of the jury that you can be acquitted. That won't do. That would be licensing every one and any one in the community to commit one crime. What does it mean, then? It means this, and I can make it clearer by an illustration than by a definition. * * * Character is valuable in law, valuable in society, it is valuable everywhere, but only in doubtful cases; that is, as to the motive with which a thing is done," &c.

Was this error of law on the part of the judge? The law is tender to the life and liberty of the citizen. It declares that no man shall be convicted of crime unless the proof is clear "beyond a reasonable doubt," and, certainly when a felony is charged, it also gives the accused the privilege of proving his general good character; that is to say, a character inconsistent with the crime charged. In these rules of evidence we see no necessary paradox; there is between them no conflict or inconsistency, unless we limit the rule as to good character to doubtful cases. In that view it would seem that this rule is at least superfluous, for in a doubtful case the party is entitled to be acquitted under the general rule as to doubt, without any aid from that as to character. But does the law absolutely limit the rule as to good character to doubtful cases? If so, such evidence is made dependent, not on any established principle, but on what may be the facts of a particular case, without having the means of deciding in advance to which category, as being clear or "doubtful," it may belong. As we understand, it is the privilege of the accused, in all cases where character is admissible, to put in evidence his good character without regard to the other proofs in the case, and it is for the jury to consider it in connection with the other evidence, and determine what force and effect it should have.

It may be true generally that evidence of good character should have more weight in doubtful cases of a particular character; and we think some confusion upon the subject has arisen from this fact; from overlooking the difference between the right and the force to which it may be entitled, and from the practice of explaining to juries that such evidence is most valuable, or only valuable, in such cases. Most certainly the commission of crime *must have a beginning, and there is always what may be called the first offence, in which the previous good character, or at least the fact that the accused had never before offended, may be thrown into the scale. But it does not follow that even in such a case proof of character must necessarily result in acquittal. No doubt there are such cases where the other evidence is so clear as to utterly overwhelm the effect of the proof of character, in which, while good character may be proved, it is also proved beyond doubt that the party committed the offence. As such proof is not expected, and may not out-weigh all the other evidence, we can perceive no reason why proof of good character in all cases should not be considered by the jury for what it is worth. It strikes us that it is a mistake to suppose that such rule "would be tantamount to saying to a man that you may go and commit one crime and your character will save you."

In 2 Russell on Crimes, 786, it is said: "Juries have generally been told that when the facts proved are such as to satisfy their minds of the guilt of the party, character, however excellent, is no subject for their consideration; but when they entertain any doubt as to the guilt of the party, they may properly turn their attention to the good character which he has received. It is, however, submitted with deference that the good character of the party accused, satisfactorily established by competent witnesses, is an ingredient which ought always to be submitted to the consideration of the jury, together with the other facts and circumstances of the case. The nature of the charge, and the evidence by which it is supported, will often render such ingredient of little or no avail; but the more correct course seems to be, not in any case to withdraw it from consideration, but to leave the jury to form their conclusion upon the whole of the evidence, whether an individual, whose character was previously unblemished, has or has not committed the particular crime for which he is called upon to answer." And in a note is cited the case of Rex v. Stannard, 32 E. C. L. R., 681, in which Patterson, Justice, said: "I cannot on principle make any distinction between evidence of facts and evidence of character; the latter is equally laid before the jury as the former, as being relevant to the question of guilty or not guilty. The object of *laying it before the jury is to induce them to believe, from the improbability that a person of good character should have conducted himself as alleged, that there is some mistake or misrepresentation in the evidence on the part of the prosecution, and it is strictly evidence in the case."

In Wharton's Criminal Evidence, sections 66 and 67 (1884), it is said: "It has been argued by high authorities that good character is of weight only in doubtful cases; but the better opinion is to the contrary. In the first place, it is conceded on all sides that evidence of character, when offered by the defence in criminal cases, is always relevant. Technically, therefore, it is always material. If immaterial, it should be rejected as irrelevant; but it never can be rejected as irrelevant, therefore it never can be regarded as immaterial. To this it is answered that the court, when admitting it as relevant, does not decide on its materiality, materiality being for the jury; but this virtually concedes that the question is one of logic, and not of law. It makes the weight of evidence as to character dependent, not on any rules arbitrarily pre-assigned, but on the facts of each particular case. It is substantially argued by Talfourd, J., that it is a petitio principii to say that evidence as to character is entitled to weight only in doubtful cases, when really it is to make the case doubtful that such evidence is offered. In some instances in which guilt would be otherwise established beyond reasonable doubt, evidence of good character may justly produce an acquittal. But in all cases it is an item of proof to be considered by the jury." See also many cases cited in the notes of Benet & Heard to 2 Lead. Crim. Cas., 351, and 3 Greenl. Evid., § 25 (1st edit., 13).

This is undoubtedly the rule laid down by elementary works and leading modern authorities, and we have not been able to find anything in our own decided cases which conflicts with it. Only two have been brought to our attention, and they did not decide the precise point made here. The State v. Ford, reported in a note to the State v. Brown, 3 Strobl., 526. In this case the prisoner was indicted for stealing slaves. He made no proof of good character, but relied upon the naked presumption of innocence. The Circuit Judge stated to the jury that in two cases *proof of good character would make the scale preponderate in favor of a prisoner, viz., where his guilt depended on the legal presumption arising from his possession of the stolen articles, and in a case of doubt. Upon appeal the court said: "This ground is explained in the report (that no evidence of good character was offered). In a criminal case, character, to receive consideration must be proved. Indeed, such proof is the prisoner's privilege. He will be allowed (say the authorities) to call witnesses to speak generally as to his character. If he does not avail himself of this privilege, how can he claim any other benefit from the legal presumption that he is of good character, save that which is afforded to every criminal, that he shall be held to be innocent until his guilt be established to the satisfaction of the court and jury? It is in cases of doubtful facts or to rebut the legal presumption of guilt arising from the possession of stolen articles, that good character proved in court is of most effect. In each there is a possibility of innocence, and proof of good character adds so much more to that possibility, that a conviction would be wrong; but without that proof the prisoner has no advantage from character," &c. This is undoubtedly correct, and we see in it nothing in conflict with the rule as announced by the authorities herein cited.

The State v. Edwards, 13 S. C., 30. In this case the parties were indicted for grand larceny. There was proof of the good character of the defendant. The case went off on other grounds, but in commenting on a ground of appeal "that there was error in charging that testimony as to good character can have no weight, except in doubtful cases," the court say: "The charge that good character can have no weight except in doubtful cases might have the effect under some circumstances to divert the attention of the jury from the real importance of good character. The bearing of such evidence is directly upon the intent or motive to be ascribed to the conduct of the party, and the proof of good character may have the effect to call for a higher degree of certainty in the proofs of the conduct of the party than would be requisite if a notoriously bad character was shown. If a person of undoubted character is seen in the act of lifting goods from the counter of a store, an intent to steal could not be made out *against such proof of character, on testimony that might be abundantly sufficient to convict a notorious thief. While therefore the charge is not in itself necessarily erroneous, it is apparent that it might become so under circumstances easy to conceive. Its bearing in the present case need not be considered, as the case is disposed of on other grounds," &c.

We think it was misleading and erroneous to charge the jury in general terms that "the law does limit the effect of good character to doubtful cases; and that it is only available in that class of cases."

This makes it unnecessary to consider the other exceptions as to alleged misconduct of some of the jurors and as to the clothes of the prisoner.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the case remanded in order that there may be a new trial.

A person in actual possession of a part of a tract of land may extend his possession to the whole tract by producing a deed or plat covering the whole, and may claim title to the entire tract by showing his exclusive possession thereof under this color of title for the requisite statutory period.

But a claim under color of title is not shown by producing a grant and plat which had never been in the possession of the claimant or of those under whom he held; nor by a grant and plat of land, of no part of which land he had ever been in the actual possession.

*The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. R. A. Lynch, for appellant.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff brought this action in February, 1885, to recover possession of a tract of land described in his complaint as follows: "A tract of land situate in Richland County, State aforesaid, containing seven hundred and thirteen acres, formerly known as the Delozier land, bounded on the north by the lands purchased by William Bynum from Scott, and now in the possession of Mrs. Frances H. Shoolbred; also by land of Mrs. Sarah Ray and Jeff Tucker; on the east by land of Dr. William Weston and land of Lawrence Scott, on the south by land now claimed by Mrs. Jane Adams, on the west by lands of Alice Stack, G. A. Kammer, James Scott, and the estate of Dr. J. G. Huguenin."

The defendant interposed two defences as follows: "For a first defence, admits that she is in possession of about four hundred acres of land within the boundaries stated in the complaint, and admits that she withholds the same from the plaintiff; but she denies each and every other allegation in said complaint contained. For a second defence, alleges that neither plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seized or possessed of the premises described in the complaint, or any part thereof, within ten or twenty years before the commencement of this action, but that defendant, her ancestors, predecessors, and grantors, have held and possessed the said premises adversely to the pretended title of the plaintiff for ten and for twenty years last past before the commencement of this action under a claim of title in fee exclusive of any other right."

The plaintiff did not undertake to make out any regular chain of paper title, but relied entirely upon a title by possession acquired by those under whom he claimed. For this purpose he offered testimony tending to show that one Asa Delozier, who died in 1822, was at the time of his death, and for some ten or *twelve years prior thereto, in possession of a certain plantation in Richland County, the boundaries or extent of which were not stated; that by his will he gave all of his property to his wife, Hannah Delozier, who continued to occupy the same place, cultivating a patch of some four acres, and having some claim to a mill about a half or three-quarters of a mile from where she lived, upon the time of her death, in 1856; that by her will she gave her property to her daughter, the wife of plaintiff, for her life, with remainder to her issue; that she died without issue, whereby the property reverted to the heirs of Hannah Delozier, and that plaintiff holds a conveyance from the only living child of Hannah for her interest in the estate of her mother, and in the estate of her deceased sister, who was the wife of plaintiff.

The plaintiff also introduced in evidence an original grant and plat to Richard Jeffries for 300 acres, dated April 2, 1772, and original grant and plat to Moses Harris for 400 acres, dated June 4, 1786; but where these papers came from, does not very distinctly appear. The plaintiff's counsel in his argument assumes that they were found among the valuable papers of Mrs. Hannah Delozier after her death; but we do not find that these particular papers are anywhere mentioned in the testimony. The only thing which does appear in the testimony in reference to the finding of papers is what is said by Mrs. McLauchlin, the granddaughter of Hannah, when she was on the stand as a witness, and this is all that there appears: "Bundle of old papers presented to witness. I found these papers in an old box belonging to my grandmother. The box in which I found them was sent to my mother's house the day after my grandmother's death. The box had never been opened until I opened it. I carried the papers to my mother, who handed them to Mr. Stanley." But there is not a word in the testimony here, or anywhere else, to indicate that the two grants above referred to were in the "bundle of old papers" which this witness speaks of finding, and certainly nothing whatever in the testimony to indicate that either Asa or Hannah Delozier ever saw or heard of the existence of such papers. Indeed, the first mention we find made of them is when the plaintiff, near the close of his case, offered them in evidence.

*The plaintiff then offered the surveyor, who testified as follows: "I surveyed this land under the order of this court, but only in part for want of proper time. Notice short. No instructions. I made a very imperfect survey; but I surveyed enough to be able to say that the mill is located on the plat accompanying the old grant to Richard Jeffries. I did not fully survey either grant. The plats cover the Bynum land, or what I have always heard called the Bynum land. The mill is on one of the grants. Can't swear that the two plats are of adjacent territory, but believe they are. The survey was very imperfect. I found none of the marks and stations. They were all gone." A Mr. Styles, who seems to have been employed as an assistant by the surveyor, testified as follows: "I was requested by James D. Stanley to locate the land covered by the Richard Jeffries and Moses Harris plats. I took the plats, went into the neighborhood, tried the plats by the lines and by the natural objects stated in the plats. I found trees marked as on the plats at some of the corners. At some of them I did not find the trees on the plats, but I found other trees of the same kind." This witness also speaks of a diagram made by the surveyor and himself, which, however, was not in evidence, and, therefore, need not further be referred to.

Another witness, W. B. McLauchlin, whose testimony seems to be much relied on by appellant's counsel, after saying that he was employed by Mr. Adams, as executor of Wm. Bynum to rebuild the Delozier mill, proceeded as follows: "He told me to get all the timber to rebuild the mill from the Delozier tract. Tom Bynum, his overseer, pointed out the lines of the Delozier plantation to me. Recently I have gone over the same ground and recognize the lines pointed out to me. The lands seemed to contain 700 or 800 acres." But as neither this witness nor any other, so far as we have been able to discover, has undertaken to give the boundaries of what he calls the Delozier tract, and certainly not to identify such boundaries with those set out in the complaint, we are at a loss to perceive the pertinency or effect of his testimony.

At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for a non-suit upon two grounds: 1st. Because the plaintiff has failed to show title to the premises sued for, or any part thereof. 2d. *Because, if the plaintiff could be regarded as having shown title to a part of the premises sued for, he has wholly failed to show that defendant is in possession of that part."

Judge Hudson granted the motion, giving as his reasons therefor the following: 1. Because plaintiff claims under two grants from the State, one for 300 acres to Richard Jeffries, April 2, 1772, the other for 400 acres to Moses Harris, June 5, 1786; but to neither of these grants did he trace his title by a chain of conveyances. In his efforts to do so he traced the links of his chain to the will of Asa Delozier, probated in 1822. From what source Asa Delozier derived his title, was not made to appear. 2. The plaintiff was, therefore, compelled to rely upon the long possession of Asa Delozier and his devisee, Hannah Delozier. Of course, then, it was essential to establish the location and extent of the possession. The pedis possessio of Hannah Delozier was confined to a small patch of about four acres, with some evidence of a claim to a mill-house some distance from her dwelling. But there was no legal color of title put in evidence, which in law could extend her constructive possession, because there was no evidence that she claimed for the statutory period any defined territory under a legal color of title. No deed, no plat, no line of marked trees connecting the little homestead with the mill, and claimed by her so to connect it, was offered in evidence. 3. But a greater want still remained to be supplied, and this was not done. Even had the plaintiff shown the limits and boundaries of the actual constructive possession of Hannah Delozier (and this he did not do), it next devolved on him to show that the defendant is a trespasser within that area. Of this fact there was no evidence. He failed to show the location of any trespass or adverse claim of the defendant. It devolved on him to show, first, the extent of Hannah Delozier's title by possession, actual and constructive; and, secondly, that this title covered the trespass of the defendant. In both these essentials he failed, and hence the non-suit. By failure I mean a total want of evidence."

From this judgment plaintiff appeals upon various grounds, which need not be set out in detail here, for we think they may all be resolved into two general questions: 1st. Did the plaintiff fail to adduce any testimony tending to show that he had title to *the premises described in the complaint, or any part thereof? 2d. Did he fail to offer any testimony tending to show that the defendant was in possession of, or had trespassed upon the premises, or any part thereof described in the complaint, to which plaintiff had offered testimony tending to show title in himself? If both or either of these questions must be answered in the affirmative, then the non-suit was properly granted; but if they must both be answered in the negative, then the non-suit was improperly granted. For the plaintiff, to maintain his action, must establish two things—first, that he has title to the premises described in the complaint, or some part thereof; and, second, that the defendant has trespassed on such premises, or some part thereof. Hence, if the plaintiff has failed to present any testimony tending to prove either one of these propositions, both of which are not only material, but absolutely essential to the maintenance of his action, then the non-suit is proper.

First, then, let us inquire whether there was any testimony tending to show that plaintiff had title to the premises described in the complaint, or any part thereof. It is conceded that he has not shown any paper title at all, but he may, as he has done, rely upon title by possession—not his own possession, but the possession of those under whom he claims, viz., Asa Delozier and Hannah Delozier. Our first inquiry, therefore, is whether there is any testimony that either Asa or Hannah Delozier ever had any possession within the boundaries of the tract of land described in the complaint. We confess that we have not been able to find any such testimony. It is true that there is testimony to the effect that Asa Delozier for some ten or twelve years, and perhaps longer, prior to his death was in possession of a plantation in Richland County called his place, but there is not the slightest testimony tending to show where such plantation was located, or what was its extent, until we come to the testimony as to the possession of the same place by Hannah Delozier. It is quite certain, therefore, that there has been an entire failure to show any title by possession in Asa Delozier to any particular spot of land, and most certainly not to any land within the boundaries set out in the complaint.

Then as to the possession of Hannah Delozier. While there is testimony showing that she had possession of about four acres of land, with some claim to a mill near by, no witness has undertaken to define the limits of such possession, or the location of the four acres which she occupied and used, or of the mill near by: and there is not a shadow of testimony tending to show that either the four acres or the mill are within the boundaries set out in the complaint. If, however, the plats attached to the grants to Jeffries and Harris can be used as color of title in her, then upon well settled principles they may be resorted to, to extend her possession to the limits embraced within those plats, provided it does not conflict with the possession of some one having a better title within such limits: for, according to the testimony of the surveyor, the patch of four acres and the mill are both within the lines of the Jeffries grant: but whether these two grants adjoin, does not appear.

The only witness who speaks as to this is the surveyor, who says: "Can't swear that the two plats are of adjacent territory, but believe they are." Now, when it is seen that the survey was "a very imperfect survey," (to use the language of the surveyor himself), it seems pretty clear that his expression of belief that these two tracts of land adjoined, was a mere conjecture, and not an expression of opinion based upon information derived from an actual survey: for if he had made such survey, he would have been able to say whether they were adjoining tracts, and he tells us that he did not make anything like a complete survey, his language being, "I surveyed enough to be able to say that the mill is located on the plat accompanying the old grant to Richard Jeffries. I did not fully survey either grant," and he says nothing whatever as to the lines of the Harris plat, or what land is embraced therein.

But taking the most favorable view for the appellant, and assuming for the purpose of this inquiry that the two grants are adjoining, let us consider whether these two plats, one or both, can be used as color of title to extend Hannah Delozier's possession to the limits of the lines of those plats. When a person is in the actual occupation, has pedis possessio, of a part of a tract of land, he may extend his possession over the whole tract, by producing a plat or deed covering the whole tract, or otherwise *showing that he claims to be in possession of the whole tract: and when such possession is of such a character, and has continued long enough to give him a title, he thereby acquires as good a title as if he had produced a regular chain of paper title. But it is necessary for him to show not only his possessio pedis of a part of the tract, for the requisite length of time, but also to define clearly the limits to which he claims by virtue of such possession, and that he has for the requisite length of time made such claim. A man may have had actual occupancy of a small part, say five acres, of a tract containing 1,000 acres for nine years, without any plat, deed, or other color of title indicating that he claims, by virtue of such possession, the whole tract, and if he should, upon the expiration of the ninth year, have a plat made covering the whole tract, we do not think that he could by such color of title, at the expiration of the next year, claim to have thereby established his title to the whole tract; for while the evidence of his possession of the five acres would be amply sufficient to establish his title to that portion of the tract, there would be no evidence whatever that he had claimed to hold by possession the balance of the tract for a longer period than one year, and, therefore, no evidence by which his possession of a part of the tract could be extended over the whole tract for a period sufficiently long to give him a title to the whole tract.

We think, therefore, that it is necessary, in such a case, to show, not only an actual occupation of a part of the tract for the requisite length of time, but also there must be some evidence from which it can be inferred that the occupant has, by virtue of such pedis possessio, claimed the whole tract for the same length of time; for his possession outside of his pedis possessio cannot be said to begin until he acquires color of title extending such possession, or until he otherwise shows that by virtue of such pedis possessio he claims the whole tract; and, therefore he cannot be said to have established any title to the portion covered by such extended possession, until such extended possession has been shown to exist for the requisite time. This may be shown by the production of a plat made for, or a deed made to, himself or one under whom he went into possession, covering the whole tract, of the proper date for the purpose, or by any other *evidence showing that during the requisite time he has claimed the whole tract.

Applying these principles to the case under consideration, it is difficult to see how either of the plats attached to the old grants, afford color of title to Hannah Delozier so as to extend her actual possession over the whole of both or either of those grants. There certainly is not the shadow of any evidence that either of these grants were ever in the possession of Asa Delozier or were ever seen or ever heard of by him; and we do not see any evidence that they were ever in the possession of Hannah Delozier, or even their existence known to her. For though, as we have said above, the counsel for appellant has assumed that these grants were found amongst Hannah Delozier's valuable papers at her death, yet we have heretofore recited all the testimony appearing in the record upon that subject, and we look in vain for any evidence that these two grants were in the bundle of old papers found by Mrs. McLauchlin in the box of Hannah Delozier. She does not say so, and no other witness says so, and we do not see how we can infer that it was so. But waiving this, and assuming that these two old grants were in the bundle of papers referred to by that witness, we look in vain for any evidence as to how or when Hannah Delozier acquired possession of them, or any evidence whatever that she ever, at any time, set up any claim to hold possession of all the land embraced within the plats attached to said grants, or even that she ever knew of their existence.

But even assuming that there was evidence tending to show that Hannah Delozier had possession of these grants for the requisite length of time, and that by virtue thereof she claimed to extend her possession over both of the tracts, we do not see how this would help the plaintiff. It might show that the plaintiff had offered testimony tending to show title by possession to all the land embraced within the lines of the Jeffries grant, inasmuch as there is some testimony tending to show that Hannah Delozier, under whom plaintiff claims, was in the actual occupation of a part of that grant, but we look in vain for any testimony whatever tending to show that the Jeffries grant covers a foot of land embraced in the complaint. Indeed, there is, throughout the whole testimony, a singular absence of any reference whatever to the boundaries of the land set out in the complaint.

But even conceding that the plaintiff, by using the Jeffries grant and plat as color of title, has established title by possession to the whole of that grant, where is there any evidence of such title to the Harris grant? To state it most strongly for the plaintiff, it is at least doubtful whether these two grants adjoin, but assuming that they do, how is it possible for the possession on the Jeffries grant to be extended so as to cover the Harris grant, even if the latter should be regarded as affording color of title in Hannah Delozier? Color of title is of no avail whatever except in aid of actual possession within the lines embraced in such color of title, and there is not a particle of testimony that Hannah Delozier ever had possession of any portion of the Harris grant, or ever set her foot upon it. The fact which has been assumed for the purpose of this inquiry, that she had possession of both of these grants, and thus had color of title to both, may, as we have said, enable her to extend her actual possession within the lines of the Jeffries grant to the whole of that grant, but how can it extend her possession to the Harris grant, in the absence of any evidence that she ever had any actual possession within the lines of that grant, even though they be conceded to be adjoining?

The case which has gone as far as any other upon this subject is that of Alston v. Collins (2 Speers, 450), but that case is very far from coming up to the present. There the ancestor of plaintiffs had acquired the title to five tracts of land, contiguous to each other, in 1785. In 1787 a resurvey of these lands was made, and they were all embraced in one plat, the several tracts being designated thereon by the numbers from 1 to 5 inclusive. In 1838 these lands were devised by the ancestor to the plaintiffs, who brought the action against the defendant, who had been in actual possession of a portion of tract No. 5 under junior grants for a period long enough to establish a title by the statute of limitations. The plaintiffs' ancestor, by his tenants, had possession all the while on tract No. 1, and it was held that this possession extended over all the land embraced within the plat of 1787, and therefore that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover all of the land except that of which defendant had had pedis possessio for the statutory period. It will be observed in that case that the five tracts were not simply adjoining, but they were all owned by the same person, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, and by him devised to the plaintiffs, and more than that, the five tracts had all, as far back as 1787, been embraced in one plat of resurvey, and these circumstances were held to be sufficient to extend the possession on one of the tracts over all five, except where it was displaced by the defendant's pedis possessio.

But in the present case we find no such circumstances. There is no evidence that the title to the Jeffries grant and the Moses Harris grant was ever held by the same owner, and no evidence that these two grants were ever consolidated into one plat. We can see no ground, therefore, for extending the actual possession on the Jeffries grant to the land embraced within the lines of the Harris grant. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge that the plaintiff failed to show any evidence of title to the land described in the complaint or any part thereof.

But should we be in error in this, it would be necessary to inquire further, whether any evidence appears in the case tending to show that defendant was in possession of, or had trespassed upon, any of the land described in the complaint. No witness has testified that the defendant has trespassed upon, or is in the possession of, any land claimed by the plaintiff, or, indeed, of any land at all. To establish this part of his case, the plaintiff relies entirely upon the admissions in the answer. We will first consider the admissions supposed to be made by the defendant, in pleading her second defence. Waiving any question about which there might be grave doubt, as to whether the language there used would amount to an admission that the defendant was in possession of any portion of either the Harris or the Jeffries grants, which, so far as we can understand, is the land to which the plaintiff claims title, it is sufficient to say that it is well settled that where a defendant pleads two defences—one a general denial, and the other by way of confession and avoidance, any admission contained in the latter cannot be resorted to by the plaintiff to establish the issue raised by the former.

As is said by Pomeroy in his work on

Remedies, at page *743, section 724: "When a denial is pleaded in connection with a defence of new matter, or two defences of new matter are set up, the admissions in the one can never be used to destroy the effect of the other. The concessions of a defence by way of confession and avoidance do not obviate the necessity of proving the averments contradicted by the denial. This rule is universal." And again this standard author on the Code, at page 630, section 578, in speaking of the effect of the admissions of one of several defendants who have put in separate answers, says: "The same doctrine extends to separate defences of one party in a single answer; the admissions in a defence of confession and avoidance do not overcome the effect of a denial contained in another." Indeed, any other rule would, practically, deny to a party the right to plead a general denial, and a second defence by way of confession and avoidance. We think it quite clear that any admission (if there is any) to be found in the second defence here pleaded cannot be resorted to, for the purpose of establishing the issue raised by the first defence.

We proceed then to inquire into the effect of the alleged admission contained in the first defence. The allegations of the complaint are, that the plaintiff has title to a certain tract of land, described, 1st, as situate in Richland County; 2nd, as containing 713 acres; 3rd, as formerly known as the Delozier land; 4th, as bounded by certain land as specifically mentioned; 5th, that the defendant is in possession of said land and unlawfully withholds the same. The defendant, in her answer, "admits that she is in possession of about 400 acres of land, within the boundaries stated in the complaint, and admits that she withholds the same from the plaintiff; but she denies each and every other allegation in said complaint contained." From this statement of the pleadings it is manifest that defendant's admission relates solely to the 4th and 5th allegations as we have stated them above, and that every other allegation was distinctly denied. She does not admit, but on the contrary denies, that the land in question is situate in Richland County, that it contains 713 acres, or that it was formerly known as the Delozier land. All she admits is, "that she is in possession of about 400 acres of land, within the boundaries stated in the complaint," and as there is not a single *word in the testimony as to those boundaries, or any intimation even that the land within those boundaries was ever known as the Delozier land, or even that the land covered by the Jeffries and Harris grants, the only land to which the plaintiff can by any possibility claim to have offered evidence of title, is the land embraced within the boundaries set out in the complaint, it seems too plain to need further argument to show that the admission in the answer cannot avail the plaintiff as any evidence whatever to establish one of the material points of his case.

We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge that the plaintiff utterly failed to adduce any testimony of any trespass by the defendant upon any portion of the land to which he sought to establish his title.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

A mortgagor, being sued by strangers for the recovery of the mortgaged land, informed the mortgagee that he proposed to make terms with the plaintiffs, as he had been advised by counsel that the claim could not be successfully resisted; thereupon the mortgagee obtained leave of the court to make defence to the action, and succeeded in defeating it, and the property thus saved was worth more than the mortgage debt. Held, that the attorneys for the mortgagee were not entitled to payment for their services out of the surplus value of the mortgaged land.

5. This court concurred with master and Circuit Judge in holding that there was no collusion between this mortgagor and the plaintiffs in the action for recovery of the land.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, April, 1885.

This was a petition by R. A. Lynch and Bachman & Youmans, attorneys, to be paid a fee for services rendered in establishing the title of Gary & Tappan to real property in the city of Columbia, and that the amount of such fee be decreed to be a lien upon said real property. The case was referred to the master and afterwards came before the Circuit Court on exceptions to his report. The decree upon these exceptions was as follows:

The first and third exceptions of the petitioners in substance allege error on the part of the master in not finding, as matter of fact, that there was such agreement and collusion between plaintiffs, Reeves et al., and defendants, Gary & Tappan, as to constitute fraud. It appears that the defendant, Edwin F. Gary, chiefly advised with counsel employed by defendants, Gary & Tappan, in the Reeves et al. suit. It also appears from the testimony that, prior to the July term, 1882, of the court, the defendants, Gary & Tappan, were advised by their counsel that they could not successfully defend their title in the suit of Reeves et al. It further appears from the testimony that under this advice and regarding further litigation as hopeless, the defendant, Edwin F. Gary, either directly or through counsel, consulted with plaintiffs' counsel, both in the suit of Reeves et al. and in the suit of Dial, administrator, to ascertain the best terms upon which the defendants, Gary & Tappan, could be relieved of further litigation and expense in defending the title in the suit of Reeves et al.

It does not appear that the defendants, Gary & Tappan, actually received any pecuniary benefit resulting from such negotiations for a settlement. Having paid a considerable amount for the property in 1872, it was natural and reasonable in 1884, when advised by their counsel that their title was worthless, that the *defendants, Gary & Tappan, should endeavor, under the advice of said counsel, to secure the best terms of settlement that they could get. These propositions for settlement were not only submitted to the plaintiffs in the suit of Reeves et al., involving the title, but also to Dial, administrator, who was seeking to foreclose the mortgage. I think that the master's conclusion as matter of fact, that there was no intent upon the part of Gary to defraud Dial, administrator, is sustained by the evidence. The first and third exceptions are overruled.

The petitioners' second exception alleges that the master erred in not finding that the counsel for Gary & Tappan were passive in the proceedings referred to rather than inactive. Having concurred with the master that the defendants, Gary & Tappan, were not influenced by any intent to defraud Dial, administrator, it seems to me that the attitude of Gary & Tappan's counsel after the counsel for Dial, administrator, had assumed the defence in the suit of Reeves et al., is a matter of little consequence. The second exception is also overruled.

It appears that Judge Cothran has filed a decree in the foreclosure suit of Dial, administrator, v. Gary & Tappan, adjudging that the plaintiff is entitled to a sale of the mortgaged premises to pay his debt. From this decree the defendants, Gary & Tappan, have given notice of appeal. There can be no doubt that the petitioners rendered valuable services in sustaining Gary & Tappan's title in the suit of Reeves et al. If Gary & Tappan are liable for such services, I think the amount of compensation reported by the master is reasonable. It is clear that both Dial, administrator, and Gary & Tappan, have derived considerable pecuniary benefit from such professional services.

But the main question to be considered and determined is whether or not Gary & Tappan are legally liable to the petitioners for their valuable professional services rendered in sustaining the title in the case of Reeves et al. v. Gary & Tappan. The defendants, Gary & Tappan, contend that they are not liable for such professional services rendered by petitioners. As stated in Nimmons v. Stewart (13 S. C., 447), a claim for professional, like other claims for services, must rest on the contracts of the parties, express or implied, and can only be established on proof *of such contract, against the party who makes the engagement. This is the general rule, to which, however, there are exceptions on the equity side of the court. See, also, Hand v. Railroad Company, 21 S. C., 179.

There is neither allegation nor proof of any express contract or agreement between the petitioners and Gary & Tappan, with reference to the professional services of the petitioners. The ground upon which the petitioners rely is, that having established Gary & Tappan's title, they are entitled to an equitable lien upon the mortgaged property as against Gary & Tappan to secure a fee, said lien growing out of the mortgage and other proceedings above recited. The motion of Dial, administrator, to be allowed to come into the suit of Reeves et al. to defend the mortgagor's title was resisted by the attorneys of Reeves et al., but was not resisted by the attorneys of Gary & Tappan. The petitioners were allowed to come into the suit of Reeves et al. as counsel for Dial, administrator. It does not appear from the proceedings in the above causes, independent of the mortgage, upon what ground the petitioners can establish an equitable lien upon the mortgaged premises, for their services as against Gary & Tappan.

It is, however, contended that petitioners are entitled to compensation from Gary & Tappan, and to a lien upon the property under the covenant of warranty in the mortgage of Gary & Tappan to Asa Burke. The covenant is as follows: "And we do hereby bind ourselves and our heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said Asa Burke, his heirs and assigns, for and against us and our heirs, executors, and administrators, lawfully claiming, or to claim, the same, or any part thereof." In the case of Faries v. Smith, 11 Rich., 80, it is held: "A warranty in the usual form against the grantor and his heirs is a covenant of seizure and of quiet enjoyment, not against the world, but against the grantor and his heirs."

This warranty does not contain the language usually employed where a general warranty is intended. A covenant of warranty is to be construed as a contract, under which the parties can enlarge or limit their ability, as they see proper. See the proviso to section 1775 of the General Statutes. Under the covenant of *warranty in the mortgage above quoted, Gary & Tappan bound themselves to defend the title only against themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators. In the absence of fraud on their part, I do not think that Gary & Tappan, under their warranty, were under any legal obligation to defend the title against Reeves et al., especially after being advised by their eminent counsel that it would be a hopeless undertaking. If Gary & Tappan, under the covenant of warranty in the mortgage, were under no legal duty or obligation to defend their title against the claim of the plaintiffs, Reeves et al., there can be no implied undertaking on their part to pay the fees of the attorneys of Dial, administrator, for defending said title, as nothing can be implied contrary to the stipulations of the parties.

Counsel for petitioners cites 2 Jones on Mortgages, section 1606, which states that "Courts of Equity may allow a mortgagee counsel fees in defending his title without an express contract." The author in his notes refers to two cases in support of this proposition, to wit: Lomax v. Hide, 2 Vernon, 185, and Hunt v. Fownes, 9 Vesey, 70. I do not think either of these cases applies to the claim of petitioners. In the first of the cases cited a bill was filed by a second mortgagee to redeem, in which the senior mortgagee in possession was allowed his costs and expenses in foreclosure, and the latter case involved the allowance to the mortgagor of the necessary expenses in procuring administration upon the estate of a necessary party to the suit for foreclosure. I can find no case in this State in which the point raised by the petitioners has been adjudicated, and have not been referred to any authority in law, or established principle in equity upon which, in my judgment, the claim of the petitioners for counsel fees as against Gary & Tappan can be sustained.

The defendants, Gary & Tappan, contend that the petition herein cannot be sustained, as they have never been served with a copy of the petition or the order of reference. It is sufficient, on this point, to say that I cannot review the order of Judge Cothran directing service of the petition upon the counsel of Gary & Tappan, but must confine myself to the consideration of the petition, the master's report, and the exceptions thereto.

*It is ordered and adjudged, that the petition herein of R. A. Lynch, Wm. K. Bachman, and LeRoy F. Youmans, be dismissed with costs.

From this decree the petitioners appealed on several exceptions, which raised the points considered in the opinion of this court.

Mr. John T. Rhett, for appellants.

Messrs. Clark & Muller, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The petition in this case was filed by the appellants in re the two cases above stated, for the purpose of obtaining a reasonable fee for their professional services, in establishing the title of said Gary & Tappan to certain real estate in the city of Columbia, mortgaged by the said Gary & Tappan to Asa Burke, the intestate of Dial; and to have the amount of said fee declared a lien upon said real estate.

It appears that the appellants were retained as attorneys by Dial to foreclose certain mortgages on real estate in the city of Columbia, given by Gary & Tappan to Dial's intestate, a portion of the mortgaged premises being designated as the Gervais street property, and another portion as the Blanding street property. In the meantime, Sarah N. Reeves and others instituted an action to recover possession of the Gervais street property against Gary & Tappan, in which action the defendants were represented by counsel, other than the appellants, to wit, by Messrs. Melton & Clark. While these two actions were pending, viz., the action for foreclosure and the action for ejectment, and shortly before the commencement of the term of court at which they stood for trial, Dial, the mortgagee, learned through the appellants, his attorneys, that Gary & Tappan, having been advised by their counsel that no valid defence could be made to the action of ejectment brought by Reeves and others, proposed to make terms with the plaintiffs in that action, whereby, for a consideration, the defence would be abandoned.

This information was communicated to the appellants as attorneys for Dial by the attorneys representing Gary & Tappan in the action for ejectment, accompanied with a proposition to make terms with Dial, which proposition was declined by the appellants as attorneys for Dial. Thereupon appellants gave notice of a motion for an order directing Dial to be made a party defendant to the action brought by Reeves and others against Gary & Tappan, which motion was resisted by the counsel for Reeves and others, and advocated by the appellants, the counsel for Gary & Tappan taking no part, either for or against the motion. As the result of this motion, an order was granted: "That the said George L. Dial, as said administrator of the said Asa Burke, deceased, the mortgagee, be, and he is hereby, permitted to come in and defend the title of the said defendants, Henry L. Tappan and Edwin F. Gary, the mortgagors of the said Asa Burke, to the premises set forth in the complaint, and that Messrs. Lynch and Bachman & Youmans be permitted to enter their names as counsel of record in this cause for the said George L. Dial, as administrator aforesaid. * * * It is further ordered, that in the meantime the cause of George L. Dial, administrator aforesaid, against said Tappan & Gary, to foreclose the mortgage hereinbefore referred to, now also at issue in this court, be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the further order of this court herein."

From this time forward the appellants seem to have had the entire charge of the defence of the ejectment suit, which they conducted to a successful result, thereby establishing the title of Gary & Tappan as against the Reeves to the mortgaged premises,¹ which, according to the testimony, seems to exceed in value the amount of the mortgage debt; and out of such excess appellants claim that they are entitled to a reasonable fee for the successful defence of the title of the mortgagors. There can be no doubt that the appellants have rendered most efficient and valuable professional services, which have enured to the benefit of Gary & Tappan, and for which, as a matter of abstract justice and equity, they should be well compensated. The question, however, for us to decide is, whether there is any legal or equitable principle upon which a court can decree such compensation to them out of the property of Gary & Tappan.

*The question as to what will constitute a sufficient ground to base a claim for professional services as between attorney and client has been so recently and so fully and satisfactorily discussed by Mr. Chief Justice Simpson in the case of Hand v. Savannah & Charleston R. R. Co. (21 S. C., 162), that we need not go behind that case either for argument or authority. The underlying principle of that case is, that such a claim, like every other claim for services rendered, as between parties who are sui juris, must ultimately rest upon contract, either express or implied, made by the party to be charged, either directly or through some authorized agent or representative. As is said in that case: "No one can legally claim compensation for voluntary services to another, however beneficial they may be, nor for incidental benefits and advantages to one, flowing to him on account of services rendered to another, by whom he may have been employed. Before a legal charge can be sustained, there must be a contract of employment, either expressly made or superintended by the law upon the facts."

Testing this case by these principles, we are forced to the conclusion that the claim of these appellants cannot be sustained. It is conceded, and properly conceded, that there is no evidence whatever of any express contract upon which the claim can be based. Is there any evidence from which a contract can be implied? As we have seen, the mere fact that the services rendered by the appellants have enured to the benefit of Gary & Tappan is not sufficient to imply a contract to pay for such services; for it not unfrequently happens that professional services rendered by the attorney of one of the parties to an action contribute very largely to the promotion of the interests of another party to the action, represented by another attorney, and it has never been supposed that such incidental benefit constituted any foundation for a legal claim. As is said in the case just cited: "Thus it will be seen that such charges are allowed, not simply and alone because services have been rendered which have been beneficial to the common interest, but upon the ground that they were rendered by the authority of those having the common interest exercised by the representative, the compensation for which was to be chargeable to the fund protected or recovered."

*Now, to bring this case under the principle just stated, it would be necessary not only to assume, what may be conceded, that the mortgaged premises here constituted a common fund, in which Gary & Tappan on the one hand and Dial on the other had a common interest, but also to assume that Dial, when he employed the appellants to assist in the defence of the ejectment suit, was acting as the authorized representative of such common interest; and this latter assumption is not only without any support whatever in the testimony, but is directly in the teeth of it. These parties were not only not acting in concert, so as to authorize the inference that one was the representative of the other; but, on the contrary, they were at variance. Gary & Tappan, under the advice of their counsel, were unwilling to contest the Reeves claim, and unwilling, therefore, to incur any further expense or liability in conducting what they were advised and believed was a hopeless litigation; while Dial, under the advice of his counsel, was not only willing, but anxious, to carry on the contest, and for this purpose employed his own counsel, upon his own responsibility, and at his own charge.

Suppose it had been made to appear that Dial, finding that the counsel originally employed to defend the ejectment suit had no confidence in the defence, had proposed to Gary & Tappan to unite with him in employing the appellants, who were more sanguine of success, to conduct the defence, and Gary & Tappan had, in terms, declined to do so; and suppose that Dial had thereupon instructed the appellants to defend the action, and thereby became liable to them for the payment of their fee, and a successful defence had been made; would it be possible in such a case for a court to hold Gary & Tappan liable on a contract which they not only had not made, but had expressly refused to make, simply because the result of the defence, undertaken by Dial for the protection of his own interest, had enured to the benefit of Gary & Tappan? This would be directly in conflict with the principles laid down in Hand's case, supra, and subversive of the fundamental law of contracts.

Now, it seems to us that the case just supposed is no stronger than that which, in effect, appears in the testimony in this case. It is quite clear that Gary & Tappan, under the advice of eminent counsel, which, besides being of itself entitled to very great weight, seems to have been fortified by the well-nigh unanimous opinion of the Columbia bar, had lost all confidence in being able to make a successful defence to the action of ejectment, and had not only so informed their mortgagee, Dial, but had also expressed their purpose to make the best terms they could, either with the Reeves or with Dial himself; and that when Dial, being thus informed, made his motion to be allowed to come in and defend the title to the mortgaged premises, the motion was neither resisted nor advocated by Gary & Tappan. This conduct on the part of Gary & Tappan indicated as clearly as the most explicit language could have done, that they absolutely declined to incur any further expense or liability in continuing what they were advised and believed was a hopeless contest, though they would not, perhaps because they could not, interpose any obstacle in the way of Dial's continuing the fight, if he desired to do so, for the protection of his own interest; for it appears from the testimony that Dial's only chance of securing the payment of his debt was out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises.

Under this state of facts it seems to us that it would be straining a point to infer that Dial, in employing the appellants to continue the defence of the ejectment suit, was acting as the authorized representative or agent of Gary & Tappan; for to reach such a conclusion, it would be necessary to infer that Gary & Tappan had authorized Dial, as their representative, to do that which they had expressly declined to do for themselves. We think it quite clear that there is no evidence whatever from which to infer that there was any implied contract on the part of Gary & Tappan to compensate appellants for their professional services in defending the ejectment suit.

It is urged, however, that this matter is concluded by the order of Judge Witherspoon permitting Dial to come in and defend the title of his mortgagors in the action of ejectment. We do not so understand that order. Judge Witherspoon would not have had the power to appoint counsel for parties sui juris already represented by counsel of their own choice, and he did not undertake to exercise any such unauthorized power, as is shown by the language *of his order. He did not undertake to appoint the appellants as attorneys for Gary & Tappan; but, on the contrary, the language of his order was that these gentlemen "be permitted to enter their names as counsel of record in this cause for the said George L. Dial, as administrator aforesaid"—for the purpose of defending the title of his mortgagors to the mortgaged premises, as it was manifestly for his own interest to do, inasmuch as his only hope of realizing his debt would be out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, as it appears in the testimony that the mortgagors are wholly insolvent, and one or both of them have left the State.

Again, it is urged that Gary & Tappan, by the terms of the warranty contained in their mortgage held by Dial, was under an obligation to defend the title to the mortgaged premises against all the world, and that when the duty imposed by this obligation was performed by Dial, they were liable to him for the expenses incurred in so doing, and hence bound to pay the appellants their fee as attorneys for Dial. The covenant of warranty contained in the mortgage is in the following language: "And we do hereby bind ourselves and our heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said Asa Burke, his heirs and assigns, for and against us and our heirs, executors, and administrators, lawfully claiming, or to claim, the same, or any part thereof." Whether this language would amount to a general warranty (which might be open to serious question); and whether, even if it be a general warranty, Gary & Tappan were thereby bound to defend the action of ejectment brought by Reeves and others, subsequent to the mortgage held by Dial, are questions which need not be considered; for it is well settled in this State, that in action for the breach of a covenant of general warranty, fees paid to an attorney for defending the title by the covenantee cannot be recovered as damages. Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich., 380. And if Dial could not recover from Gary & Tappan, it would seem to follow that his attorneys could not.

The alleged fraudulent collusion between Gary & Tappan with the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit, which is relied upon by appellants as one of the grounds upon which they are entitled to *recover, being without the basis of fact upon which it rests, need not be considered. The master and the Circuit Judge concur in finding that there was no fraud, and surely their finding is not so wholly unsupported by the testimony as to warrant this court, under the well settled rule, in disturbing such finding.

Under the view which we have taken of this case, the question whether the fee of appellants can be declared an equitable lien on the mortgaged premises cannot arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SHAW v. BARKSDALE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ◊333.]

It has been conclusively determined by this court that the Court of Probate has jurisdiction to order the sale of the lands of a decedent in aid of assets, on the application of the personal representative or of a creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1375; Dec. Dig. ◊333.]

[2. Courts ◊475.]

Where two tribunals have concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first obtains possession of the subject matter must adjudicate; but it must appear that when the second action was instituted, there was pending in the other tribunal another action under which the relief sought in the second action could as readily be obtained.

[3. Executors and Administrators ◊338.]

An action in the Court of Common Pleas for foreclosure of a mortgage given by a devisee, did not prevent a proceeding in the Court of Probate by a creditor of the testator against the executor and devisees, to have this land sold for the purpose of paying testator's debts; especially so, after judgment of foreclosure in the first action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1416; Dec. Dig. ◊338.]

[4. Lis Pendens ◊25.]

Notice of lis pendens in the foreclosure suit could only affect persons claiming under the devisee, and not those claiming by title paramount. Has such notice any force and effect after judgment rendered in the cause in which it was filed?

[6. Mortgages ◊151.]

The right of an unsecured creditor to have the lands of his deceased debtor applied to the payment of his debts, is superior to the lien of a mortgage of such lands given by the devisee of the debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 317; Dec. Dig. ◊151.]

[7. Payment ◊66.]

The debt under which a decedent's land was sold could not be presumed to have been paid, although more than twenty years old, where it was reduced to judgment against the executor within the twenty *years. This case distinguished from Campbell v. Sloan & Seignious, 21 S. C., 301.

[8. Limitation of Actions ◊143.]

The admissions of a devisee, which prevent the running of a presumption of payment of his testator's debt, are binding in like manner upon his mortgagee claiming under him.

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, December, 1885.

This was an action by John D. M. Shaw and wife, Leonora, against C. D. Barksdale, master, Nathan Henry, executor, William L. Boyd, and John W. Henry, commenced January 26, 1885. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

I do not see in any of the dealings of these creditors any evidence of bad faith or unfair dealing, but only a struggle to secure the advantage of position from which to protect just claims, which they have allowed to be put in jeopardy by their previous dealings. If the title of J. D. M. Shaw under the sale made by order of the Probate Court is good, this will be conclusive of this case. Notwithstanding the able dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Moses, in McNamee v. Waterbury (4 S. C., 156), the ruling in that case seems to have been acquiesced in, and the Probate Court has continued to exercise jurisdiction to sell real estate of deceased persons for the payment of debts, and many titles to land in this State are now held under sales made by that court for that purpose. A Circuit Judge would not be justified in holding the question of that jurisdiction to be an open one.

I therefore assume that the Probate Court has jurisdiction to order sale of the real estate of Harrison Henry for the payment of his debts, if a proper case was made, and all necessary parties were before it. In this case the executor and the only heirs and devisees were before the court. In actions for partition judgment creditors of the several tenants in common are not necessary parties, and the purchaser of the land sold under proceedings for partition takes title free from any lien or encumbrance created by such judgment. See Simmons v. Simmons, Harp. Eq., 256; Garvin v. Garvin, 1 S. C., 62, where the authorities are cited. In Keekeley v.

Moore (2 Strob. Eq., 24), Chancellor *Dunkin, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "To require the judgment and other lien creditors of all the distributees to be made parties to a suit for the partition of the estate of the intestate, would introduce a novelty in the practice of the court, and encumber the proceedings with delay and expense, not calculated to promote the final settlement and adjustment of estates between the parties in interest, which is a leading object of the act of 1791."

A mortgage is nothing more than a security for the payment of a debt, and there is no reason which would make a mortgagee of one of the tenants in common a necessary party to a suit for partition which would not require a judgment creditor of the tenant in common to be made a party. The tenants in common have no rights not subordinate to the rights of the co-tenant to have a partition, and in the same way their rights are subordinate to those of the creditors of the deceased, and all who take under them take subject to these disabilities. There may be an exception where one or more tenants in common transfer their entire interest. If the rule prevails in matters of partition, it should prevail, and for the same reasons, in actions for the sale of real estate to pay the debts of a deceased person. When the action is in the Common Pleas, the lien creditors of the individual co-tenant have their liens transferred to the fund, and the purchasers have their titles discharged from them. See Simmons v. Simmons, Keekeley v. Moore, and Garvin v. Garvin, supra.

In the Common Pleas such creditors might intervene by petition or rule, and perhaps such might be a proper practice in the Probate Court. The mortgages in this case did not constitute such an alienation as could have defeated the claims of the creditors of Harrison Henry. Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C., 9. While the mortgagee of John W. Henry was not a necessary party, he would have been a proper party if the action had been in the Common Pleas, and perhaps also he might have been made a party in the Probate Court. If he had been, the only defence he could have set up so far as appears from the testimony, would have been that these notes held by J. D. M. Shaw had been paid in that there was a presumption of payment from lapse of time. This presumption could not have been successfully pleaded by *John W. Henry, because he conceded when he promised Shaw to furnish money to purchase these notes, and allowed him to purchase them, that they were then due and unpaid. This was somewhere between 1865 and the purchase by Shaw in 1872 or 1873, and probably just before 1872, when the first purchase was made. He certainly would not have been allowed to defeat Shaw in the Probate Court in 1883 and 1884 on this ground. If, therefore, W. L. Boyd, the mortgagee, had been a party to the action in the Probate Court, he would have been in no better position than John W. Henry, under whom he claims.

I do not think that there is anything in the case of Campbell v. Sloan & Seignions (21 S. C., 301) inconsistent with this view. See Weinges v. Cash, 15 S. C., 51; McNair v. Ingraham, 21 Id., 70, as to presumption of payment and statute of limitations. When the action was commenced in the Probate Court to sell this land to pay the debts of Harrison Henry, an action had been for some time pending in the Common Pleas to foreclose these mortgages to W. L. Boyd and W. L. Boyd as survivor.

It is said that the Common Pleas had first assumed jurisdiction of the case, and that therefore the proceedings in the Probate Court are void. In Witte Bros. v. Clarke, an action was pending to foreclose a mortgage given by a person who was in possession of land, and the court held that a proceeding in the Probate Court, commenced after the above action against the person in possession for assignment of dower, was void because the Common Pleas had assumed jurisdiction. Witte Bros. v. Clarke, 17 S. C., 317. The court seems to have regarded the claim for dower simply a lien on the land itself, and the plantation (Green Hill) as the subject matter of the action. It was here held that these liens for dower and under the mortgages should be settled in one action.

Whatever may be the principle on which that case rests, it does not seem to me to apply to this case. The subject matter of the action in the Probate Court was the interest and estate of Harrison Henry, deceased, in this land. The subject matter of this action to foreclose the mortgages of W. L. Boyd in the Common Pleas, was the individual interest of John W. Henry, which had been conveyed by way of mortgage to W. L. Boyd.

Each case could have proceeded on its own line, and after final judgment and titles acquired under them, the parties could have been brought to an issue in an action to recover the land itself. I think, therefore, that there was no conflict of jurisdiction, and that the proceedings in the Probate Court were valid.

I see nothing in the testimony to show that Mrs. Shaw in any way transferred any interest she may have had in this land to John W. Henry, even if she had any interest such as she could have conveyed without the intervention of her trustee, or that she would be now estopped from claiming it against the mortgagee of her brother. In my view, however, the whole estate of Harrison Henry passed under the deed to J. D. M. Shaw, and that the issues between the parties ought to be settled under this action to end the litigation.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the defendant, William L. Boyd, individually, and as survivor of Boyd Bros., and all persons acting under them, or by their authority, be, and are hereby, perpetually enjoined from selling under the said judgments for foreclosure, or either of them, the said 800 acres of land described in the complaint in this case.

From this decree the defendant, Boyd, appealed upon the exceptions set forth in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for appellant.

Messrs. J. T. Johnson and Y. J. Pope, contra.

July 12, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Some time in January, 1865, Harrison Henry, having first duly made his last will and testament, died seized and possessed of a certain tract of land, in Laurens County, consisting of 800 acres, more or less. By his will he directed that, after payment of his debts, all his property should be kept together for the support of his wife, and for the maintenance and education of his two children, the defendant, John W. Henry, and the plaintiff, Leonora, who subsequently intermarried with her co-plaintiff, John D. M. Shaw, with power in the executors to sell any portion of his estate and re-invest the proceeds, or to sell a portion if necessary, for the support and education of his children. He further directed that when his son attained the age of twenty-one years, his estate should be equally divided amongst his wife and children, the third intended for his daughter being settled on her for her sole and separate use, and then "to go to the heirs of her body;" and the third intended for his wife being given to her for life, with remainder to his two children, to be equally divided betwixt them. The testator's brother, John H. Henry, was named as executor, and his wife as executrix, of the will; the former of whom qualified as such and continued in the management of the estate until his death in 1872, but the executrix named never seems to have qualified. John H. Henry left a will, of which Nathan Henry was executor, who thereby became the executor of Harrison Henry.

The widow of the testator and his son, the defendant, John W. Henry, continued to live together on the 800 acres of land, which seems to have been the homestead of the testator, until the death of the widow, some time in 1875, after which John W. Henry continued to reside there, paying the taxes, but paying no rent, until the sale of said land under the order of the Probate Court, hereinafter referred to, when the plaintiff, John D. M. Shaw, the purchaser at that sale, went into possession and still retains the same. Some time in 1872 the plaintiff, John D. M. Shaw, bought a sealed note from the administrator of Col. Irby, on which the testator was surety, and in 1873 he bought another sealed note on which the testator was likewise a surety. The testimony shows that the original intention was that these notes should be bought by Shaw and John W. Henry jointly, but the latter finding himself unable to furnish the money necessary to pay his portion, the purchase was made by Shaw alone, with his own funds.

On May 22, 1880, John W. Henry executed two mortgages, one to Wm. L. Boyd in his own right, and the other to him as survivor of Boyd Bros., embracing the 800 acre tract of land, as well as other valuable property in the town of Laurens, to secure the payment of his own individual debts. In January, 1881, Boyd commenced his actions against John W. Henry to foreclose these mortgages, the notices of his pendens being filed on January 24, 1881, and a few days thereafter Shaw commenced his actions against Nathan Henry, as executor of Harrison Henry, on the two sealed notes which he had bought as above stated; and in all these actions judgments were entered in favor of the plaintiffs respectively, on March 9, 1881.

On October 13, 1883, proceedings were commenced in the Probate Court by Nathan Henry, as executor of Harrison Henry, against John W. Henry and Mrs. Shaw, who were then the only devisees and legatees of the said Harrison Henry, to subject this land to the payment of his debts; but there is no evidence that there were any others except those bought by Shaw and by him reduced to judgment against the executor, as we have stated above. Under this proceeding an order for the sale of the land in question was made by the Court of Probate on October 2, 1884, and after due advertisement the same was bid off by John D. M. Shaw for two thousand dollars, who paid the purchase money, received titles, and went into possession of the land. After some considerable delay, occasioned by the interference of other creditors of John W. Henry, the appellant, Boyd, proceeded to advertise the land for sale under his judgments of foreclosure entered March 9, 1881, whereupon this action was commenced to enjoin such sale.

The case was heard by Judge Fraser upon the pleadings and evidence taken in open court, who rendered his decree, in which, after stating that he saw no evidence of any bad faith or want of fair dealing on the part of the creditors, but only a struggle between them so as to secure the advantage of position to protect just claims, he said he regarded the question whether the title of Shaw under the sale ordered by the Court of Probate is good, as the turning point of the case. As to this, he held that the Court of Probate has jurisdiction to order the sale of real estate of a decedent for the payment of his debts where the personal estate is insufficient for that purpose; that all necessary parties were before the court when the order for sale was made; that John W. Henry could not in that proceeding have successfully interposed the plea of payment against the notes bought by Shaw, based upon the presumption arising from lapse of time, and his mortgagee could not; that the fact that the Court of Common Pleas *had, previously to the commencement of the proceeding in the Court of Probate, assumed jurisdiction of an action to foreclose the mortgages on the land, did not prevent the Court of Probate from taking jurisdiction of this proceeding to sell the land for the payment of the debts of Harrison Henry; and he therefore held that Shaw's title was good, and rendered judgment perpetually enjoining the appellant from selling the land under his judgments of foreclosure.

From this judgment the defendant, Wm. L. Boyd, appeals upon the following grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in holding that the Probate Court had jurisdiction to order the sale of the land described herein. II. Because his honor erred in holding that the sealed notes held by J. D. M. Shaw were not presumed paid by lapse of time. III. Because his honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs are not estopped by their laches from claiming any interest in the 800 acres of land as creditor or devisee, or to the proceeds arising from the sale of the same." The remaining ground of appeal is couched in such general terms as not to call for any further notice, under the well settled rule of this court.

The first ground of appeal involves two questions: 1st. Whether the Court of Probate has jurisdiction to order the sale of real estate of a decedent for the payment of his debts, in the event of the personal estate being insufficient for that purpose. 2nd. Whether, if so, the Court of Probate could, in this case, take jurisdiction after the Circuit Court had already acquired jurisdiction.

The first question has been so conclusively determined by the decisions of this court, that it is not necessary to do more than to cite them. McNamee v. Waterbury, 4 S. C., 156; Scruggs v. Foot, 19 Id., 274. In the latter case this language is used, which ought to be conclusive: "In McNamee v. Waterbury (4 S. C., 156), this court sustained a judgment of the Probate Court ordering real estate to be sold to aid personally in the payment of debts, obtained upon the application of the administrator of the intestate. This settles the abstract question as to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court to order the sale of realty to aid personally in payment of debts, but it does not determine in terms *whether this jurisdiction can be invoked by creditors as well as the administrator." The Chief Justice then goes on to show that it can, and it was so adjudged.

Our next inquiry, therefore, is whether the fact that, before the proceeding was commenced in the Court of Probate, by the executor of Harrison Henry for the sale of the land in question to pay the debts of his testator, the appellant had instituted an action in the Court of Common Pleas to foreclose a mortgage on the same land, executed by John W. Henry, would prevent the Court of Probate from taking jurisdiction of such proceeding. There is no doubt that the Court of Common Pleas, as well as the Court of Probate, has jurisdiction of a proceeding to sell the real estate of a decedent, in aid of the personalty, for the purpose of paying his debts; and there is as little doubt of the proposition that where two tribunals have concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first obtains possession of the subject matter must adjudicate, and neither party can be forced into another jurisdiction; but the question is, does this principle apply to the case in hand? We think it clear that it does not. It necessarily involves the idea that the claims set up in the two jurisdictions must be such as could be properly adjudicated by either tribunal, and it is quite clear that the claim of foreclosure set up by appellant in his action in the Court of Common Pleas could not have been adjudicated by the Court of Probate; and on the other hand, although the Court of Common Pleas would have jurisdiction of an action to sell lands for the payment of the debts of a decedent, provided the necessary parties were before it in such action, it is not perceived how the executor of Harrison Henry and his devisees, who would be necessary parties to such an action, could have required the appellant to make them parties to his action against John W. Henry to foreclose a mortgage given by him.

To make the principle relied upon applicable, it must appear that when the second action or proceeding was instituted there was another action pending in a tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction, under which the relief sought by the second action could as readily be obtained. This certainly did not appear in the present case, for, in addition to what has already been said, when the proceeding in the Court of Probate was commenced, the *action for foreclosure in the Court of Common Pleas was no longer pending, but had terminated in a judgment; and in addition to the other obstacles indicated, that circumstance would have prevented the parties to the proceeding in the Court of Probate from having themselves made parties to the action for foreclosure, even if they had encountered no other objection.

The case of Witte v. Clarke (17 S. C., 313), relied on by the appellant, differs widely from the present case. There the action brought by the plaintiffs had for one of its objects the ascertainment and settlement of all liens or incumbrances upon the land sought to be sold, and was actually pending at the time when Mrs. Clarke instituted her proceeding for dower out of the same land in the Court of Probate, where she obtained a judgment without the knowledge of the other parties interested, declaring her claim a prior lien to all others on the land in question; and there was no reason why she could not have had herself made a party to such action, and obtained all the relief to which she was entitled under the action. Here, however, the Court of Probate certainly could not have rendered a judgment of foreclosure against John W. Henry, and it is difficult to understand how, on the other hand, the executor and devisees of Harrison Henry could have required the appellant to make them parties to his foreclosure suit, especially after it had culminated in a judgment. The filing of the notice of lis pendens, even if such notice can be regarded as of any force and effect after judgment rendered, cannot affect the case. It operated merely as a warning to all who might purchase from John W. Henry that such purchase would be subject to any judgment that might be rendered in the action in which such notice was filed. But how it could affect the rights of those who claimed under a paramount title to that of John W. Henry, we do not perceive.

Our next inquiry is whether there was any error on the part of the Circuit Judge in holding that the sealed notes were not presumed paid by lapse of time. The testimony shows that at the time Shaw commenced his actions, and at the time he recovered judgment against the executor of the testator, the twenty years had not run out, and therefore the plea of payment could not have been successfully interposed to those actions.

*Hence it cannot be said in this case that the executor, through fraud or collusion, or even through negligence, has permitted a claim to be established against the estate of his testator. On the contrary, it must be assumed that the court, with the proper parties before it, determined that these notes were valid debts of the testator as late as March 9, 1881. In this respect, as well as in many others, there is a marked difference between this case and that of Campbell v. Sloan & Seignious (21 S. C., 301), for there the action against the executors "was not commenced until nearly three years after the twenty years had run out;" and, by reference to page 307, it will be seen that this circumstance was pointedly mentioned. Besides, in that case there were several other circumstances showing fraud and collusion, while in this case there is nothing of the kind.

It seems to us that where a creditor of an intestate in good faith recovers judgment against the legal representative on a bond or other like obligation before the twenty years have run out, that is a demand for the payment of his debt in the most effectual way, against the only person from whom such demand could legally be made, and the judgment is a judicial ascertainment of the fact that the debt is not then paid, and gives a new point from which the currency of the period necessary to presume payment commences, not only in favor of the legal representative, but also in favor of the heir or devisee of the decedent. This doctrine, however, cannot be applied where the action is not commenced until after the twenty years have run out, because in such case the presumption of payment has arisen before any demand in legal form was made by the creditor for the payment of his debt, and before anything was done by any one authorized to represent the estate tending to rebut the presumption. After the presumption has once arisen no act of the creditor, or any one assuming to represent the estate of the debtor, can have the effect of creating any new debt, or even reviving the legal obligation of any pre-existing debt, which has once lost such legal obligation by the presumption arising from the lapse of time. Under this view it is quite clear that there was no error in holding that the debts claimed by Shaw against the estate of Harrison Henry were not to be presumed paid by lapse of time: for although the *twenty years had run out before the commencement of the proceedings in the Court of Probate, yet such period had not expired before the actions were commenced by Shaw against the executor of Harrison Henry, nor before judgments were recovered in such actions.

But in addition to this we agree with the Circuit Judge that inasmuch as John W. Henry could not have successfully interposed the plea of payment, based on the presumption arising from lapse of time, because of his acknowledgment of these debts—the one in 1872 and the other in 1873—long before the expiration of the twenty years, the appellant, his mortgagee, claiming under him, could not do so either. So that in any view of the case we do not think the second ground of appeal can be sustained.

As to the third ground, it might be sufficient to say that we see no evidence in the record that the question of laches was ever presented to or passed upon by the Circuit Judge, and hence, strictly speaking, that question is not properly before us. But as this question has been argued here on both sides, and as it is somewhat connected with the question raised by the second ground of appeal, we will not decline to consider it. We see no ground for imputing laches to the plaintiffs in this case, and nothing to estop them from asserting their claims as against the appellant. John D. M. Shaw holds strictly legal claims against the estate of Harrison Henry, which, in good faith, he bought up long before they were affected by any presumption of payment arising from lapse of time, and these claims, within the time allowed him by law for the purpose, he sued to judgment against the only person whom he could sue. How, in the face of this fact, he can be said to have been guilty of laches, we are unable to see.

Nor do we think there is any more ground for the estoppel set up by the appellant. It does not appear that either Shaw or his wife did anything, or omitted to do anything which they ought to have done, whereby the appellant was induced to take the mortgages from John W. Henry. Indeed, the testimony shows that the Shaws knew nothing of the mortgages until after they were executed; and there certainly is no evidence that any conduct of either of them was calculated to induce the appellant to *believe, when he extended credit to John W. Henry, that the eight hundred acres of land belonged to him exclusively. True, he was in possession, but as tenant in common he had a right to such possession, and there were the records of the Court of Probate upon which was spread the will of Harrison Henry, showing to the appellant, and every one else, that he was such tenant in common with his sister, Mrs. Shaw, and there is not the slightest evidence that he had ever asserted any claim in hostility to her rights.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK OF CHESTER v. ATLANTA & CHARLOTTE AIR LINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Railroads ⇨259.]

A railroad company chartered by the State does not, by leasing its road to another corporation, release itself from liability for goods received by its line for carriage and not delivered. The lessor continues to be liable for all acts done by the lessee in operating the road, whether the cause of action be ex delicto or ex contractu.

Where time drafts, accompanied by indorsed bills of lading of cotton, were cashed by a bank, any arrangement between the drawee of the drafts and the shipper, unknown to the bank, that the cotton should be delivered to the drawee without the production of the bills of

The Circuit Judge properly refused to charge the jury "that if the jury find that the L. M. Co. was entitled, by its contract, to the cotton, upon its acceptance of the drafts, then

[6. Carriers ⚡57.]

The judge did not err in refusing to charge that the railroad company was entitled to timely notice of the non-payment of the drafts, otherwise the bank was not entitled to recover; because (1) the railroad company could fully protect itself by complying with its contract made before the drafts were drawn, and the wrongful delivery was made without any knowledge of the existence of the drafts; (2) the delivery was made before the maturity of the drafts; and (3) notice was given within reasonable time after the non-payment.

Before Wallace, J., York, April, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. C. E. Spencer, for appellant.

I. Whilst the railroad has a right to demand a bill of lading before delivery, its production is not necessary. Surely, the plaintiff has in no sense been damaged here, if the R. & D. R. R. Co. delivered to the party entitled to receive. The simple point contended for here is that the bailee is not estopped by his receipt, but that delivery to the party having the right of possession is a sufficient defence against the claim of the bailor. 93 U. S., 575. The instructions to the jury upon this point were calculated to mislead. II. The plaintiff took subject to the right of the L. M. Co. to the cotton (whatsoever that was) as against McCauley & Co. 1. This is true, even if plaintiff did not know of any right. A bill of lading is neither a negotiable promissory note, nor a bill of exchange. Code, § 133. 2. At best, it is only quasi negotiable. 2 Pars. Cont., 289; 55 Am. Dec., 290, 370. 3. But plaintiff knew, or was put upon inquiry, so it cannot plead a transfer in good faith, even if the bill otherwise falls under the exception in section 133 of the Code. III. There was evidence that, as between McCauley & Co. and L. M. Co., the latter was to get the cotton upon acceptance of the drafts. This evidence admissible. 1 Greenl. Evid., 225. McLure knew in June that the cotton had been delivered to L. M. Co., and proved debt against L. M. Co. afterwards. IV. The defendant was entitled to timely notice that the drafts were not paid, and that it would be held *responsible. V. There was no right of action against the defendant, if the R. & D. R. R. Co. was operating defendant's road at the time. The general doctrine is conceded that a railroad corporation cannot escape the performance of any duty imposed by its charter, by a voluntary surrender of its road into the hands of lessees. 17 Wall., 445. It is quite plain, therefore, that for all matters ex delicto, done or suffered by the lessee, the lessor is responsible. The practice is equally well settled that the lessee is liable to the same extent as the lessor would have been, while it continues to operate the road. 29 Vt., 421 (70 A. D., 426). The question was at first left open, however, as to the right to sue the lessor, when the cause of action was bottomed upon a special contract made with the lessee. 36 Am. Rep., 574. But it seems now that the recognized practice is to sue the lessee alone in such cases, especially where by its charter the lessor has the right to lease. Rorer R. R., 604, 605, note 5, 606–609; 10 Gray, 104. The charter to the defendant conferred upon it the right to farm out its road. 12 Stat., 440, § 4; 11 Stat., 348, § 13. "To farm out" is broad enough to cover a lease. 72 N. C., 637; 73 Id., 528.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, and Brawley & Barnwell, contra.

July 12, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, a common carrier, for damages for the non-delivery of two lots of cotton delivered to it for transportation to the town of Lowell, in the State of North Carolina. It appears that by some arrangement between McCauley & Co., merchants, doing business in the town of Chester, South Carolina, and the Lawrence Manufacturing Company, carrying on their business of manufacturing cotton goods in the town of Lowell, North Carolina, McCauley & Co. bought cotton and shipped it to the manufacturing company, drawing time drafts on said company for the price of said cotton, which drafts were discounted by the plaintiff bank as soon as they were drawn, whereby the said McCauley & Co. were placed in funds to pay for the cotton.

*When the two lots of cotton in question were bought by McCauley & Co. and shipped, they received from the Chester & Lenoir Narrow Gauge Railroad Company bills of lading of the following tenor: "Received of D. McCauley & Co. the following packages in apparent good order, contents and value unknown, to be transported in like good order unto order, notify Lawrence Manufacturing at Lowell," &c. The remainder of the bill of lading being immaterial to the present inquiry. When the cotton reached Gastonia, it was delivered to the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railroad Company, as appears by the receipt of its agent at that point, and was by the last named company, or rather by its lessee, the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, transported to Lowell, where it was delivered to the Lawrence Manufacturing Company without the production of the bills of lading, or any order from the said D. McCauley & Co. When the drafts drawn by McCauley & Co. against this cotton were discounted by the plaintiff bank, they had attached to them the bills of lading, endorsed in blank by McCauley & Co. and the drafts, detached from the bills of lading which were retained by the bank, were promptly forwarded for acceptance to the manufacturing company, duly accepted, and returned to the bank. When the drafts matured they were not paid, except a small part of one of them, the manufacturing company having in the meantime failed. Soon afterwards demand was made upon the railroad company by the bank for the cotton, which not being complied with, this action was commenced.

The defendant undertook to show that though the bills of lading were drawn to the order of McCauley & Co., yet that the understanding was that the cotton was to be delivered to the Lawrence Manufacturing Company so soon as the drafts drawn against it were accepted by that company; but there was no evidence showing that the bank was a party to, or even knew of, such an arrangement. Indeed, it would seem that such an arrangement, if known to and acquiesced in by the bank, would render the security afforded by the transfer to it of the bills of lading wholly worthless, and is altogether irreconcilable with the conceded fact that the bank retained the bills of lading when the drafts were sent forward for acceptance; for if the bank had understood that the Lowell Manufacturing Company was to be entitled to receive the cotton when the drafts were accepted, and not when they were paid, then, according to the usual course, the bills of lading would have been sent along with the drafts when they were forwarded for acceptance. On the other hand, it would be somewhat difficult to understand what advantage the manufacturing company would gain by purchasing the cotton on time drafts, if it could not obtain possession of the cotton until the drafts drawn against it were paid, but for the fact appearing in the testimony that the president of the manufacturing company had been the railroad agent at Lowell, and had been in the habit of delivering cotton to the company without the production of bills of lading, which practice had been continued by the new agent, and therefore it was not supposed that there would be any difficulty about it.

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment being entered thereon, the defendant appeals upon the following exceptions:

"First. For that his honor erred in charging the jury—

"1. That where goods are shipped, deliverable to the order of the consignor, the carrier cannot deliver them legally without the production of the bill of lading, properly endorsed.

"2. That a bill of lading is both a receipt for the goods shipped, and an express written contract for their transportation and delivery, and is so far a negotiable instrument that a transfer of it in good faith for value received is equivalent in law to the transfer of the goods themselves, it being a symbolic and constructive delivery of the goods, and in commercial transactions is regarded as a substitute for the actual, corporal transfer of the goods.

"3. That if the jury believe from the evidence that there was an understanding or agreement between the Lawrence Manufacturing Company and D. McCauley, or any other person, by which the cotton was to be delivered without the surrender of the bills of lading, such understanding or agreement was a fraud upon the rights of the bank, and the bank cannot be prejudiced thereby, unless such a mode of acting was brought to its knowledge and acquiesced in by it.

"*Second. For that his honor erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendant—

"1. That if the jury believe that the contract between D. McCauley & Co. and the Lawrence Manufacturing Company was that the cotton was to be delivered upon its arrival at Lowell, and the acceptance of the time drafts, then the plaintiff who discounted these drafts cannot recover.

"2. That the plaintiff cannot recover if the jury find the further fact that the plaintiff knew, or might by due inquiry have found out, that the Lawrence Manufacturing Company was to get the cotton before payment of the drafts.

"3. That if the jury find that the Lawrence Manufacturing Company was entitled by its contract to the cotton, upon its acceptance of the drafts, then the plaintiff cannot recover, even though it still holds the bills of lading.

"4. That the defendant was entitled to timely notice that the drafts were not paid, and that it would be held responsible by the plaintiff; and unless the jury find that such notice was given, the plaintiff cannot recover.

"5. That the plaintiff cannot recover if the jury find that the defendant was not operating the railroad at the time of conversion."

As the last exception raises the question as to whether the proper party is sued in this action, we will consider it first; for unless the proper party is before the court, it would be fruitless to consider or determine the other questions as to the merits. The first question, then, to be determined is, whether the fact that the defendant company had, at the time the transaction here brought in question occurred, leased its road to the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, which latter company was then operating the road, released the defendant company from liability in this case, leaving the Richmond & Danville Company solely liable.

When a railroad or other corporation receives its charter from the State, conferring certain franchises, rights, and privileges, it is upon the consideration that such corporation shall perform the duties and fulfil the obligations which it at the same time incurs. The fact that the corporation chooses to perform those duties and *fulfil its obligations to the community through another, whether as lessee or otherwise, cannot release it from the obligations which it has assumed by the acceptance of its charter. This doctrine has not only the support of reason, but is fully supported by the authorities. As is said by Mr. Justice Davis in Railroad Company v. Brown, 17 Wall., 445 [21 L. Ed. 675]: "It is the accepted doctrine in this country that a railroad corporation cannot escape the performance of any duty or obligation imposed by its charter or the general laws of the State by a voluntary surrender of its road into the hands of lessees." See, also, the Y. & M. L. R. R. Co. v. Ross Winans, 17 How., 30 [15 L. Ed. 27]; Abbott v. J. G. & K. R. R. Co., 80 N. Y., 27, reported also in 36 Am. Rep., 572.

We are unable to appreciate the distinction attempted to be drawn by appellants' counsel between the liability of a railroad company which has leased its line to another, to actions ex delicto and actions ex contractu. The foundation of such liability is that such a company has, by accepting its charter, assumed obligations to the community from which it cannot absolve itself by leasing its road to another company; and as such a carrier is not only under an obligation to carry passengers safely, but also to deliver goods entrusted to it for transportation, we think the same principle which would make the lessor liable in the one case would also make it liable in the other. In this case, however, it appears that the defendant company, by its own agent, and not its lessee, receipted for the cotton, and hence the contract must be regarded as made directly with defendant company, though its road may at the time have been operated by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company as its lessee.

Subdivisions 1 and 2 of the first exception involving, as they do, the true meaning and legal effect of a bill of lading drawn to order, may be considered together. That such a bill of lading, though not negotiable in the fullest sense of that term like a bill of exchange, or to speak more accurately, although its negotiability is not attended with all of the consequences resulting from the negotiability of a bill of exchange, yet that it is negotiable in so far that by endorsement the right to the possession of the goods mentioned in it passes, is well settled by repeated adjudications of courts of the highest authority, and is generally if not *universally conceded by the elementary writers. Conard v. Atlantic Insurance Company, 1 Peters, 386 [7 L. Ed. 189]; The Thames, 14 Wall., 98 [20 L. Ed. 804]; Dows v. National Exchange Bank, 91 U. S. 618 [23 L. Ed. 214]; Shaw v. Railroad Company, 101 Id. 557 [25 L. Ed. 892]; and Hieskell v. Farmers & Mechanics National Bank, 89 Penn. St., 155; 8 C. 33 Am. Rep. 745; McCants v. Wells, 4 S. C., 381.

The case of "The Thames," supra, was very much like the case under consideration. There, one Gilbert Van Pelt, one of the members of the firm of Bennett, Van Pelt & Co., residing in Savannah, was in the habit of buying cotton and consigning it to his firm in New York. The cotton in question was paid for by the proceeds of drafts drawn by him on his firm in New York at fifteen days, which were discounted by the agent of an Atlanta bank, and the drafts were accompanied by bills of lading issued by the vessel to his order, and by him endorsed to the cashier of the bank. The drafts, with the bills of lading attached, were forwarded to the Fourth National Bank in New York for collection, and were duly accepted by Bennett, Van Pelt & Co. The vessel arrived in New York the day after the drafts were accepted and the cotton was immediately delivered to Bennett, Van Pelt & Co., who at once sold it for cash, and, before the drafts matured, failed. Thereupon the cashier of the bank filed his libel against the vessel, claiming damages for the non delivery of the cotton according to the terms of the bill of lading, and the vessel was held liable.

Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "No argument is needed to show what is most manifest that the delivery which was thus made was a breach of the ship's contract. By issuing bills of lading for the cotton, stipulating for a delivery to order, the ship became bound to deliver it to no one who had not the order of the shipper; and this obligation was disregarded instantly on the arrival of the ship, and it is no excuse for a delivery to the wrong persons that the endorsee of the bills of lading was unknown, if indeed he was, and that notice of the arrival of the cotton could not be given. Diligent inquiry for the consignee, at least, was a duty, and no inquiry was made, * * * and if after inquiry the consignee or the endorsees of a bill of lading for delivery to order cannot be *found, the duty of the carrier is to retain the goods until they are claimed, or to store them prudently for and on account of their owner. He may thus relieve himself from a carrier's responsibility. He has no right under any circumstances to deliver to a stranger."

This case and the others above cited, which are equally strong so far as the principle involved is concerned, fully sustains the correctness of those portions of the charge which we have been considering. It is true that a carrier may safely deliver goods entrusted to him for transportation to the person rightfully entitled to receive them, even without the production of the bill of lading, but in such a case he takes upon himself the burden of showing that the delivery was to the proper person, and this he must show as a matter of defence; for when it is once shown that he has delivered the goods to one not holding the bill of lading, a prima facie case is made out against him, which can only be rebutted by showing that although he made the delivery without the production of the bill of lading, yet he has in fact delivered to the very person who, according to the terms of the bill of lading, was entitled to receive the goods. In other words, the bill of lading is his contract by which he agrees to deliver the goods entrusted to him for transportation to the person named therein or to his order; and if he delivers them to any one else and loss ensues to the person entitled to receive the goods, he becomes liable. This is what we understand the charge to mean when read in connection with the facts of the case.

The case of The Idaho (93 U. S., 575 [23 L. Ed. 978]), is not, as we understand it, in conflict with these views. There, Porter & Co., of New York, advanced a large sum of money to Forbes, of New Orleans, upon the security of a bill of lading issued by the brig "Colson," but before the cotton was actually loaded into the brig, Forbes had it transferred to the steamship "Lodona," and consigned to Schaefer & Co., of New York. The cotton, upon its arrival in New York was fraudulently transferred to the libellants, who, in collusion with Schaefer & Co., shipped it by "The Idaho" to Liverpool, and upon its arrival there was delivered to the agents of Porter & Co., as the true owners; and it was held that the ship was not liable, because it was clear from the evidence that Porter & Co. were the real owners of the cotton, and upon its delivery to them the ship was relieved from liability to the libellants, who held its bill of lading for cotton to which they had never been entitled.

Practically the cotton was stolen from Porter & Co., who were the real owners, and the case therefore really decides nothing more than this: that where stolen property is delivered to a carrier for transportation, and a bill of lading for it is issued to the thief or one of his accomplices, the carrier may defend himself from an action brought by the thief or one to whom he has undertaken to transfer the bill of lading, for non-delivery of such property, by showing a delivery to the rightful owner. This is upon the well settled principle that even an innocent purchaser of stolen property (except negotiable notes and bills of exchange) acquires no title whatever to such property; and hence the holders of the second bill of lading—the one issued by "The Idaho"—had never acquired any right whatsoever to the property therein mentioned, and consequently the vessel was under no obligation to deliver the cotton to them.

It is true that Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, does go on to say that the fact that the shipper had obtained the cotton by fraud on the true owner, made no difference, and that the same rule would apply, even if the shipper had been innocent, and had been merely mistaken as to his right to the property; because, if he had no right to the property, the carrier incurred no obligation to him, as against the rights of the real owner. But to say nothing as to this being a mere obiter dictum, and assuming it to be good law, we do not see how it could be applied to the case now under consideration; for there can be no doubt that at the time the bills of lading were issued to McCauley & Co., and at the time they transferred them by endorsement to the plaintiff bank, McCauley & Co. were the real owners of the cotton, and as such had a perfect right to direct its delivery.

As to the 3d subdivision of the first exception we think it is too plain for argument, that if there was any understanding or agreement between McCauley & Co. and the Lawrence Manufacturing Company, that the cotton should be delivered to that company without the production of the bills of lading, it would be a palpable fraud upon the bank, unless the bank knew of such arrangement at the time it discounted the drafts and acquiesced in it. The bank certainly required the bills of lading to be transferred to it as a security for the payment of the drafts, as is conclusively shown by the retention of the bills of lading when the drafts were sent forward for acceptance; and any such arrangement entered into by McCauley & Co. with the Lawrence Manufacturing Company (if, indeed, there was any) without the knowledge of the bank, would be a manifest fraud upon it, as it would destroy the security upon which it relied.

The remarks just made show that the 1st subdivision of exception second cannot be sustained, for even if the jury did believe that there was such a contract as that there mentioned, the right of the plaintiff to recover would not thereby be defeated, inasmuch as to produce such result the jury must also believe that such contract was known to and acquiesced in by the bank. It is clear, therefore, that the Circuit Judge could not properly have charged as there requested.

As to the 2d subdivision of exception second, we agree with Judge Wallace that there was nothing to put the plaintiff upon inquiry, and therefore, to charge as there requested would have been inapplicable to the case as made, and a refusal so to do cannot be assigned as error. The bank held the bills of lading, indorsed by McCauley & Co., by which the carrier contracted to deliver the cotton to the order of McCauley & Co., and there was nothing to make the bank suspect that the carrier would commit a breach of its contract by delivering the cotton to any one without the production of the bills of lading properly indorsed. The words, "notify Lawrence Manufacturing Company at Lowell," contained in the bills of lading certainly did not authorize delivery to that company, without the production of the bills of lading. These words, as explained by one of the witnesses, simply "notifies the agent at the point of delivery that there is a bill of lading out, and not to deliver until the bill of lading is produced. It means also that the consignee is to be notified so he can get the bill of lading and get the cotton." It seems to us that those words, taken in connection with the stipulation to deliver to the *order of McCauley & Co., clearly shows that the cotton, though intended for the Lawrence Manufacturing Company, could only be delivered to that company upon the order of McCauley & Co. Otherwise, that company would simply have been named as the consignee.

We also agree that the request which constitutes the basis of subdivision 3 of the second exception was properly refused, because it would have submitted a question of law to the jury.

As to subdivision 4 of the second exception, it seems to us that there are several reasons why the request therein referred to should not have been granted. In the first place, there is no evidence that the defendant knew at the time the cotton was delivered, that there were any drafts drawn against it.

All that it knew was that bills of lading had been issued by its agent, stipulating for the delivery of the cotton to the order of McCauley & Co., and it had the means of completely protecting itself by refusing to deliver except upon the production of the bills of lading properly indorsed. Whether any drafts had been drawn against the cotton, and if so whether they were paid or unpaid, was a matter of no concern to the railroad company. All it had to do was to comply with its own contract, as evidenced by the bills of lading, and if it failed to do so, it must respond for any damages sustained by the lawful holder of the bill of lading, by reason of its failure to perform its contract. The drafts were not drawn until after the railroad company had made its contract by issuing the bills of lading, and therefore could not in any way affect the obligation which it thereby assumed. We do not see, then, that the defendant was entitled to any notice of the non-payment of the drafts.

But, in the second place, it appears that the cotton was delivered to the manufacturing company before the maturity of the drafts, and therefore it would have been impossible to notify the railroad company of the non-payment of the drafts in time to prevent an improper delivery of the cotton. In the third place, it appears from the evidence that notice was given to the railroad company within a reasonable time after the non-payment of the drafts.

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. 228

COLVIN v. PHILLIPS.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Judgment ⇨866.]

Section 131 of the Code of Procedure, declaring that no acknowledgment shall be sufficient to revive a debt unless it be in writing, &c., does not apply to a judgment obtained in 1861; for in such case the right of action accrued before the code was enacted, notwithstanding the change thereby effected in the mode of renewing a judgment, and therefore such judgment is specially excepted from the provisions of this section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1604; Dec. Dig. ⇨866.]

[2. Witnesses ⇨160.]

The proviso to section 400 of the Code, being an exception engrafted on a general rule, does not render testimony inadmissible unless it falls within the express terms of the proviso.

[3. Witnesses ⇨160.]

In action against the administrator of a deceased judgment debtor prosecuted by the assignee of the judgment, the plaintiff may testify to a conversation between his assignor, then the owner of the judgment, and the judgment debtor, now deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 696; Dec. Dig. ⚡160.]

14. Judgment ⚡876.]

The revival of the execution by the original plaintiff, his payment of the costs, and his assignment of the judgment were all ex parte acts, and could not affect the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1650; Dec. Dig. ⚡876.]

15. Payment ⚡66.]

A naked admission of a subsisting legal obligation is sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment up to that time, if made before the presumption has become complete. From such admission the law implies a new promise, which alone constitutes the cause of action.

16. Payment ⚡66.]

In action instituted in 1885, to revive a judgment obtained in 1861, inquiries made by the debtor (now deceased) to the creditor in 1870, as to what sum he would take for this judgment, are not such an acknowledgment as would defeat the presumption of payment.

Before Hudson, J., Chester, March, 1886.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. W. A. Sanders, for appellant.

Mr. Giles J. Patterson, contra.

*229

*Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a summons to revive a judgment and renew an execution, issued June 29, 1885, against the administrator of the defendant. It appears that on September 30, 1861, one Nicholas Colvin recovered judgment against the defendant Phillips for eight hundred and fifty three 41-100 dollars, and on October 1, 1861, the first execution issued thereon was lodged in the sheriff's office. On March 3, 1866, a second execution was issued and lodged in the sheriff's office, and on February 7, 1870, the plaintiff, Nicholas Colvin, paid to the sheriff the costs on said judgment. The administrator of Phillips showed for cause why the execution should not be renewed, the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. To rebut this presumption the present plaintiff, to whom the judgment and execution had been assigned, on January 22, 1884, by his father, Nicholas Colvin, offered himself as a witness to prove a conversation between his father, who died in April, 1884, and Phillips.

This testimony was duly objected to as incompetent both under section 131 and section 400 of the Code of Procedure. The objection was overruled by the referee: to whom it had been referred to take the testimony in the case, and the present plaintiff testified as follows: "I am the owner of the judgment and execution in this case. No part thereof has ever been paid to me, and no part thereof was ever paid to Nicholas Colvin, as far as I know. A short time before Phillips died, in 1870 or 1871, he came to the field where my father, Nicholas Colvin, and I were at work; they had a conversation in regard to this judgment. Phillips asked my father what he would take for the judgment and execution he held against him (Phillips). Father told him he would take the principal. After talking some time he told my father he could sell his place for a thousand dollars. Father then told him to bring him $500 and he would give up all claims he had against him. He told my father he would see about it, and came back in three days, and said he could not get but $500 in cash for the place. He asked my father if he could not let him (Phillips) take the $500 cash and my father wait for the other $500. Phillips did not sell the place, and there was no settlement between him and father." It appeared that no one else was present at the conversation in the field except one E. C. *Faut, the nephew of the present plaintiff, who was then a boy about eleven years of age, and who, upon being examined, testified that he remembered Mr. Phillips coming into the field, but paid no attention to the conversation. Whether there was anyone else present at the conversation three days afterwards, does not appear.

The case was heard by his honor, Judge Hudson, who held: 1st. That the evidence above recited "under an equitable application of the provisions of section 131 of the Code" was not admissible. 2nd. That even if admissible, it was not sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time; and, therefore, he refused the motion to revive the judgment and renew the execution.

The plaintiff appeals upon several grounds, raising the following questions: 1st. Whether the evidence offered as to the alleged acknowledgments made by Phillips in 1870 or 1871, not being in writing was inadmissible under the provisions of section 131 of the Code. 2nd. Whether such evidence, if admissible, was sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. 3rd. Whether such evidence, coupled with the further facts of the renewal of the execution in March, 1866, and the payment of the costs of the case by the original plaintiff in February, 1870, together with the assignment of the judgment to the present plaintiff in January, 1884, were not sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment. The defendant, in further support of the ruling below, also contends that the testimony of Nicholas J. Colvin was incompetent under section 400 of the Code of Procedure.

We propose to consider, in the outset, the questions as to the competency of the testimony of Nicholas J. Colvin; for if that testimony was inadmissible, it is quite clear that there is nothing to rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time. 1st. Was this testimony incompetent under section 131 of the Code, which reads as follows: "No acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, whereby to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same be contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby," &c. Now, if that section applies to the *present case, it is quite plain that the testimony in question, not being in writing, would be incompetent.

But does it apply? By its express terms it applies only to cases referred to in that "title" of the code in which the section is found: which is denominated, "time of commencing civil actions," but by its initial section (93) its operation does not extend to all civil actions, for in that section it is expressly declared: "The provisions of this title shall not extend to actions already commenced, or to cases where the right of action has already accrued: but the statutes then in force shall be applicable to such cases; according to the subject of the action and without regard to the form." It seems to us, therefore, that section 131, which contains one of the "provisions of this title," cannot be applied to any case where the right of action had accrued at the time of the adoption of the Code of Procedure, March 1, 1870. Now, as it is quite clear that in the case now under consideration, the "right of action"—whether by scire facias to revive the judgment, or by action of debt on the judgment—had accrued prior to the adoption of the code; we do not see how the provisions of section 131 can be applied in the face of this prohibition to the present case.

It is quite true that the right to institute the particular mode of procedure adopted in the present case, did not accrue, because it did not exist prior to the adoption of the code. But that is a mere change of a remedy from the old proceeding by scire facias to the present proceeding by summons, and does not affect "the right of action;" but only substitutes a new mode of enforcing such right. We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge erred in holding the testimony incompetent under the provisions of section 131 of the Code.

2d. Was the testimony incompetent under section 400 of the Code? The general rule is that interest does not disqualify, and hence to render any testimony incompetent under the provisions of that section, it is necessary to bring such testimony under the express terms of some one of the exceptions to such general rule, mentioned in the proviso. Guery v. Kinsler, 3 S. C., 423; Cantey v. Whitaker, 17 Id., 527. Now, in this case the witness whose testimony was objected to, though a party to the action, *and though testifying as to a conversation of a deceased person: in a proceeding against his administrator, was not testifying "in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased," &c. On the contrary, the transaction or communication to which he was testifying was between Nicholas Colvin, the father of the witness, and the deceased, Phillips. For all that appears, the witness, at the time of the conversation, was like any other disinterested by-stander, testifying as to a conversation between the two original parties to the judgment, both of whom are now dead. It is clear, therefore, that the testimony objected to cannot be brought within the express terms of the exception relied upon; as has been frequently held by this court. Roe v. Harrison, 9 S. C., 279; Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 Id., 36; McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 Id., 402.

The testimony objected to not being incompetent upon either of the grounds taken; our next inquiry is whether it was sufficient, either alone or in connection with the other facts relied on, to rebut the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. To determine this we will consider the second and third questions above stated, as presented by the grounds of appeal, together. First, then, as to the effect of a lodgment of a renewal execution in March, 1866, the payment of the costs by the original plaintiff in February, 1870, and the assignment of the judgment to the present plaintiff in 1884. These purely ex parte acts, not shown to have been known to the defendant in the judgment, or to his administrator, cannot, surely, have any effect whatever in rebutting the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time (Dillard v. Brian, 5 Rich., 501; Tobin v. Myers, 18 S. C., 324); and we do not see that they can lend any additional weight to the testimony of Nicholas J. Colvin as to the alleged admissions or acknowledgments of Phillips.

Inasmuch as the cases just cited establish the proposition that the twenty years begin to run when the judgment is entered up, and not when the last renewal execution is tested or loses its active energy, unless such renewal is upon notice to the defendant (McNair v. Ingraham, 21 S. C., 70); and inasmuch as the judgment was in this case originally entered in September, 1861, *it is quite clear that the presumption of payment had arisen in September, 1881, several years before the present proceeding was commenced, unless the testimony of Nicholas J. Colvin was sufficient to rebut such presumption. It will be observed that the conversations (for there seems to have been two—one in the field, and the other three days afterwards) occurred before the twenty years had run out, and therefore before the presumption of payment had arisen.

It may be, therefore, that this case does not fall within the rule laid down in Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 L. Ed. 618], and Stover v. Duren, 3 Strobl., 448 [51 Am. Dec. 634]; though it does seem, from the first ground of appeal in the last named case, that there was testimony of an admission made by the defendant that the debt was unpaid, before the twenty years had run out, but no notice of such testimony seems to have been taken, either in the Circuit Judge's report, or in the opinion of the Court of Appeals. While, therefore, it is quite clear that, in the conversations testified to by Nicholas J. Colvin, there was no such admission of a subsisting legal obligation, unaccompanied by any expression or conduct indicating an unwillingness to pay, as would, under the rule declared in those cases, be sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment, if such conversation had taken place after the twenty years had run out, and after the presumption had arisen; yet as these conversations took place before, it is necessary for us to consider their effect in that aspect of the case.

In considering the effect of admissions relied upon to rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time, the same principles are applicable which apply when admissions or subsequent promises, either express or implied, are relied upon to take a case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. There the rule is that, while a debt already barred by the statute cannot be revived except by an express promise to pay it, or by such an unequivocal admission that it is still due and unpaid, unaccompanied by any expression, declaration, or qualification, indicative of an intention not to pay, from which the law would imply a promise to pay, yet that before the debt is barred a naked admission of the subsisting legal obligation is sufficient. Young v. Monpoe, 2 Bail., 278. The very satisfactory reason given *for this distinction in that case is, that in the one case there is no longer any subsisting legal obligation; while in the other there is such an obligation; hence, in the former case there must be either an express promise to pay the debt, or what is equivalent to it, while in the latter a mere acknowledgment of the subsisting legal obligation will, as matter of law, imply a promise to perform such obligation.

But as it is now settled that in either case the subsequent promise or acknowledgment, and not the original note, constitutes the cause of action (Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich., 365, and Walters v. Kraft, 23 S. C., 578 [55 Am. Rep. 44]), the practical inquiry in all such cases is, whether the subsequent promise or acknowledgment is sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The inquiry then is, whether the acknowledgment or admissions, as they are called, of Phillips are sufficient to constitute a cause of action. There was no express admission or acknowledgment of any subsisting legal obligation, and certainly no promise to pay anything. In the conversation in the field what Phillips first said amounted to nothing more than an inquiry as to what Colvin would take for the judgment, in general terms, and even when told that he could have the judgment for $500, he did not agree to give that sum, or even intimate that he would do so. On the contrary, his only reply was, "he would see about it." Then when he returned, three days afterwards, he only inquired whether Colvin would take a certain sum and wait for it, to which, so far as the testimony discloses, there was no reply.

It seems to us that it would be difficult to construe this language as even implying an admission of any subsisting legal obligation. He certainly did not say so, and with equal certainty he made no offer to pay anything. This he seemed carefully to avoid, and to confine himself entirely to a mere inquiry as to what Colvin would take for the judgment. It may well happen that a person having a note out against him, or a judgment standing open against him, the validity of which he does not acknowledge, might for the sole purpose of avoiding expense and litigation, institute inquiries, or even negotiations, in regard to such claims, without acknowledging their validity or even impliedly admitting his obligation to pay them; and this is all that Phillips *seems to have done. When to this is added the further facts, appearing in the record, that though Phillips appears to have had property sufficient to pay a large portion of the judgment, no steps seem to have been taken towards enforcing it until some fourteen or fifteen years afterwards, after the death of Phillips, we cannot regard the testimony relied upon as sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. 235

MILLER v. WHITE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Principal and Surety ¶168.]

Where a sealed note signed by two obligors was in form following: "On or before November 1, 1883, we or either of us promise to pay D. E. Miller or order (for rent of farm), two hundred and fourteen dollars"—the note was an obligation to pay in money, and the obligee might sue the surety thereon without pursuing the principal debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 469; Dec. Dig. ¶168.]

[2. Bills and Notes ¶242.]

If the note was a rent note, then it was the lease of both obligors, and neither of them was a surety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 542, 547, 548, 550, 551; Dec. Dig. ¶242.]

[3. Principal and Surety ¶126.]

Notice by the surety to the obligee to seize the principal debtor's crop did not release the surety as (1) the obligee was not bound to take anything but money in payment of the note; (2) it did not appear that the crop was sufficient to discharge the debt; and (3) the landlord's right to seize a crop is not compulsory, and in this case the facts would not have authorized a warrant of seizure to issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 332; Dec. Dig. ¶126.]

Before Fraser, J., Darlington, October, 1885.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the opinion. The judge made the charge and refused the requests quoted in the exceptions.

Messrs. Boyd, Nettles & Brunson, for appellant.

Mr. J. P. McNeill, contra.

July 12, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action on a note as follows: "On or by the first day of November, 1883, we or either of us promise to pay D. E. Miller or order (for rent of Mt. Hope Cemetery farm, for the year ending December 30th, 1883), two hundred and fourteen dollars, without interest until maturity. Witness our hands and seals at Florence, S. C. (Signed) J. M. White [l. s.], Thomas Ellis [l. s.]" Both the signers were sued. White made no defence, but Ellis answered, claiming that he had no interest in the land leased to White; that he was merely his surety on the note, and was discharged from liability by the conduct of the plaintiff creditor; that White made a crop on the premises, and that when the note became due he (Ellis) made demand on plaintiff that he should at once enforce his statutory lien on the crop and thereby obtain payment of the note, but that plaintiff refused to enforce his lien; that the crop was valuable and the plaintiff could have obtained payment, and not having done so, that he (Ellis) was discharged and no longer liable.

The plaintiff had a verdict for the amount of the note; and Ellis, having failed to obtain a new trial appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "I. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that 'a demand made by the surety to a tenant, on the landlord, to enforce the statutory lien will not release the surety unless it is accompanied with or the landlord has information that the tenant is about to dispose of his crop or in some other way defeat the lien. Without this the landlord is not in a position to enforce the statutory lien by the usual warrant from the clerk.' II. Because his honor erred in refusing the request to charge that 'if Ellis was the surety of White and this was known to Miller, and if Miller was required by Ellis to enforce his statutory lien for rent on the crop upon the leased land, and refused so to do, and this omission resulted in injury to Ellis, then Ellis is discharged from his liability on the note.' III. Because his honor erred in refusing the request to charge that 'if White told Miller to take any part of his crop in payment, and Miller declined to take it, Ellis is discharged pro tanto the value of the crop he was so told to take and refused.' IV. Because his honor erred in refusing a new trial on the grounds above stated," &c.

*The instrument sued on was signed by both of the defendants, and its terms are, "We, or either of us," and must be regarded as the undertaking of both the obligors, whether considered as a simple single bill, or a covenant for the payment of so much as rent for the farm; and in either case the promise was to pay so much money and nothing else. We incline to think that the instrument, notwithstanding the phrase as to rent inserted in the parenthesis, was a simple single bill for the payment of so much money. So considered, and assuming that Ellis was merely surety for White, it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff was under no obligation to take anything in payment but money; that was the express contract of the parties, and that the plaintiff was entitled to receive. So far as the creditor is concerned, both the principal and surety are his debtors, he took no other security from either than that personal obligation, and he might sue the surety without pursuing the principal. "To discharge a surety, it is necessary that the creditor should do some positive act which has that effect, and not merely that he should be passive; or that he should omit some duty to the surety, which he was bound to perform." Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C., 197.

But it is urged that the parenthesis inserted in the note, indicating the consideration, made it a rent obligation for the rent of the cemetery farm. If so, was it not, as expressly declared, the lease of both? We do not clearly see by what principle or authority one of the signers can claim to be the principal and the other only surety. If, however, Ellis is still entitled to be considered as surety on the obligation as a rent note, we fail to see that the creditor owed him as such any duty to seize the property of White under an agricultural lien. We think there are several reasons why it was not his duty to do so:

1. His express contract was that he should have his rent in money; the surety as well as the principal so engaged, and he is not bound to take it in anything else. He may have required personal security for the rent for the very purpose of avoiding the necessity of seizing the crop, and in that case the note was the primary security.

2. The demand that the creditor should seize the crop, could not possibly be regarded as payment or tender either of the whole *or pro tanto, for it did not appear that the whole crop available would have discharged the whole debt. "Nothing short of an offer fully to perform the contract, evinced by a tender of everything the plaintiff is entitled to, is sufficient." Baker v. Gasque & Rowell, 3 Strobl., 25.

3. We do not understand that the right of a landlord under the law to seize the crop of his tenant under an agricultural lien is compulsory, so that the tenant or his surety may demand that the right shall be exercised. The law gives him that as well as other remedies to secure payment. It is his privilege in a proper case, but if he does not choose to exercise it, we do not see that the validity of the rent obligation, either against the principal or his surety, should be thereby affected. But in addition, it did not appear that the proper case existed and that the plaintiff could have made the showing necessary to obtain an agricultural warrant. The right only exists in a certain state of facts. Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C., 552; Sullivan v. Ellison, 20 S. C., 484.

If the defendant, Ellis, wished to save himself from loss on the note, he might have paid it, and possibly claimed to be reimbursed out of the crop. But be that as it may, we cannot hold that the Circuit Judge committed error as charged.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. 238

MITCHELL v. TOALE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Master and Servant ¶44.]

A master, after dismissing his servant, has not the right to recall the servant at any time and under all circumstances; but after dismissal the master has the right to recall the servant, if otherwise unemployed, to do a portion of his stipulated work, without fully recalling him to his former position.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ¶44.]

[2. Master and Servant ¶30.]

A servant is bound to obey the lawful, reasonable, and substantial orders of the master within the scope of the business; and if he refuses to do so, a discharge would be justifiable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-36; Dec. Dig. ¶30.]

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885.

*This was an action by H. W. Mitchell against P. P. Toale. The opinion states the case. The charge of the Circuit Judge to the jury was as follows:

The first question for you to determine is whether this was a contract for a year. You are to determine that from the testimony and from the circumstances of the case, the nature of the employment, how the matter was treated during the time, and all such matters. The rule of testimony is that where one party to a cause, if he be credible, testifies positively to conversations between himself and the other, and the other party testifies that he does not remember, that is not a contradiction, unless he goes further and testifies that he was in the habit of noting such things, and would have been apt to have remembered it, and to the best of his knowledge and belief it did not take place. You must judge of that from the whole testimony.

If you come to the conclusion that it was a contract by the year, then the next question is: Was the discharge for good cause? Good cause is such cause as you, as business men, knowing what are the annoyances and defects in matters of business, would consider, fairly and conscientiously, cause for the discharging of a clerk. You have heard the testimony on that point on both sides, and you must determine it by that testimony. I am asked to charge you that the plaintiff in this case must show that there was no good cause for the discharge. That I decline. The burden of proof is on the other side, and the employer must show that he had good cause for discharging the clerk if the contract was for a year.

I am also asked in the first request to charge you a matter which I decline to charge, because I consider the proposition too general. My charge to you upon that point is this, that an employer who has discharged a clerk has the right to recall his discharge and require him to go to work again. He has undoubtedly that right, and upon the subject of this request I charge you, that if Mr. Toale told him to go to work again, or told him anything else which could fairly be construed into a recall of the discharge, and the restoring him to his old place, he had the right to do so. But if he required of him particular work which he claimed was left undone, and should have been done in the *term of his employment, then that would not release him from his obligations connected with the discharge. It would only give him the right to prove that that work was neglected, and to deduct from his liability whatever it cost him to have it done. So that if you construe Mr. Toale's proposition in this case as not fairly to admit of the construction that he recalled this employe's discharge and instructed him to go to work again under the old contract, then that would not release him of his liability by reason of his having discharged the clerk. It must be a recall and restoration to his old position. If under those circumstances the clerk refuses to go to work again, then it is an acceptance of his discharge, and he must take the consequences.

I am requested to charge you that the law implies a promise that the clerk, or book-keeper, or servant, shall obey all the reasonable orders of the master; and that any breach of this promise justifies the discharge. I have interlined the word substantial; and I charge you that the law does imply such a promise, and that any substantial breach of such a promise does authorize a discharge. It must be such a substantial neglect of duty, such a disobedience of orders, that a reasonable man would consider it good cause to discharge him for. If you find any such neglect of duty, and any such neglect of orders coming within that meaning, then Mr. Toale was justified in discharging him. If not, then, if it was a contract for a year, he was not justified in discharging him.

I am requested to charge you that if this was a contract for a year, and the contract ran on from year to year, then the year contract is implied in the renewal. If one be employed for a year, and the year expire, and he go on in the same employment without another contract, then another new year's employment is implied. That is what I charged in the case of Heyward against the Union Bank, I think. That is what I charge now, at any rate.

The second plaintiff's request to charge is concerning the burden of proof. I have already charged you that where a person justifies a discharge for cause, the burden of proof is upon him to show that there was cause. If, under the law, as I have laid it down, you consider that the plaintiff is entitled to his compensation, then you will give him his half year's salary, deducting what he earned during that time. You will also deduct the thirty-eight dollars which he admits stands on the books against him. The circumstances of that over-draft is a question entirely for you. You must judge of the whole matter.

Under the law, as I have laid it down, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? If the defendant discharged him for good cause, your verdict must be for the defendant, for the thirty-eight dollars which he has charged against him. If the contract was for the year, and the plaintiff was not discharged for good cause, you will find for the plaintiff the amount claimed, there being no proof that he could have earned more than he gives credit for.

Messrs. Smythe & Lee, for appellant.

Messrs. Lord & Hyde, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, was employed as book-keeper by the defendant, appellant, for the year 1884, to wit, from December, 1883, to December, 1884, at a salary of $800 for the year. On May 31, 1884, the defendant dismissed the plaintiff, but in a short time after this dismissal, and before the plaintiff had obtained other employment, the defendant, finding that the books kept by the plaintiff had not been balanced, called upon the plaintiff to do this work, which plaintiff refused to do, except at the rate of $5 per day, which defendant declined to pay. The plaintiff afterwards obtained other employment, and upon the close of the year brought the action below, demanding judgment for three hundred and sixty-three dollars ($363), the balance due him for the year's salary, after deducting a payment of $438.37.

At the trial the defendant was allowed credit for the amount earned by the plaintiff since his discharge, $120, and also for a small amount due by plaintiff to defendant on the books, $38.39, which left $241.63 due plaintiff, for which sum a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The appeal rests upon the refusal of the presiding judge to charge certain requests, and also upon his charge.

*The defendant requested his honor to charge: "That if a servant employed by a master for a stipulated period be discharged by such master before the period expires, even wrongfully, but the master at any time thereafter require him to return to his service, or to perform any of the duties he had agreed to do, he is bound to do so, or else he cannot recover." This his honor refused to charge as too general. He, however, in response to the request, charged that if the call upon the servant could fairly admit of the construction that the discharge is recalled, and that the servant is expected to go to work again under the old contract, being restored to his old place, "he had a right to do so. But if he required of him particular work, which he claimed was left undone, that that would not relieve him from his obligations connected with the discharge." The defendant also requested the judge to charge that "a promise to obey the lawful and reasonable orders of the master is implied by law. Any breach of his promise justifies discharge." This his honor also declined, unless the request was qualified by the word "substantial"—in other words, "that it was only a 'substantial' breach of the promise to justify a discharge." The appeal assigns error to the refusal above, and to the response given to the first request above.

We agree with the presiding judge, that the first request was too broad and general in its terms. A master dismissing a servant has no right to recall at any time and under all circumstances after dismissal, on pain of forfeiting all right of recovery. See the case of Saunders v. Anderson, 2 Hill, 486, cited by the appellant. In that case, where the general rule that the master had the right to exact or dispense with any portion of the time of the servant, and capriciously, if he chose, provided he inflicted no injury on the servant, was recognized, yet the court said that this rule must be understood with some qualifications: saying that the planter is not at liberty to drive off and recall at pleasure. If, in consequence of being improperly dismissed, the overseer engage in any other employment, he would not be bound to return. This being the law, the Circuit Judge did not err in declining the broad request made.

But we think the judge erred in the response which he made *to this request. The contract between the parties being an entire contract for the year 1884, the defendant was entitled to plaintiff's services for that period, within the scope of his employment, and as was said in Saunders v. Anderson, supra, he had the right to exact from the plaintiff the performance of that service, or to dispense with said service, as he chose, even capriciously, or for any cause, so that he kept within the qualification above suggested. See, also, Wood's M. & S., 269. It appears that the plaintiff, at the time he was called to balance the books, had not been engaged by others, and it was no injury upon him to be recalled to do this work. It was error, therefore, for the judge to charge that the defendant had no right to recall the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff was to be restored to his former position.

The difference between the second request and the charge is so slight that the error assigned there hardly needs discussion. No doubt, the servant is bound to obey the lawful and reasonable orders of the master, within the scope of the business, and if he refuses to do so, a discharge would be justifiable; and probably no order would be lawful and reasonable, unless at the same time it was substantial—that is, pertained substantially to the business. Mr. Wood says: "The servant is bound to obey all the master's lawful and reasonable commands, even though such commands may, under the circumstances, seem harsh and severe, but the master has a right to manage his own affairs, and it must be a very extreme case in which a servant would be justified in refusing obedience to his orders." Wood, M. & S., 224, 225.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, February, 1886.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.
Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff brought action in 1879 against William Watkins, to recover damages for the hiring and retention of a laborer alleged to have been previously hired for that year by the plaintiff. The case was heard by his honor, Judge Wallace, and a jury, with a verdict for the defendant. A new trial was ordered, on appeal to this court. 15 S. C., 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680]. The case was then heard a second time below, before his honor, Judge Pressley, when, under the charge of the judge, the defendant had a second verdict. The judgment on this verdict was set aside on a second appeal, and a new trial ordered again. 18 S. C., 510. In the meantime the defendant died, and the defendant, James F. Watkins, became his executor. At the November term of the Circuit Court thereafter, the plaintiff moved to substitute the executor, and for leave to proceed with the action against the said executor. This motion was refused by his honor, Judge Hudson, before whom the motion was made, the judge holding that the action had abated. 20 S. C., 477.

The plaintiff then applied to the clerk of the court to tax the costs and disbursements of the two appeals, in which he had been successful, against the estate of the deceased. The clerk refused this motion. On exceptions taken, his honor, Judge Kershaw, overruled the clerk, and decided that plaintiff was entitled to his costs and disbursements on the two appeals, the plaintiff having prevailed therein, and having obtained a new trial in each. The question before us is, was this ruling of Judge Kershaw correct?

Costs are regulated by statute, and questions arising in reference to liability for costs, and the taxation thereof in favor of plaintiff or defendant, must be decided by the application of the *terms of said statute. The present act on the subject of costs, provides in the first section, that the attorneys of plaintiff or defendant shall be entitled to costs * * * "accordingly as the action may terminate." Gen. St., § 2425. The next (2d) section of the acts fixes the amount of costs, for plaintiff's and defendant's attorneys, as the case may be, in cases at law, §§ 2426, 2427. The next fixes the amount in equity causes, subject to the right of the judge to direct which of the parties shall pay these costs (§ 2428), and at the conclusion of this section it is provided: "That in all classes of cases, legal as well as equitable, for the plaintiff's or defendant's attorneys for making and serving a case or cases containing exceptions, ten dollars: * * * on appeal to the Supreme Court, fifteen dollars; on argument in Supreme Court, twenty dollars."

Now, the question arises whether the terms found in the first section, supra, to wit: "accordingly as the action may terminate," qualifies and controls this last provision of section 2428; or is that provision an independent provision entitling the successful party in the appeal to the costs allowed? If the former, then the judgment below was error, because the action below having abated by the death of the defendant, before final judgment on the merits, under circumstances which did not allow revival, it being a case in tort, there was no termination of the action in favor of either party. But if the provision as to costs in the Supreme Court can be regarded as an independent enactment, intending to allow costs to the prevailing party there, then his honor below was right. We think, from the language employed in the provision referred to, that it was its purpose to allow the costs mentioned to the prevailing party on appeal, without regard to the final result of the action. Costs were certainly authorized to some one thereby, and we can hardly suppose that it was left to the final determination of the action to determine which of the parties should become entitled to these appeal costs, without regard to the fact which had been successful in the appeal. On the contrary, the most reasonable construction is, that this provision, although it is a part of section 2428, which as a whole is governed by section 2425 (the first section), yet it *was the intention to allow appeal costs to the prevailing party in the appeal.

This construction is fortified and sustained by the case of Cleveland v. Cohrs, 13 S. C., 397. In that case there had been two appeals, as in the case at bar, in both of which the defendant, appellant, had prevailed. The plaintiff, however, finally succeeded below, and the court held, that defendant having prevailed in both appeals, which were rendered necessary by the defective pleadings on the part of the plaintiff, he was entitled to have the costs incurred in such appeals taxed. It is true in that case the court did say (as above), "which were rendered necessary by the defective pleadings on the part of the plaintiff," but that was not the turning point of the decision; the fact that the defendant had prevailed, was the pivot. The question presented here depends upon the construction of our statute, and therefore the cases referred to by appellant, drawing a distinction between appeals founded upon errors of law in the judge, and defects of pleadings, &c., occasioned by the party, do not apply. Our statute, we think, gives appeal costs to the prevailing party in the appeal, without reference to the grounds of the appeal. We admit that the question is not free from doubt, but our conclusion is as above.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WILBUR & SON v. HUTTO.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⚭537.]

Creditors of an intestate have no cause of action against the sureties on the administration bond until after devastavit established against the administrator; and a complaint against the sureties alone which failed to state such devastavit was properly held bad on demurrer.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⚭534.]

Judgment by default entered against an administrator on a debt of his intestate, and a return of nulla bona thereon, are prima facie evidence of a devastavit, but they are not conclusive: to make the sureties on his bond liable in such case, there must first be a second action and judgment de bonis propriis.

*This was an action by T. A. Wilbur & Son against G. E. Hutto and E. E. Hughes, sureties on the administration bond of John L. Sease. The opinion states the case. It may be added, however, that the judgment of the plaintiffs against John L. Sease, as administrator, was a judgment by default.

Messrs. W. R. Kelly and James Thomson, for appellants.

Mr. C. C. Simms, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought against the defendants, sureties on the bond of J. L. Sease, administrator of A. E. Sease, deceased, under the following circumstances: The plaintiff recovered a judgment against the said J. L. Sease, as administrator aforesaid, for $679.25. Execution was duly issued thereon, and the sheriff returned nulla bona, whereupon the action below was commenced against the defendants, sureties on the administration bond. The plaintiff alleged the amount due on the judgment, and demanded judgment for the same. The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, his honor, the presiding judge (Pressley), stating as grounds for his ruling: "That neither the administrator, nor his administrator, if he be dead, is a party to the action, nor is there any allegation that either was called to account, or a devastavit established." The appeal involves the correctness of his honor's ruling.

It will be conceded that creditors of an intestate have no cause of action against the sureties of the administrator until a devastavit has been first established against the administrator himself. This principle is founded upon that other principle that the assets of the intestate must be applied to his debts, through the management of the administrator, and the object and purpose of the administration bond is to secure such application, the obligation of the surety being that the administrator will so apply said assets. Such being the fact, and it being necessary that the complaint in every action should contain allegations stating the cause *of action, on pain of dismissal by demurrer, it follows, in the case at bar, that the complaint herein should have contained an allegation, either expressly or impliedly, of a devastavit by the administrator; otherwise it was fatally defective and the demurrer was properly sustained. The question then is, did this complaint contain such an allegation? The complaint is very brief, the principal allegations being, that one A. E. Sease died in 1883; that John L. Sease was appointed his administrator; that the defendants became sureties on his official bond; that in 1884 the plaintiffs recovered the judgment mentioned against the administrator; that in 1884 execution was duly issued on this judgment, and afterwards in 1884 the sheriff returned that he could find no property out of which to satisfy said judgment.

Now, there is no allegation of a devastavit, certainly none in express terms. Is it impliedly made? Or can it be said that it is a legal inference from the facts stated? It will not be contended that the judgment obtained by the plaintiff was anything more than a judgment de bonis testatoris, as contradistinguished from one de bonis propriis. And it is admitted, that such a judgment, as a general rule, is an admission of assets in the hands of the administrator sufficient to pay the debt established; and if upon the issuing of an execution no assets can be found, a return of nulla bona would be conclusive evidence of a devastavit, if there was no other way except by devastavit for the administrator to have disposed of said assets after judgment obtained. And in that event, an allegation of nulla bona would be equivalent to an allegation of devastavit, and therefore would be sufficient. But a return of nulla bona is not conclusive of an unlawful disposition of the assets by the administrator. It is only prima facie, and notwithstanding such return, the administrator cannot be held liable de bonis propriis, except upon a separate action against him, where he is permitted to overthrow the prima facie presumption by showing a proper disposition of the assets under the judgment; in the absence of which proof the devastavit becomes fully established, and a judgment will go against him de bonis propriis on account of said devastavit.

Now, the sureties not being liable until a devastavit by the administrator has been established, and it requiring an action *against said administrator in his individual capacity to completely establish the devastavit in the absence of an accounting, it follows necessarily, that the creditor has no cause of action against the sureties until such action has been instituted and determined against him, which facts must be alleged in substance in the complaint against the sureties. What has been said above applies to the facts of this case. The question of the liability of the sureties, &c., after an accounting has been had against the administrator before a proper tribunal and a decree against him, is not before us, and we express no opinion on that subject. In support of the principles herein, see Lyles v. Caldwell, 3 McCord, 225; Anderson v. Maddox, Ibid., 237; Cureton v. Shelton, Ibid., 412; Harrington v. Cole, Ibid., 509, in which it was held that an accounting and a decree against the administrator before suit on the administration bond was necessary. See, also, Young v. Kennedy, 2 McMull., 80; Brown v. Hillegas, 2 Hill, 450; Jones v. Anderson, 4 McCord, 118.

We think the plaintiff failed to allege facts sufficient to constitute an action against the defendants.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

LEWIS v. RAILROAD COMPANY.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Carriers ⇨193.]

Plaintiff made a contract with a railroad company for special through rates on a shipment of five mares. On their arrival at their destination on another line of railroad, plaintiff tendered the amount fixed by the contract and demanded delivery, which was refused unless a larger sum called for by the way bill was paid. Plaintiff then brought action against this railroad company for the recovery of the mares. Held, that plaintiff having introduced no testimony to show that the initial road was authorized to make such special contract for the defendant, a non-suit was properly granted.

Before Pressley, J., Oconee, March, 1885.

*This was an action by J. Earle Lewis against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company to recover the possession of five brood mares, held by defendant at Seneca, a station on the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railroad, then under lease to the defendant company and operated by it. The opinion states the case.

Mr. H. E. Ravenel, for appellant.
Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

cuit Judge erred in granting a non-suit below. As we have held in several cases, a non-suit is proper and demandable only where there is an absence of all testimony to one or more of the issues material to the case; and inasmuch as the issues are found in the pleadings, the question involved demands a consideration of the pleadings and the testimony introduced. We will, therefore, direct our attention first to the complaint.

The plaintiff alleges in his complaint, that in 1883 he shipped five valuable mares from Lexington, Ky., to be carried to Seneca City, in this State; that this was done under a written contract made with the Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Railway Company, and through it, as agent of both plaintiff and defendant, with the lines connecting with said railroad to Seneca City, whereof defendant is one; that said mares should be carried to Seneca City from Lexington at the rate of sixty-one cents per hundred pounds for freight charges, on payment whereof said animals were to be delivered in good condition at Seneca City; that on the arrival of said stock at Seneca City, he tendered to said Richmond & Danville Railroad Company the full amount of freight due under said contract, and demanded possession, but that defendant refused to deliver, to his damage $5,000. The defendant, with other defences, denied that it was a party or privy to the alleged contract, or that it was in any way bound thereby, and that it had no argement with the initial road for *freight on live stock shipped to stations on its road, and that the cause of the non-delivery was, that plaintiff would not pay its freight charges, for which the company had lien on the stock, and also a charge for feed of said stock, to wit, $120 for freight, and $20 for feed.

It will be seen at once, from an inspection of the pleadings above, that one of the material issues in the case, and perhaps the most material issue, was that the alleged contract was made with the defendant, either through its agent, the Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Railroad Company, or otherwise. It seems to be understood that the rates contracted for by the plaintiff were special rates, and could only be obtained or allowed by special contract; hence, the starting point in plaintiff's case was the contract, and proof that defendant was a party thereto. Without this, whatever else the plaintiff might prove, his action as brought of necessity would fail. It was not only necessary to prove this contract as alleged, in order to recover in the event that the case went to the jury, but to reach the jury it was necessary to introduce some evidence pertinent to that issue.

Now, did plaintiff introduce such testimony? We have looked carefully through the testimony reported, and we must say that we have not been able to find a particle of evidence directed to the vital point, that the Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Railroad Company was the agent of the defendant in this transaction, or that it had power, either expressly or impliedly, to bind the defendant in the contract made: and in addition to this, we find a slip appended to reported evidence, or to the "Case," in which it is admitted by both sides, that no notice whatever of this alleged agreement was given by the agent of said Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Company to the connecting lines, but that one of said agreements was retained by said agent and the other by the plaintiff. It is not distinctly stated that this admission was before the Circuit Judge in the progress of plaintiff's testimony, but we suppose it was, as the non-suit was granted, of course, before the defendant was called upon to reply. Be this as it may, however, without this admission there is a total absence of all testimony on the pivotal point mentioned, to wit, that the defendant made the contract sued on, either directly or indirectly. Such being the fact, there was no error in granting the non-suit.

The appellant raised other questions in the exceptions, to wit, whether the defendant had a lien for amounts paid by the defendant to other companies for back freight, &c.; whether defendant had lien for feed of horses paid, &c.; and whether defendant could claim freight paid on the Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Company, higher than the rates mentioned in the contract. These questions were not involved in the case as made below. The plaintiff came into court on an alleged special contract, in which it was agreed that certain freight rates were to be charged from Lexington to Seneca City, and his tender was based upon those rates, which were less than the usual rates, and failing to offer any testimony in support of the contract, his case fell at that point, which precluded any inquiry as to these other matters. Had his action been founded simply upon a refusal to deliver the stock, after tender of all proper charges, then the question of the right of defendant to hold on for other charges not covered by the tender, would have been before the court.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. 252

BARKER v. DEIGNAN,

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Adverse Possession ¶17.]

The oft-repeated but not continuous use of water, covering an adjoining lot of land, for floating rafts and lumber to the trespasser's mill, does not constitute adverse possession of such lot of land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. ¶17.]

[2. Adverse Possession ¶44.]

If there were no indication of ownership except the presence of floating rafts, then the removal of the rafts broke the possession, and putting other rafts in afterwards was not a continuation of the first trespass.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 226-231; Dec. Dig. ¶44.]

[3. Adverse Possession ¶31.]

Poles driven down in the water to fasten floating rafts to, did not constitute notice of adverse possession of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 128-133; Dec. Dig. ¶31.]

[4. Trial ¶90.]

The Circuit Judge having admitted in evidence an old plat to sustain the defence of paramount title, on condition that the grant itself should be afterwards produced, which was not done, he did not err in ruling out all testimony as to this plat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. ¶90.]

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1885.

*This was an action by Theodore G. Barker against Charles Deignan, commenced in May, 1884, to recover a lot of land covered with water in the city of Charleston. The judge charged the jury as follows:

Where paper titles are admitted in evidence, I am bound to charge you as to their effect. I charge you that under those grants of 1857, produced, to Mr. Samuel G. Barker and his will, and the subsequent deed to Theo. G. Barker, trustee, that he has shown a complete chain of title to the land in dispute, and is entitled to recover it unless the defendant has broken down that evidence.

The first question is, has the defendant shown a paramount title in some one else, has he shown a paramount title in Cleland, or who may be entitled through him from his grant or supposed grant? I am bound to charge you that there is no Cleland grant before the court, and all that has been said about it must be ruled out. I admitted Mr. DeCaradenc's testimony on condition that a Cleland grant should be produced and with the understanding that his testimony on that point must be ruled out if it was not produced. The law at that time was this: a party desiring a grant got a warrant of survey: under that warrant of survey he had the land surveyed, and of that land thus surveyed a plat was made. That plat thus made was to be certified by the surveyor general as surveyed off to him. After getting that if he did not choose to go further and have that plat certified to the governor, connected with a grant made out, to which the plat should be attached, and signed by the governor, his warrant of survey and the survey thereupon fell to the ground; the proof is in this case that he got a warrant of survey and that it was surveyed, and there the proof stops, and until he proves that he subsequently got a grant under seal of the State and signed by the governor, there is no grant proved before you, so there is no proof of paramount title under that grant.

I am requested by the plaintiff to charge you that if he had got a grant, it was void. I rule that that is the law. We are not to know but that it was the very discovery of that law which is the reason why the grant is not here. Under the law of 1784 if the survey had gone any further, it would have been null and *void, because he took more chains front than he took chains deep. The object of the act was to prevent one or two men from absorbing the whole of the river front.

Has the defendant proved title by adverse possession? Adverse possession must be in such way as to give the party fair notice that he is holding under adverse title. Where a person is holding under paper title, a wharf, office, shop, &c., are evidence of his title, to the extent of that paper title, but that possession was not notice that he was holding any further. When he took that title in 1869, calling for Mr. Barker's land as one of the boundaries, that was an admission by him that up to that time he did not claim that land by any adverse possession. Did he after that have ten years' adverse continuous possession? That is the law. It must be adverse and it must be continuous. What I mean by continuous is this: a man squats on another man's land, and even clears a few acres and builds a fence and cultivates it; if he removes the fence and carries it away before his possession of ten years is complete, and abandons the cultivation of the field, all his claim is gone; and if he comes back and commences a new possession, his adverse possession commences from the new start. You cannot link two, three, four, or five trespasses together to make one adverse possession. It must be continuous. There must be the same continuous possession from the time you do it until your title is perfect in ten years.

Does the floating of a raft of timber which is put there for use and moved as soon as used—does the doing that from time to time, floating it in a place which the owner is not using, constitute adverse continuous possession? If, at any time, he moved all those rafts away, that broke his possession. If at any time the premises were cleared, that broke his possession; and his putting rafts there six months after, or a year after, was not a continuance of the first trespass, if that was the character of his possession. It must be ten years' continuous possession, and I submit to you whether the putting of rafts, such as have been proved in this case, was such adverse continuous possession as would be fair notice to the owner that he was claiming that land. If it was not, your verdict must be for the plaintiff. You cannot take into account the fence which the witnesses say was put there, *because that was not put there according to the evidence until 1881. He cannot rely on the fence as giving him ten years' adverse possession.

If the poles were put there simply for the purpose of fastening the rafts there occasionally, that would not constitute notice that he claimed the land. It must be such possession as claims the right to exclude the owner, and it must be continuous. Unless, therefore, you are satisfied from the testimony that the defendant has had ten years' adverse continuous possession of this land in dispute, as I charge you no paramount title is proved in the defendant or any one else, your verdict must be for the plaintiff for the land in dispute; but if you believe that he has had ten years' adverse continuous possession of that land, you will give him a verdict for so much of the land as he had possession of, if you can find that out. As there is no color of title with reference to this land, on proof that he had ten years' continuous adverse possession, you can only give him a verdict for so much as his timber actually covered, if you so find that there was any portion of it continuously covered by timber.

Mr. A. G. Magrath, for appellant.

Mr. C. H. Simonton, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In the action below the plaintiff, respondent, sought to recover damages from the defendant, appellant, for an alleged trespass upon plaintiff's land, of which plaintiff, in his complaint, claims ownership, and upon which he alleged that defendant had wrongfully entered, dug up the ground, and otherwise injured the premises, to the damage of the plaintiff one thousand dollars. The defendant denied each and every allegation in the complaint. The case was tried by jury, his honor, Judge Pressley, presiding, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. There were no requests to charge from either side, but the defendant appeals from certain portions of the charge which the presiding judge delivered to the jury.

The defendant on the trial attempted to prove paramount title, *and also adverse possession, to overthrow plaintiff's title, which was complete unless overthrown by one or other of these defences. In the defence of paramount title the defendant relied upon a grant to one Cleland, and before the production of this grant certain testimony was introduced in reference thereto, upon condition that the grant should be produced afterwards. This grant was never produced, and the judge in his charge ruled out all of the testimony which had been received in reference thereto. And the exception as to that matter is as follows: "Exception 6th. Because his honor charged the jury adversely to the defendant in regard to the Cleland grant, when he had excluded all questions as to that grant, and specially had excluded the decrees of this court in cases where the validity of that grant had been established."¹

The foundation for the other exceptions was what the judge said in reference to the defence of adverse possession. It appears that defendant was in possession of a small lot of land on Vardell's Creek and Town Creek, waters of Cooper River, upon which he had a mill. This property had been purchased from the plaintiff's ancestor, S. G. Barker, and called for other lands of the said S. G. Barker as its southern boundary in the deed of conveyance; and it seems that the defendant made use of these adjoining lots near his mill, which were water lots not built upon, to float his saw logs and rafts of timber, and in which certain poles were put up for keeping the rafts in. And the question of adverse possession turned upon the testimony in reference to the use made of said lots.

His honor charged in substance, that to give title by such possession, it must be adverse and continuous, and of such character as to give the opposite party fair notice that the possession is held adversely; and by way of illustration of what he meant by the term "continuous," he said: "If a man squats on another man's land, and even clears a few acres and builds a fence and cultivates it; if he removes the fence and carries it away before his possession of ten years is complete, and abandons the cultivation of the field, all his claim is gone; and if he comes back and commences a new possession, his adverse possession commences *from the new start. You cannot link two, three, four, or five trespasses together to make one adverse possession. It must be continuous. There must be the same continuous possession from the time you do it until your title is perfect in ten years. Does the floating of a raft of timber, which is put there for use and moved as soon as used—does the doing that from time to time, floating it in a place which the owner is not using, constitute adverse continuous possession? If at any time he moved all these rafts away, that broke the possession. If at any time the premises were cleared, that broke the possession, and his floating rafts there six months after, or a year after, was not a continuance of the first trespass, if that was the character of his possession. It must be ten years' continuous possession, and I submit to you whether the floating rafts, such as has been proved in this case, was such adverse continuous possession as would be fair notice to the owner that he was claiming the land. If it was not, your verdict must be for the plaintiff. * * *

But if you believe that the defendant has been in the adverse continuous possession of the land for ten years, you will give him a verdict for so much of the land as he has had possession of, if you can find it."

The exceptions of appellant to this charge which raise questions of law are as follows:

1st. That his honor erred when, to illustrate his idea of adverse possession, he said: "If at any time the (defendant) moved all those rafts away, that he broke his possession." And again: "If at any time the premises were cleared, that broke his possession." The effect of which was to impress the jury with the belief that there could be no right acquired by adverse possession, where the adverse right was claimed by the use of land for keeping lumber used in the business of a shipbuilder, if that lumber was used for the purpose for which it was kept on the land.

2nd. That his honor erred when he said to the jury, that if at any time he, the defendant, moved all those rafts away, that broke his possession, and led to the conclusion that, however short the interval of time between the use of one raft and replacing it by another, a new start for the adverse possession commenced with each successive raft of timber.

*3d. Because his honor erred when he said to the jury that, "If the poles were put there simply for the purpose of fastening the rafts there occasionally, that would not constitute notice that he claimed the land," when by this instruction the jury were led to accept this as the construction by the judge of the testimony, and such construction was not that which the testimony required.

The other exceptions raise no questions, but are rather in the nature of allegations as to what had been proved and what the defendant claimed.

It will be observed that the general proposition of law laid down by the Circuit Judge as to adverse possession, to wit, that it must be continuous, adverse, and of such character as to give notice to the true owner, is not contested in the appeal. We assume, then, that proposition to be the law of the case. The appellant, however, complains in his first ground above of the manner in which the judge illustrated his idea of "continuous" possession. When the charge is read as a whole, as it was delivered to the jury, it will be seen that the judge endeavored to draw a distinction between repeated trespasses and a constant holding after having once taken possession, with the view to impress upon the minds of the jury the principle upon which the one would not give title and the other would. There was certainly no error in pointing out this difference, because, while it is admitted that continuous, adverse, and notorious possession for ten years will ordinarily give title, yet it is equally certain that no number of sporadic trespasses will have that effect.

The locus claimed by the defendant by his adverse possession was a peculiar one. It seems to have been covered mostly by water, and the surface was not used at any definite spot continuously to float timber for the use of the mill near by, and as the defendant presented no color of title, his claim was necessarily confined to his pedis possessio. Where that was, it was no doubt difficult to tell; hence the pertinency of the judge's charge where he said to the jury, "But if you believe that he (defendant) has had ten years' continuous adverse possession of that land, you will give a verdict for so much of the land as he had possession of, if you can find that out." It being the purpose of the judge to point out the difference between repeated acts of trespass and actual continued possession, and how possession might be broken, we do not think that the language used by him, and objected to, was calculated to mislead the jury, as stated in the exception; especially as he submitted it to the jury to determine whether the possession was continuous or in the nature of repeated trespasses.

What is said above applies also to the second exception. The judge said: "If at any time the premises were cleared, that broke the possession." That is, if there was no other indication of ownership or possession except the presence of floating rafts, when all these were cleared away, all evidence was gone, and the possession broken. But the judge went on to say, with the view to point out clearly the difference between repeated acts of trespass and a constant holding for use, that after the lot was thus cleared, the defendant putting rafts back there six months after, or a year after, was not a continuance of the first trespass; and upon the whole he left it to the jury to say whether the possession of the defendant was a holding for constant use by him, or whether the lot was used just as occasion and his necessities required, each use thereof being a separate trespass.

The third exception objects to what the judge said in reference to the poles, on the ground that the jury might have been led thereby to the conclusion that the poles were put there simply for the purpose of fastening the rafts, and if so, that would not constitute notice. We do not see that this followed, or was probable from the judge's remark. He said: "If the poles were put there simply to fasten the rafts, that would not constitute notice that he claimed the land;" but whether they were put there for that purpose or not, the judge did not intimate. He left that to the jury.

No error has been pointed out to us in the argument growing out of what the judge said in reference to the Cleland grant (6th exception). The other exceptions contain allegations of facts claimed to have been proved on the trial. This being a jury case, the facts were for them.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*CAROLINA, CUMBERLAND GAP & CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY v. TRIBBLE.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Taxation ⚭535.]

A tax voted by the people of a township to aid in the construction of a railroad, is not a State, county, or municipal tax; and therefore a manufacturing company paying such tax is not entitled to have it refunded under the act of 1873, directing manufacturing companies to be repaid the amount of their State, county, and municipal taxes.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 20, 8 S. E. 14, 2 L. R. A. 242.]

For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 993; Dec. Dig. ⚭535.]

[2. Taxation ⚭535.]

If the manufacturing company were entitled to such repayment, it could not be made out of the money raised to pay the railroad subscription, for by the terms of the act authorizing this subscription, the moneys so raised were to be paid over to the railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 991-995, 1012, 1015; Dec. Dig. ⚭535.]

[3. Taxation ⚭535.]

And the county treasurer was not protected in such repayment by an order of the comptroller general fixing and determining the amount to be repaid to the manufacturing company on account of this township tax, and directing the county treasurer to refund that amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 991; Dec. Dig. ⚭535.]

[This case is also cited in Congaree Construction Co. v. Columbia Tp., 49 S. C. 539, 27 S. E. 570, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Pressley, J., Anderson, April, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case. The Circuit judgment was as follows:

Under act of 1882 Williamston township voted a subscription of $6,000 to the stock of said company. It was levied by tax, in two installments, on the property in said township, including that of the Pelzer Manufacturing Company. It claimed a return of a portion of its tax, under the manufacturers' act of 1873, and on its petition to the comptroller general, to whom by said act jurisdiction was given to "fix and determine" said matter, he fixed that $1,105 46-100 of said tax should be returned to said company, and by his order said amount was so paid by defendant. Plaintiff now sues him on his bond as treasurer of Anderson County, claiming that said amount was duly levied and collected for plaintiff's use under act of 1882, which plainly requires said treasurer to pay the sum so collected to the plaintiff or his treasurer. As defendant was not liable to pay said amount more than once, plaintiff contends that the payment to the Pelzer Company was unlawful.

One ground is, that it was a mere assessment for local purposes, and therefore was not a "county or municipal" tax contemplated by the act of 1873. That position seems to me untenable. The act under which it was levied calls it a tax; the proceeds are not required to be used for any improvements within the township, made a corporation by said act; the levy was by the county commissioners, and the collection was by the county treasurer, "in the same manner as the other State and county taxes." It was, therefore, either a county tax, or a municipal tax by the township in its special corporate capacity.

Plaintiff further urges that, as the act which authorizes this tax directs the proceeds to be paid to plaintiff, that is, pro tanto, a repeal of so much of the act of 1873 as required that it be refunded to the Pelzer Company. This position is untenable, because the act of 1873 is a contract, and the legislature cannot repeal it so as to affect rights already vested at the time of the repeal. I must, therefore, construe both acts together, so as to give full effect to all provisions of each act, and under that rule it seems plain to me that the act of 1882 required the commissioners to levy an amount sufficient to pay said subscription, and also to return to the Pelzer Company the amount it was entitled to under the act of 1873.

Plaintiff further urges that the Pelzer Company was not entitled to said return of any portion of its taxes, because it fails to distinguish in its tax returns between that portion of its property so exempt from taxation and that portion which was not exempt. This ground is untenable, because the comptroller general, whose duty it was to "fix" and "determine" that matter, has done so upon a showing satisfactory to himself.

Further, it is contended that under art. 9, sec. 4, of our Constitution, this money could not be lawfully paid to the Pelzer Company without special appropriation to that purpose by act of the legislature. My judgment on this point is, that the act of 1873 as clearly appropriates this money to the Pelzer Company as can be claimed for the plaintiff under the act of 1882. In each case the appropriation is under the general act, and if the one be good, the other cannot be bad. Plaintiff, therefore, could not recover in this case, if his constitutional objection be tenable. There is no appropriation in its favor which differs in any respect from that to the Pelzer Company.

*Finally, it is objected that the act of 1873 is unconstitutional and void. I would not so decide were that question rightly before me in this case. It has been decided that a county or township tax to pay subscriptions to the stock of a railroad company is constitutional, and if public money raised by taxation can rightly be appropriated for that purpose, I cannot perceive why it should not follow that it may also be appropriated to draining low-lands, digging the Columbia canal, encouraging manufacturers, or to any other internal improvements which the legislature may deem wise and proper. But this question is not involved in this case. This is a suit on defendant's bond to the State, and he is not in default when he obeys—as he did in this case—the plain letter of the law. If a mere ministerial officer in such case were to assume to judge of the constitutionality of the law under which he acts, we would soon have anarchy in all the State offices.

The complaint is therefore dismissed.

Messrs. Child & Boggs and G. E. Prince, for appellants.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, contra.

July 14, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Under an act of the general assembly of this State, passed in 1882, Williamston township, in Anderson County, voted a subscription of $6,000 to the capital stock of the Carolina, Cumberland Gap & Chicago Railway Company, the plaintiff. This subscription was to be paid in two equal annual instalments. The first instalment seems to have been collected and paid in full to the plaintiff. When the second instalment was collected, and before paid over to the plaintiff, the Pelzer Manufacturing Company, a company located and doing business within the Williamston township, claimed the benefit of the act of 1873, to encourage and aid manufacturers, re-enacted as subdivision 23 of section 169, General Statutes. The comptroller general referred the question to the attorney general, who advised that the Pelzer Company was entitled to the benefit of the act of 1873. He then instructed the treasurer that the tax should be paid, with a pe-tion from the company to have it *refunded. This course appears to have been followed and the county treasurer paid the amount, fixed and determined by the comptroller as proper, to wit, $1,105.46, back to the company.

Shortly thereafter, the railway company commenced the action below against M. P. Tribble, county treasurer, and the other defendants, his bondsmen, for the recovery of this sum with interest. The case was heard by his honor, Judge Pressley, without a jury, who dismissed the complaint. The appeal of the plaintiff is founded upon numerous exceptions. From the view which we have taken of the case, however, it will not be necessary to consider these exceptions seriatim. In our opinion, the main questions in the case, those upon which it must turn, are: 1st. Does the act of 1873 apply to a tax like the one raised upon the township voting this subscription? 2nd. If so, was the county treasurer authorized to refund the amount paid in by the Pelzer Company, back to said company, out of the subscription money voted by the township, and collected by him, thereby diminishing the subscription to that extent? If either of these propositions is negative, then it was error in the Circuit Judge to dismiss the complaint, and a new trial must follow.

The act of 1873, upon this subject, provides, that any person engaged in manufacturing shall, for a period of ten years from the date of his investment, be entitled to receive from the treasury of the State a sum equal to the aggregate amount of State, and, from the county treasurer the aggregate amount of county, taxes and from all municipal corporations, a sum equal to the aggregate amount of municipal taxes, which shall be levied and collected upon the property or capital employed, or invested directly in such manufactures or enterprises, not including herein the tax levied upon the land upon which the factories may be erected. Gen. Stat., § 169. And in the charter of the Pelzer Company, it is provided, that said company is entitled "to the benefits enumerated and contained in the act entitled, 'an act to aid and encourage manufacture,' approved December 20, 1873, for a term of ten years from the date of its organization."

It is clear that the act of 1873, and the provision in the Pelzer Company's charter, supra, entitles that company to receive from the treasury of the State, or from the county treasurer, or *from municipal treasurers, as the case may be, an amount equal to any tax which may be levied and collected upon its property for State, county, or municipal purposes. This the act in express terms provides for, and so plainly that there is no room for question or doubt. And if it be that the tax collected by the defendant, county treasurer, is either a State, county, or municipal tax, then the first question is solved. But is it either in the sense of those terms as used in the act of 1873? There is no doubt on the question of its being a tax. Chamblée v. Tribble, Treasurer, 23 S. C., 70. It is equally certain that it is not a State or municipal tax. Is it a county tax in the sense of the act? The term county has a well defined meaning. By act the State has been divided into a certain number of territorial boundaries called counties. Each county is a body politic and corporate for certain purposes, among which are to purchase and hold for the use of the county lands and personalty within the limits thereof, to make all contracts, and to do all acts in relation to the property and concerns of the county necessary thereto. County commissioners are provided for, who are the officials of the county, and represent it. These officials regulate the county finances, and ascertain and report the amount of county taxes necessary to be raised for county purposes, upon which report the collection is authorized by act of the legislature.

Now, Williamston township, which voted the subscription upon which the tax herein was collected, is located in Anderson County, but does that fact make the tax in any sense a county tax? This tax was laid on Williamston township, not upon the report of the county commissioners, not by act of the general assembly, not for county purposes, but by a vote of the people of that township under the authority of an act of 1882, passed, we must suppose, at the instance of said people, and for the purpose of enabling them to assist a private enterprise, true a great enterprise, and one which, if it could be completed, would, no doubt, be of great public benefit, but still an enterprise in which neither the State nor the county had any official connection, or interest, and therefore a private enterprise. Now, how can a tax thus assumed by this township upon the voluntary vote of the taxpayers themselves under an act passed at their instance *and assumed for the purpose of assisting the plaintiff in an enterprise which it was supposed, no doubt, would be of a great benefit to said township, be regarded as a county tax in the sense of those terms as used in the act of 1873? The act of 1873 was intended to exempt manufactures from the ordinary State, county, and municipal taxes. The terms employed do not carry the act beyond such taxes, and we have no authority or power to extend these terms beyond their ordinary and common meaning. When the act of 1882 was enacted authorizing the township in question to vote a subscription to this road, then was the time to have provided for refunding so much of the tax voted as might fall on this manufacturing company, if it was to be exempt. This, however, was not done, and we do not think that now the act of 1873 can be invoked to that end. Such a tax, we are satisfied, was not in the contemplation of the legislature at the time the act of 1873 was passed. It is not within the meaning of the terms of the act, and it would be ultra vires for this court to interpolate the act and embrace this tax.

But if we are mistaken in the conclusion above, yet we think that the appeal must be sustained upon the second question. Was the county treasurer authorized to draw from the sum collected on the township subscription the amount of the Pelzer Company's tax for the purpose of refunding the same to said company, even supposing that said company was entitled to a rebate under the act of 1873? Was this rebate a charge upon the subscription, and to that extent diminishing it? The act of 1882 provides in its 6th section that the townships of Belton and Williamston, in Anderson County, may, by vote of a majority of the voters therein, authorize the county commissioners to subscribe such sum, not to exceed $6,000, to the capital stock of plaintiff company. And after such vote, if in favor of the subscription, the said county commissioners were required to make the subscription in behalf of the township so voting. § 9. And in section 11 it is provided that all moneys collected on account of any subscription made under this act shall, as soon after collected as practicable, be turned over by the county treasurer aforesaid to the treasurer of said company, or their legally authorized agent.

*Now, it appears that a vote was had in Williamston township under this act, the result of which authorized the county commissioners to subscribe on behalf of this township the sum of $6,000. This subscription was made, and no doubt stock to that extent issued "in behalf of the township." The tax for the amount of the subscription was levied and collected as provided in the act. When thus collected, we cannot see why it did not become immediately subject to the operation of the 11th section, supra, which imperatively declares that all moneys collected on account of any subscription made under the act shall, as soon as practicable, be turned over by the county treasurer to the treasurer of said company. Any other construction would defeat, or might defeat, and entirely abrogate the act. Suppose the tax of the Pelzer Company had been much greater than it was, amounting to one-half, two-thirds, or, to take an extreme case, the whole of the subscription, how could the subscription ever have been met, if the treasurer was bound, as soon as it was collected, to return it to the taxpayer, as contended for by the respondent. A construction which works such a result cannot be the correct one.

We think the vote of the township authorizing the subscription of $6,000 to the capital stock of the plaintiff company was in the nature of a contract on the part of the township, and that sum must be paid to said company, and the money raised under the act to meet this subscription by virtue of section 11 of the act virtually belonged to the plaintiff, and should have been turned over to the treasurer of the company "as soon as practicable" after collection. This conclusion does not necessarily repeal the act of 1873, admitting that it covers a tax of the kind under consideration. Because, if under the act of 1873 the Pelzer Company is entitled to the rebate, even against a subscription as here, there is nothing in that act which requires that this rebate shall be had out of the subscription money, thereby diminishing the subscription, while in the act of 1882 there is an imperative injunction that all moneys collected under the subscription shall be at once turned over to the treasurer of the railroad company.

Can the action of the comptroller in this matter shield the *treasurer? Under the act of 1873 the comptroller is authorized and empowered to "fix and determine" the sum of money to be repaid to manufacturers, the State tax to be paid by the State treasurer on his warrant, and the county tax by the county treasurer on his order; but he is nowhere empowered to direct the particular fund out of which this repayment shall be made, nor do we understand that the comptroller gave any order to that effect. He fixed and determined the amount, which he had the right to do, and, supposing that the act of 1873 applied, he gave the order that the amount thus fixed and determined should be refunded. This he had also the right to do under the supposition that the act of 1873 was applicable, but he had no authority (nor do we see that he has attempted to do so) to direct that this repayment should be made out of a fund collected and, in substance, already appropriated to a different and a special purpose, and over which other parties had a special claim.

Having reached the conclusion above upon the two questions suggested in the beginning, it is unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised in the exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

25 S. C. 267

HUFEMAN v. STORK.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨78.]

An order confirming the clerk's taxation of costs is not the final judgment in the cause, in the sense that on an appeal therefrom the prior judgment dismissing the complaint, and other previous orders may be excepted to and reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 480; Dec. Dig. ⇨78.]

[2. Costs ⇨158.]

Consent by defendants to an order of reference "to take the testimony and report the same to the court," was not an election as to the manner of trial or the waiver of any defects or irregularities; and defendants having obtained judgment, their attorneys were entitled to the costs of all references held under such order, notwithstanding they disregarded at the final hearing the testimony so taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 579; Dec. Dig. ⇨158.]

[3. Costs ⇨158.]

The complaint having been dismissed with costs and no appeal taken, the plaintiffs were liable for all the costs of the references in the action, *even though the judge reached his conclusion without considering the testimony taken at such references.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 579; Dec. Dig. ⇨158.]

[4. Clerks of Courts ⇨11.]

Attorneys attending before the clerk at the taxation of costs are not entitled to the costs of a reference; nor is the clerk entitled to costs for making report of his taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Clerks of Courts, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. ⇨11.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, April, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Mr. R. A. Lynch, for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Lyles and L. F. Youmans, contra.

July 16, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Maurice Goldsmith and Peter Kind, composing the firm of "Goldsmith & Kind," conducting the Phoenix Iron Works, of Columbia, became embarrassed in their affairs and on March 1, 1878, made an assignment (with schedule of property attached) to A. Stork, in trust to sell the property and apply the proceeds to their debts. Among the creditors of Goldsmith & Kind was one J. N. Huffman, who refused to accept under the assignment, and sued them to judgment, April 26, 1880. Execution issued on the judgment was returned by the sheriff "nulla bona." J. N. Huffman, the judgment creditor, died, and the plaintiffs, his administrators, instituted these proceedings, alleging that the assignment was fraudulent and void, and the assignee, Stork, was conspiring with G. Dierck and one Kleinbeck, another judgment creditor, to defraud the other creditors, and praying that the assignment should be set aside, for injunction, the appointment of a receiver, &c. The debtors, Goldsmith & Kind, were not made parties by process. Kleinbeck answered by his attorneys, Bachman & Youmans. Dierck answered by his attorneys, Monteith & Ladson. And Stork answered by his attorneys, John T. Sloan, jr., and Wm. H. Lyles. The latter, after a general denial of most of the allegations in the complaint, pleaded that he had already instituted proceedings in the court, entitled Abram Stork, assignee, v. Jesse E. Dent, sheriff, et al., in the nature of a creditor's bill, to settle *the assigned estate, which had all been turned over to be administered by the court, under a call for creditors to present and prove their demands.

On motion of Messrs. Lynch & Bauskett, counsel for the plaintiffs, it was "referred to J. T. Seibels, Esq., master for Richland County, to take the testimony offered by the various parties, and to report the same to this court." Accordingly the master held a reference to take testimony on January 8, 1884, and pursuant to adjournment another on January 11, and another on January 15, on January 28, and on February 6, 7, 11, 12, 14, 15, 20, 26, 27, and on March 4, 7, 14, 18, 25, and on April 8, on which day there was an adjournment to April 25; but before that day arrived, viz., on April 24, Judge Fraser ordered, "That unless Goldsmith and Kind were made parties by the 20th day of May next, either of the other defendants shall have the right to move to have the complaint dismissed. Proceedings under order of November 19 [to take testimony], above referred to, will be suspended until further order of the court. All questions as to costs are reserved for the further order of the court." Maurice Goldsmith and Peter Kind, who had previously required that they should be served with process, were formally made parties, and Goldsmith answered by his attorney, Newman K. Perry, and Kind answered by his attorneys, John T. Sloan, jr., and Lyles & Haynsworth.

At the November term of the court for Lexington, the plaintiffs made a motion before Judge Wallace that, as the order of Judge Fraser had been complied with as to making parties, the references might be continued, but this order was refused; and at the same term of the court for Richland County, December 2, 1884, Judge Wallace "dismissed the complaint with costs."

Soon after, the defendants made application to the clerk to tax the costs, which, after due notice, was done. (See the taxation fully stated in the "Brief.") The clerk reports with the taxation as follows: "No objection was made to the attorneys' costs. No objection was made to the clerk's costs. Mr. Lynch admits so much of the sheriff's costs as calls for the fees for the service of summons and complaint. As to the remainder, he claims that the defendants should pay, because the parties, having elected to try the cause before the mas*ter, and they having withdrawn it from the master before the plaintiff had closed his testimony, and elected to try the cause before the court, they should pay all the costs which had accrued before the master. Unless otherwise directed by the court, the prevailing party is always entitled to have all the costs taxed in his favor. I therefore overrule these objections. Mr. Lynch objects to the master's costs, because only parts of several days were spent in the different references. Where the master spends any part of a day, however small, in the business of a reference, I hold that the master is entitled to his fees as for a whole day," &c. (Exception taken.)

From the taxation of the clerk the plaintiffs appealed to the Circuit Court; and after argument there, Judge Witherspoon refused to correct the taxation. The plaintiffs appealed from this order, and in doing so, embraced also appeals from the order of Judge Fraser, April 24, 1884, and that of Judge Wallace, December 2, 1884—claiming that the order of Judge Witherspoon, refusing to overrule the taxation of costs by the clerk, was the final decree in the case, and that the other former decrees referred to were intermediate only, and might be reviewed, in considering the appeal upon the subject of costs. This court did not take that view, and upon motion to dismiss the appeal did dismiss it as to the orders of Judge Fraser and of Judge Wallace, as not taken in time; leaving only for our consideration so much of the appeal as relates to the taxation of the costs. The exceptions upon that subject are as follows:

I. Because the defendants, Stork, Dierck, and Kleinbeck, by consenting in writing to the reference ordered November 19, 1883, determined the mode of trial in the cause; and having appeared and taken part in the trial, thereby waived any and all irregularities; and having chosen to determine the reference by the order of April 24, 1884, the plaintiffs cannot be taxed with the costs which had accrued up to that time.

II. Because Goldsmith & Kind, having entered a voluntary appearance by their attorney, and served their answer upon the plaintiffs, all the parties were properly before the court when the order of Judge Fraser was passed, and the plaintiffs cannot be called upon to pay costs of references which were disregarded by the defendants, and were not used in determining the issues between the parties, as the trial was de novo before his honor, Judge Wallace, at the November term of the court on other evidence.

III. Because the said taxation is inequitable and works a hardship on the plaintiffs.

It seems to us that the first exception is founded upon a misapprehension as to a matter of fact. The consent of the defendants to the order of reference made by Judge Aldrich, November 19, 1883, did not in any way make an election or "determine the mode of trial." The order was made on the motion of plaintiffs' counsel, and the defendants simply consented to it. Besides "the trial of the case" was not thereby referred to the master as referee. The order did not even authorize him "to decide the issues of law and of fact," but merely to take "the testimony and report the same to the court," which, of course, was still to try the case. That in no way changed the rule, that the successful party has the right to tax his costs against the unsuccessful party. Consent as to the manner of taking the testimony was no admission as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover, or an election as to the manner of trial, or a waiver of any defects or irregularities.

As to the second exception. We cannot understand the view, that the plaintiffs had the right to escape the ordinary consequences of failing in their action, merely for the reason that the judge did not think it necessary to have before him all the mass of testimony taken on nineteen separate days, under the order directing the master to take the testimony. Upon the testimony before the judge, he dismissed the complaint "with costs"; and if that was error—if he rendered his decree upon insufficient testimony or a mistaken view of what was necessary to sustain the action—we know of no way in which that error could be corrected, except upon appeal from that judgment. The loss of the case, no matter upon what ground or upon what evidence, entailed upon the plaintiffs the penalty of having all the proper and legitimate costs of the defendants taxed against them, unless otherwise ordered by the court; and the only order made upon the subject was that of Judge Wallace, dismissing the complaint "with costs."

*The third exception is very vague and general, that "the said taxation is inequitable and works a hardship on the plaintiffs." But, inasmuch as no compensation is allowed for services in conducting or defending a suit in court, independently of that which is provided by statute, and the party laying claim to costs must lay his finger on some statutory provision expressly, or by necessary implication, allowing them, we have looked carefully through this bill of costs. We confess, we do not see clear warrant of law for the three last supplementary items in the taxation, amounting to the small sum of $13. Ten dollars of it were taxed for solicitors attending "reference before the clerk," as we suppose, on the "taxation of the costs." The law giving a defendant's solicitor compensation for attending a reference is in these words: "Each day's attendance on reference before clerk, master, or referee, five dollars."

Was the taxation of costs by the clerk a "reference" in the sense of the act? We hardly think so. The taxation in this case was not expressly referred to the clerk by the court, but was simply one of the duties incident to the office of clerk. See Guignard v. Harley, 11 Rich. Eq., 1, in which the court says: "There may be, and is, much difficulty in defining the meaning of this term (reference). But in theory of law, it always implies that the matter referred has been before the court, and comes from the court to its commissioner; and this is the true idea, even in cases where the legislature has authorized the commissioner to grant orders of reference. He grants them in place of the court. * * * Another charge of solicitors objected to, is attendance upon 'a reference to tax costs.' This relates to the taxation of costs by the commissioner of Barnwell. The parties by solicitor laid before him their bill of costs, and supported them against objection. But this was no reference, and the solicitors are not entitled to the charge." &c.

The same view applies to the three dollars allowed the clerk for "report on costs." We do not understand that such report was necessary, or can be properly said to be "making up and returning report on reference, three dollars," as stated in the fee bill. See sections 2428 and 2431, of General Statutes, and section 326 of the Code.

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, with the modification herein indicated, be affirmed.

GREEN v. SPANN.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, December, 1884.

This was an appeal from an order rendered in open court. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Preston L. Melton, for appellant.

Mr. D. Augustus Straker, contra.

July 16, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff sued the defendant on a promissory note for $155, and the defendant allowed judgment for the whole sum to be taken against him by default. Execution was issued thereon and the sheriff attempted to levy the same upon a mule of the defendant, when he claimed said mule as exempt under the homestead law. Thereupon the sheriff desisted and the plaintiff, by affidavits showing that $82.29 of said judgment was due him as part of the purchase money of a mule in the possession of the defendant, made two motions as follows: First, That the complaint in the action be amended by inserting an allegation that the sum of $82.29, evidenced by the aforesaid promissory note, was balance due on purchase of a mule now in the possession of the defendant; and, second, that the following endorsement be made on the judgment recovered against the said defendant, "Eighty-two dollars and twenty-nine *cents of this judgment is balance due on the purchase money of a mule bought of plaintiff by defendant."

After hearing all the affidavits, Judge Wallace granted both motions, giving leave to amend the complaint by inserting the proposed allegation, and making the proposed endorsement as to $82.29, on the judgment; and the defendant appeals to this court upon the grounds: First, that the judge erred in permitting the plaintiff after judgment, to amend his complaint as stated; and, second, in directing the endorsement to be made on the judgment, "that the sum of $82.29 was balance due on the purchase of one mule in possession of the defendant."

From the view which the court takes, it will not be necessary to consider the first ground of appeal, as to the right of the plaintiff, after judgment, to amend his complaint in the particular indicated. That amendment could only have been asked for, in the view that it was necessary to sustain the proposed endorsement on the judgment, that $82.29 of the judgment was in part the consideration of the mule. But in order to sustain such a collateral endorsement, we do not think that it was necessary that the complaint should contain such an allegation; and therefore we will not go into the subject as to what amendments are or are not allowed in the interest of justice after judgment has been rendered.

As to the second exception. The Circuit Judge found as matter of fact (and we agree with him), that eighty-two dollars and twenty-nine cents ($82.29) of the judgment was purchase money of the mule, and ordered an endorsement to that effect to be certified on the judgment. Assuming the fact to be as found, we cannot say that this was error. Section 2001 of the General Statutes declares, "that the exemption contained in the preceding section of this chapter shall not extend to an attachment, levy, or sale on any mesne or final process to secure or enforce the payment either of taxes or of obligations contracted for the purchase of said homestead, &c.; provided, the court or authority issuing said process shall certify thereon that the same is issued for some one or more, and no other of said purposes," &c. If the fact as to the consideration of the note (to the extent of $82.29) had appeared at the time of the trial, we suppose there could hardly *be a doubt as to the right of the court to make a statement of the fact upon the judgment. There is no limit as to time in the act, and we do not see why it could not be as well made afterwards, when the fact appeared.

The judgment of this court is, that so much of the order below as authorized a certificate to be entered on the judgment, "that $82.29 of this judgment is balance due on the purchase money of a mule purchased by the defendant from the plaintiff," be affirmed.

TEDERALL v. BOUKNIGHT.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Judicial Sales ⇨53.]

It is the policy of the law to maintain judicial sales, and therefore a purchaser is not affected by irregularities in the proceedings or error in the judgment; but he is bound, at his peril, to see that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and that the proper parties were before the court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Johnson v. Cobb, 29 S. C. 378, 7 S. E. 601; Iseman v. McMillan, 36 S. C. 36, 15 S. E. 336.

[2. Partition ⇨40.]

A partition ordered by the Probate Court prior to the decision of Davenport v. Caldwell (10 S. C. 317) will not be declared void for want of jurisdiction in the Probate Court over the subject matter.

[3. Evidence ⇨386.]

A judgment of the Probate Court, regular on its face and showing proper service on the parties to it, cannot be contradicted by parol testimony in a collateral proceeding; or from the judgment itself, it may be, that the court would assume that the summons had been properly issued and served.

[4. Infants ⇨78.]

But where the record itself showed that no summons had been issued, and that no application for appointment of guardian ad litem had been served, the record affirmatively shows that

For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. ⇨80.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Edgefield, March, 1885.

The facts of this case are stated in the opinion of the court. The Circuit decree was as follows:

There can be no doubt that when infants are properly made parties, they are bound by the judgment or decree in such cause, and cannot impeach it collaterally. They are, however, not *bound by proceedings in which they have not been properly made parties. Was plaintiff properly made a party to the proceedings before the Probate Court for partition? In the case of Finley v. Robertson (17 S. C., 435) the court say: "A due and tender regard for the rights and welfare of infants requires that the statute shall be strictly followed." What are the formalities then required by statute for making an infant a party to an action? All civil actions in courts of record shall be commenced by service of a summons. Code, § 148. If the action be against a minor under the age of fourteen, a copy of the summons shall be served by delivery to such minor personally, and also to his father, mother, or guardian. Code, § 155, subd. 2.

It is not contended that plaintiff was ever served, or any copy of summons or notice was delivered to her personally in the proceedings for partition. The plaintiff, on the other hand, swears that no papers in the partition case were served upon her; that she had no knowledge of the proceedings in the Probate Court; that she had no notice of the appointment of Wm. Brooks as her guardian ad litem; that Wm. Brooks is dead; that she never received from him, nor from any one else, any of the proceeds of the sale of the land by the Probate Court.

The defendants rely upon the cases of Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C., 309; Walker v. Veno, 6 Id., 459; and McCrosky v. Parks, 13 Id., 91, to show that plaintiff is bound by the proceedings in the Probate Court. It will be observed that the proceedings in these cases were had under the old equity system of procedure, in which there was no mode prescribed by statute for making an infant a party, except his appearance by a guardian ad litem. No notice of process was then required to be made upon the infant personally. In Finley v. Robertson, supra, the court held that an infant seventeen or eighteen years old was not bound by the judgment even when he had accepted service of the summons. I must conclude under the authority of this case that the judgment of the Probate Court in 1874, decreeing a sale of the land described in the complaint, is not binding upon plaintiff, and does not conclude her rights in the premises, as plaintiff was not properly made a party to such proceedings as required by statute.

In this view of the case, plaintiff would not only be entitled *to her share of the land as herein adjudged, but also the same proportion of the rents and profits of the land since January, 1875, after deducting taxes paid thereon by defendants. There is no testimony as to the amount of taxes paid on the land, and the testimony with reference to rents and profits is not sufficiently definite to enable the court to determine the rents and profits plaintiff should be entitled to. It must be referred back to the master to take further testimony and report as to the amount of rents and profits due by defendants to plaintiff, after deducting taxes paid.

Having concluded that plaintiff was born in July, 1861, she attained her majority in July, 1882. I do not, however, think that defendants should be held liable to account to plaintiff for rent from the date of her majority in July, 1882, to November 14, 1883, when this action was brought, as defendants are bona fide purchasers, and had reason to believe that they had a good title.

I conclude as matter of fact: (1) That plaintiff was born in July, 1861, and was under fourteen years of age in October, 1874. (2) That no summons or notice of the proceedings for partition in the Probate Court was served upon plaintiff, or that she then had any knowledge of such proceedings, or of the appointment of Wm. Brooks as her guardian ad litem. (3) That plaintiff has never received any of the proceeds of the sale of the land by order of the Probate Court.

I find as matter of law: 1. That plaintiff, as the sole heir at law of her father, W. Mastin Stewart, is entitled to eleven-fortieths, undivided share or interest in the tract of land described in the complaint, and the same proportion of the rents and profits from said land, after paying taxes from July 1, 1875, with the exception of the period from July, 1882, to November 14, 1883, and that defendants are entitled to the remaining undivided share or interest in said land.

It is ordered and adjudged, that a writ in partition do issue according to the usual practice in this court, to divide the land described in the complaint, so as to allot to plaintiff eleven-fortieths undivided part of said tract, and to the defendants the remainder thereof; provided such division can be made without injury to the rights of either of said parties, &c.

*From this decree defendants appealed upon the grounds stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sheppard Bros., for appellants.
Mr. C. W. Creighton, contra.

July 16, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Many years ago (1826) William Stewart, of Edgefield County, died, leaving a will, by which he gave a tract of land in said county, containing 130 acres, more or less, to his brothers and sisters, among whom was his sister Desdemona (Desdemony), who was never married, but having an illegitimate son, William Mastin Stewart. She conveyed her interest in the said land to him, and in 1873 he died intestate, leaving as his sole heir at law one child, Mary Stewart, then under thirteen years of age. The said Mary afterwards intermarried with one Tederall, and finding that the aforesaid tract of land, in which she was informed she had an interest, was in the possession of strangers, viz., the defendants, Joseph H. Bouknight and John D. Eidson, she instituted these proceedings against them for partition of the land, and to recover her interest, whatever it might be.

The defendants, claiming the land as their own, made vigorous defence, and among other defences alleged as follows: "That in the year 1874 proceedings were filed in the Probate Court for Edgefield County by certain of the heirs (devisees) of William Stewart for the partition of the tract of land described in the complaint, and that the plaintiff herein was a party to said proceedings in the said Probate Court in the case of W. D. McCarty et al. v. Mary Stewart et al.; that under said proceedings an order for the sale of said land was made by the said Probate Court on October (November) 2, 1874; that under said order a sale was made of said land, and that at said sale it was purchased by the defendants, who paid into the Probate Court the full amount of the purchase money, and that they have been since that time the joint owners of said land; and that plaintiff is concluded and estopped from claiming any interest in the said land by said proceedings." &c.

*It was referred to the master, S. S. Tompkins, Esq., to ascertain "the quantum of the interest claimed by the plaintiff, and to take the testimony, reserving for the court all the questions of law and fact." The master ascertained that the interest claimed by the plaintiff was thirty-three one-hundred-and-twentieths ($\frac{33}{120}$), or $\frac{11}{40}$.

He reported the record of the proceeding in probate, and the facts connected therewith, that the land was sold under it and purchased by the defendants for full value, which was paid to the probate judge, and he executed titles (December 7, 1884) to the purchasers, who have been in possession of the same ever since, claiming it as their own. Notwithstanding "the record," the plaintiff was allowed to swear that "no papers in the partition case were ever served on her; that she had no knowledge of the pendency of the action for partition, and never received from William Brooks, or any other person, any of the proceeds of the sale of said lands," &c.

The Circuit Judge held that the plaintiff, Mary, being at that time an infant, was not properly made a party in the probate proceedings for partition, and was not bound by the judgment in that case, or the sale under it, and decreed that she was entitled to recover eleven-fortieths (11-40) of the land, and rents and profits for certain years in the same proportion. From this decree the defendants appeal upon the following grounds: 1. Because his honor erred in deciding that the plaintiff, as the sole heir at law of her father (W. Mastin Stewart), is entitled to 11-40 undivided interest in the tract of land described in the complaint, and the same proportion of the rents and profits for certain years. 2. Because his honor erred in holding that the proceedings in the Probate Court in the case of McCarty et al. v. Mary Stewart et al. for partition of the land, which is the subject matter of this action, are not binding on the plaintiff, Mary Stewart, now Mary Tederall. 3. Because his honor erred in holding that the said proceedings in the Probate Court could be attacked collaterally by the plaintiff.

The Circuit Judge states that no objection below was made to "the quantum" of the plaintiff's interest as reported by the master, and as the point was not pressed in argument here, we suppose that the first exception is abandoned.

*The second and third exceptions, charging error in the ruling that the sale under the judgment of the Probate Court was, as to the plaintiff, illegal and void, are pressed most earnestly. It is urged with force that the defendants, having purchased the land and paid for it at a judicial sale, cannot be affected by any secret vice in the judgment authorizing the sale of which they had no notice, but that all the parties to the probate proceeding are bound by it and estopped from assailing it. It is undoubtedly the policy of the law to maintain judicial sales, wherever it can be done without violating principle or doing injustice; and in this view it is held that a purchaser at such a sale is in no way responsible for mere irregularities in the proceedings, or even error in the judgment, under which the sale is made.

There are, however, two matters as to which purchasers are required at their peril to make inquiry, viz., that the court ordering the sale had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and that all proper parties were before the court when the order was made. Trapier v. Waldo, and authorities, 16 S. C., 282. The partition proceedings in the Probate Court, under which the sale was made, were prior to November 27, 1878, when the judgment in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell [10 S. C. 317] was filed; and therefore it would seem that under the authority of Herndon v. Moore (18 S. C., 339), we must consider the case precisely as if the act of the legislature, which gave to the Probate Court the power to partition lands, was constitutional and valid. It follows that, so far as the rights of the parties before the court are concerned, it must be assumed that the Probate Court, which ordered the sale, had jurisdiction of the subject matter.

But it is alleged that the plaintiff, then a minor of tender years, was not properly a party before the court in the probate proceeding, and therefore the sale as to her was, and is, utterly void. It is familiar doctrine that a judgment binds only those who are parties and their privies; but a judgment is in its character final and conclusive, and how can the allegation that a particular person was not made a party be shown? The judgment presumes it until the contrary appears. It is held that a judgment, "regular on its face," must be taken to be an absolute verity, and is beyond the reach of contradiction or assault in a collateral man*ner, as in this case. That is to say, as we understand it, such a judgment can only be assailed by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Therefore, if the proceedings in the Probate Court were "regular on their face," it was error to admit parol testimony tending to contradict the record and to annul the sale as to the plaintiff. It is settled that a purchaser for value at a judicial sale, without notice of the extrinsic facts, which are relied on to impeach the judgment, cannot be affected thereby; that such a purchaser without notice, under proceedings regular upon their face, and had in a court of competent jurisdiction, is not affected by any mere error of the court for which judgment might be reversed on appeal, nor for any secret vice in the judgment not appearing on the face of the record, and which can be made to appear only by the production of extrinsic evidence. See Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C., 398, and Quinn v. Wetherbee, 41 Cal., 247.

The question, then, is whether the probate proceedings "were regular on their face," showing that Mary Stewart was properly made a party. This must be determined by an inspection of the record itself, which was introduced by the defendants, and in such issues is always admissible, whether the proceeding is collateral or direct. At that time Mary Stewart was an infant, as the judge found, under fourteen years of age. In such case the law is very exacting, requiring that a copy of "the summons shall be delivered to the infant personally, and also to his father, mother, guardian, &c., or if there be none within the State, then to any person in whose service he may be employed," &c. Code, § 155, subd. 2. When an infant has been thus made a party, he can only appear by guardian ad litem, appointed, if the infant is under fourteen years, upon the application "of any other party to the action, or of a relative or friend of the infant, after notice of such application being first given to the general or testamentary guardian of such infant, if he has one; if he has none, then to the infant himself, if over fourteen years, * * * or if under that age, &c., to the person with whom such infant resides," &c. Code, § 137.

In view of these express requirements of the law, were the probate proceedings in partition "regular on their face," showing *that Mary Stewart was properly made a party? The record does show that Mary was named in the petition as one of only two defendants, the other being William Brooks, as administrator of the estate of her father (W. M. S.), but not her general guardian; that Brooks petitioned the probate judge to be appointed her guardian ad litem, stating therein that his said granddaughter "is desirous of having a guardian ad litem appointed to appear and answer in her behalf," that he was so appointed and answered, submitting her rights, and for himself, as administrator, consenting to the partition prayed for. The record, however, failed to show that the petition prayed for any process to bring the two defendants into court—that any "summons" was issued at all, or that notice was given of the appointment of guardian ad litem. If, however, this were all, and the record in all other respects was regular, it may be that the court would presume that a "summons" issued and was served, and that proper notice was given of the appointment of Brooks as guardian ad litem, upon the ground that the Probate Court having rendered judgment in the case, it will be assumed that, before doing so, it took care to require the performance of everything made necessary to have the parties named as defendants brought before the court.

But upon a careful examination of the whole record, it appears upon its face that the application of Brooks to be appointed guardian ad litem, his appointment as such, his answer and consent to the partition, and the final order of the probate judge (no commission issued) directing sale of the land, were all filed on the same day, viz., November 2, 1874, and the land was actually sold on the succeeding salesday of December. Notwithstanding a strong disposition to support judicial sales, we cannot resist the conclusion that these facts appearing in the record itself fully rebut any presumptions arising from the existence of the judgment, and show affirmatively that the probate partition was a mere consent proceeding on the part of Brooks, the only adult defendant, who undertook to act for his little granddaughter, Mary, and that she had in fact no notice whatever, either of the proceeding, or that he had procured himself to be appointed her guardian ad litem. It may be that it was considered unnecessary to perform what seemed to be an unmeaning ceremony *in serving a copy of summons, and in giving notice to an infant incapable from her years of comprehending the transaction or its purpose and object. But the provisions of the law upon the subject are minute and positive. The court, always anxious to protect the rights of infants, must assume that there was some good reason for all the requirements, and enforce them. At all events, we have not, for the reason assigned, or any other, the dispensing power.

The cases in our own Reports principally relied on for the defendants were Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C., 309; Walker v. Veno, 6 Id., 459; and McCrosky v. Parks, 13 Id., 92. It will be observed, however, that all these cases involved the question as to what was necessary to make infants parties under the old practice in chancery and the court of ordinary, which prevailed before the adoption of the code in 1870. But the case of Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C., 435, and the late case of Riker v. Vaughan, 23 S. C., 187, were decided under the provisions of the code cited above.¹ In the latter case the court held that "jurisdiction of the person of an infant can only be obtained by pursuing the mode prescribed by statute." We agree with the Circuit Judge, that the proceedings in the Probate Court were not "regular on their face," but, on the contrary, show that Mary Stewart, named as an infant defendant, was never legally made a party, and that the judgment and order of sale in probate were, as to the said Mary, coram non jure, and void.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

¹ See, also, Genobles v. West, 23 S. C., 154, and Whitesides v. Barber, 24 Id., 373. This question must surely now be regarded as settled.—REPORTER.

HARVEY v. HARVEY.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Escheat ⇨2.]

Section 11, of article X., of the Constitution, which gives "the proceeds of all estates of deceased persons who have died without leaving a will or heirs" to the State School Fund, applies as well to those dying after the adoption of the constitution as to those dying before:

*284

*and an act of the legislature vesting such an estate in an individual is repugnant to this constitutional provision.

Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, June, 1885.

This was an appeal from a Circuit decree which dismissed a complaint for partition under the authority of In re Malone's estate, 21 S. C., 435. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Wofford & Jennings and Stanyarne Wilson, for plaintiff, his brothers and sisters.

Messrs. Duncan & Sanders, for Wm. Harvey.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for Jonas Swink.

July 19, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The facts of this case, as found by the referee, are as follows: The defendant, Jonas Swink, in 1853, with a view to support his son, Jonas Harvey, an illegitimate son of Caroline Harvey, executed a paper under seal, in the presence of two witnesses, in which he stipulated that the rents and profits of a certain tract of land therein described, and which he stated therein that he had that day given to said Jonas Harvey, should go to the support of the said Jonas Harvey, provided that he should not conclude to sell said land, and apply the interest of the money to the same use; and in the event if he should not live to see the said Jonas Harvey arrive at age, then the paper should be authority to any one with whom it might be deposited, to apply the rents and profits to the use of the said Jonas Harvey until of age, and to call upon the executor or administrator of the said Jonas Swink for a full deed of the land to the said Jonas Harvey, binding himself and his heirs to the performance of the conditions, provided, however, that he, *Jonas Swink, should have the power to sell the said land, putting the money at interest until Jonas Harvey should arrive of age, and "then give him the principal instead of the land." This paper was recorded, and Caroline Harvey and her child, Jonas Harvey, went into possession, and remained together in possession until Jonas Harvey, some twenty years afterwards, moved to the State of Arkansas, where he died in August, 1874, being then over the age of twenty-one. Caroline, the mother, remained in possession of the land until her death in December, 1882.

That in February, 1882, an act of the legislature was passed, vesting all the property, real and personal, of which Jonas Harvey, deceased, was seized, in the said Caroline Harvey, her heirs and assigns; that the plaintiff, Joseph C. Harvey, and the defendants, Jemima Harvey, John H. Harvey Franklin Harvey, and Canada McCray, are brothers and sisters of Caroline Harvey, and her only heirs at law; that in August, 1881, the defendant, Jonas Swink, commenced action against Caroline Harvey, A. H. Ward, and Jemima Harvey, for the recovery of this land; that this action abated by the death of Caroline Harvey, as to her, but a verdict was rendered thereafter as to A. H. Ward and Jemima Harvey in favor of Jonas Swink; that the defendants, Jane Ward, A. H. Ward, and William Harvey, never claimed the land except through and under Jonas Harvey and Caroline Harvey.

Under the above state of facts the action below was commenced by the plaintiff, demanding partition of this land between himself and the other brothers and sisters of Caroline Harvey, some of the defendants, her only heirs at law. Jonas Swink was made a party defendant, as also A. H. Ward, Jane Ward, and William Harvey, in possession. Swink answered, claiming the land in fee, and stating that he had lately recovered judgment for the possession as against A. H. Ward and Jemima, or Mima Harvey, a sister of Caroline Harvey; that Jane Ward was now unlawfully in possession, and he demanded judgment that he be adjudged owner in fee and entitled to immediate possession as against all and every of the parties to this action. Jane Ward and William Harvey answered, claiming ownership and alleging possession and pleading the statute of limitations.

*The referee, upon the above facts, found as matters of law: 1st, that Jane Ward, A. H. Ward, and William Harvey had no interest in the land and were not entitled to remain in possession; 2d, that the instrument executed by Jonas Swink in 1853, was not a deed, but an agreement to convey the land in dispute to Jonas Harvey on his arriving at the age of twenty-one; 3d, that the plaintiff and the defendants, Jemima Harvey, John H. Harvey, Franklin Harvey, and Caroline McCravy, are the legal heirs of Caroline Harvey, who was the sole heir of Jonas Harvey, and as such heirs are entitled (except Jemima Harvey) to demand from the defendant, Jonas Swink, a good and sufficient conveyance each to one undivided fifth interest in the land in dispute; that the defendant, Jemima Harvey, is estopped by the judgment of Jonas Swink, above referred to, from making such demand. And he recommended that the possession of Jane Ward, A. H. Ward, and William Harvey be adjudged unlawful; that the conveyance above suggested from Jonas Swink be executed; and that after said conveyance, that the parties, heirs at law of Caroline Harvey, be allowed partition according to their rights.

This report upon exceptions was heard by his honor, Judge Cothran, who, holding that the act of 1882, by which the estate of Jonas Harvey was vested in his mother, Caroline Harvey, was unconstitutional, decreed that the plaintiff and the defendants who stood with plaintiff, claiming partition of the land, had no status in court. He therefore dismissed the complaint with costs, passing by all the other questions in the case, including those raised in the answer of defendant, Jonas Swink, as against the other defendants. After the decree of his honor, dismissing the complaint, was announced, a consent decree settling the rights of the defendant, Jonas Swink, and the defendant, Jane Ward, was proposed, whereby it was agreed that the land should be sold, and the proceeds divided, after payment of costs, between the said Jonas and the said Jane, as follows, to wit: 9-10ths to Jonas and 1-10th to Jane. This his honor declined; because the complaint having been dismissed, any further attempt to adjudge the matters in controversy would be irregular and illogical; and, moreover, the parties being sui juris, could make their own settlement. This order was afterwards presented to his honor, Judge Wallace, who declined to consider it, on the ground that Judge Cothran had declined it.

All parties have appealed; the plaintiff on the ground that his honor erred in holding that the enabling act of 1882 is in conflict with art. X., sec. 11, of State Constitution, and conferred no rights upon these parties; and in holding that the other parties hereto are in a position to take advantage of the unconstitutionality of the act. Jonas Swink gave notice that in his appeal he would move this court to modify and amend the decree of Judge Cothran by incorporating therein the proposed consent decree, which he alleges that both Judge Cothran and Judge Wallace erred in not adopting; and failing in this, that this court would modify the decree of Judge Cothran and adjudge title and right of possession in the said Jonas Swink, on the ground of numerous alleged errors in the ruling of Judge Cothran in not sustaining objections to referee's report, &c. William Harvey also appealed upon grounds hereafter to be noticed, if necessary.

The first question presented is as to the constitutionality of the act of 1882, whereby the rights of Jonas Harvey were vested in his mother, Caroline Harvey. This question depends upon the construction which shall be given to section 11, article X., of the Constitution. That section is as follows: "The proceeds of all estates of deceased persons who have died without leaving a will or heirs, shall be securely invested and sacredly preserved as a State school fund, and the annual interest and income of said fund, together with such other means as the general assembly may provide, shall be faithfully appropriated for the purpose of establishing and maintaining free public schools, and for no other purposes or uses whatever."

Now, did the framers of the constitution intend that this section should apply only to those who had died previous to the adoption of that instrument, or did they intend to include those who might at any time die with the conditions and circumstances surrounding them as therein mentioned? The words producing doubt, or rather demanding interpretation, are these: "Of all deceased persons who have died without leaving a will or heirs, shall be securely invested." Under a very strict and technical construction of these words, it might be thought at first that they referred entirely to the past, and only included such deceased persons as had died before the adoption of the constitution; but when we look at the conditions and circumstances attached and which were to determine the disposition of the estates of such deceased persons, we will at once see that they had no reference to time, but simply referred to the conditions and circumstances, and was the same as saying, that where one having died at any time leaving no will or heir, his estate should be securely invested, &c. This view is sustained by the further consideration, that the former construction would render the section almost nugatory and useless. We concur with the Circuit Judge, that the act of 1882, referred to, is in conflict with section 11, article X., of the Constitution, and therefore failed to invest Caroline Harvey with the rights of Jonas Harvey, and therefore that her heirs at law, plaintiffs and defendants, claiming through her, have no status in court.

But it is urged that the defendants have no right to raise this question; that only one whose rights are involved and whose interests are to be affected, can urge the unconstitutionality of an act of the legislature—citing Cool. Con. Lim., 163. This is sound doctrine, and should not be disregarded. Respect for the legislature, as well as sound policy and principle, demand that acts should not be hastily and unnecessarily pronounced invalid. In this case, however, the heirs of Caroline Harvey claim through the act of 1882. It is a link, and the most important link, in their chain of titles. Before they can claim successfully a partition of the real estate in question, they must prove title, and claiming through this act as one of the links in the chain, they themselves necessarily bring it under the review of the court; and being thus brought under review, the court must pass upon it. We think there was no error in the Circuit Judge in considering the question, nor in ruling thereon.

Nor was there error in declining to incorporate the proposed consent decree, after he had dismissed the complaint. The decree of dismissal put the case beyond his jurisdiction, and also beyond the jurisdiction of his honor, Judge Wallace. It was substantially out of court.

*We, however, think it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to dismiss the complaint without deciding the other questions presented in the case, and especially those arising between the defendants, and the exceptions to the referee's report on the part of the defendants. And with the view to have these questions adjudicated.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court dismissing the complaint be reversed, and that the case be remanded for the hearing of those questions arising in the pleadings between the defendants.

HAYNE v. IRVINE.

Before Witherspoon, J., Greenville, March, 1886.

This was a controversy without action between Paul T. Hayne, as trustee of Mary McMahan, and the children and grandchildren of Mrs. Frances Irvine, deceased, submitted January 6, 1886. The case involved the construction of the following codicil to Daniel McMahan's will: "It is my will and desire, and I so direct, that in case my daughters Mary and Elizabeth, or either of them, should die without issue lawfully begotten and living at their or either of their deaths, then and in that case all the property, both real and personal, and moneys and choses in action which they may then have left from the provisions by me made for them in my said will, shall be given to the lawful heirs of my daughters, Mrs. Nancy Hill, the wife of Wm. R. Hill, and Mrs.

*Frances Irvine, the wife of Dr. O. B. Irvine, to be divided equally between the children of my said daughters, Mrs. Hill and Mrs. Irvine, to have and to hold to them and their heirs forever share and share alike."

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The question submitted for the determination of the court is, whether the children of Pinckney take under the codicil the share that their father would take if living, or, do the children of Frances Irvine, deceased, living at the death of Mary McMahan, take to the exclusion of Pinckney's children?

It will be observed that the provision made by testator in his will for his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, was not limited to the lives of the daughters with remainder over, but the entire estate provided for them under the will was given to them by testator. The codicil only provides, in the event of the death of Mary and Elizabeth without issue, what disposition shall then be made of the property "which they may then have left from the provisions by me made for them in said will." It seems to me that under the codicil no rights or interests could attach to the children of Mrs. Hill and Mrs. Irvine until the death of Mary and Elizabeth without issue. In this view I do not think that Pinckney, at the time of his death, had acquired under the codicil such an interest as would descend to his children. But for the use by the testator of the terms "heirs" in the codicil, the case of Wessenger v. Hunt, 9 Rich. Eq., 464, would be conclusive upon the point submitted to the court.

In this case Chancellor Wardlaw upon Circuit says: * * *

Under the codicil the time fixed for distribution is at the death of Mary and Elizabeth without issue, which was a time future to the death of the testator. The testator could not have intended to use the word "heirs" in the codicil in its technical sense, as the children of Mrs. Irvine could take under the codicil, upon the death of Mary and Eliza-both without issue, whether their mother was then living or dead. I am satisfied that the testator used the word "heirs" as synonymous with the word "children" in the codicil, as the description of a class of persons, whom he intended to take, upon the death of his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, without issue. In my judgment there is nothing in the *codicil in conflict with this view, construing the word "heirs" to mean "children."

I construe, under the authority of Wessenger v. Hunt, supra, that the children of Mrs. Irvine, who were living at the death of Mary McMahan, take under the codicil, to the exclusion of the children of Pinckney, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

From this decree the children of Pinckney appealed upon the following grounds: I. Because Pinckney Irvine, having been living at the date of the codicil to the will of Daniel McMahan, and also at the time of his death, took such an interest under said codicil as entitled his children, the said defendants, to inherit the same through him at the death of Mary McMahan. II. Because the judge erred in holding that the testator used the word "heirs" in said codicil in the sense of "children," and thus construing the gift to the heirs of Nancy and Frances as a gift to their "children" living at the death of Mary. III. Because the testator expressly gave the property in question to the heirs of Nancy and Frances, and his reference to the children was simply to show the manner in which, or the quantity of estate which, said heirs should take respectively, and therefore his honor should have held that the children of Pinckney, as heirs of Frances, took among them the share which Pinckney would take if living.

Messrs. Bellinger & Clyde, for appellants.
Messrs. Stokes & Irvine, contra.

July 19, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case was heard below upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that one Daniel McMahan, by will dated in 1845, bequeathed certain property to his two daughters, Mary and Elizabeth. Thereafter, in 1846, by codicil to this will he directed "that in case Mary and Elizabeth, or either of them, should die without lawful issue, at their death, or at the death of either of them, then in that case the said property * * * which they may have left, shall be given to the lawful heirs" of two of his other daughters, Mrs. Nancy Hill and Mrs.

Francis Irvine, to be equally divided * "between the children" of his said two daughters, "to them and their heirs forever share and share alike." Mrs. Francis Irvine died before either Mary or Elizabeth; a son of hers, Pinckney, also died before Mary or Elizabeth, but after his mother; then both Mary and Elizabeth died without issue. Upon these facts, the question submitted to the court below was, whether the children of Pinckney (defendants) could take the share that their father would have taken, had he survived Mary and Elizabeth, or do the children of Mrs. Francis Irvine living at the death of Mary take to the exclusion of Pinckney's children? The Circuit Judge held, that the children of Mrs. Irvine living at the death of Mary took to the exclusion of the children of Pinckney. The appeal renews this question before us.

The difficulty arises upon the use of the terms, "heirs" and "children" in the codicil. Had either of these terms alone been used, there could not have been much doubt as to the construction. For instance, take the term "heirs," as employed by the testator without the subsequent use of the term "children"; then Mrs. Irvine having died before Pinckney, he, Pinckney, would probably have been one of her heirs and, therefore, entitled to a share in the property, which upon his death would have descended to his children, the defendants. Or take the term "children" alone; then under the case cited by the Circuit Judge, Wessenger v. Hunt (9 Rich. Eq., 464), where it was held that a bequest to be distributed at a future time to the death of the testator, to wit, at the death of an intermediate life tenant, all who answer the description at the time of the distribution are the parties alone entitled. The children of Pinckney not answering the description of the term children of Mrs. Irvine, at the death of Mary could not take, but her children, then in existence, would take to the exclusion of Pinckney's children, as held by the Circuit Judge.

Both of these terms, however, are used in the codicil, producing a conflict, unless they can be harmonized. The Circuit Judge construed the word heirs as synonymous with children. We are inclined to think this is the correct construction, and in accordance with the intention of the testator; otherwise the division of the property could not have taken place until the death of Mrs.

*Irvine, as no one can have heirs before death. It is true, Mrs. Irvine is dead now, and the difficulty suggested does not arise here; but suppose that she was still alive. If the word "heirs" is to have its technical effect, none of the parties could claim, although Mary and Elizabeth have both died without issue living. The time, however, for the distribution has arrived, and in the event that no one could take but heirs, if Mrs. Irvine was still alive, there could be no distribution.

We must conclude, that the testator intended that the division should be made at the death of Mary and Elizabeth, one or both, and as the children of Mrs. Irvine and

Mrs. Hill could take at that time whether their mothers were dead or alive, when "heirs" could not, the intention of the testator could not be carried out except by the construction of the Circuit Judge, to wit: that the term "heirs" was not used in its technical sense, but was used synonymously with the term "children." Having reached this conclusion, we are of opinion that the case of Wessenger v. Hunt is conclusive of the question involved.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

But such doctrine does apply to the personal estate, even though (1) the distributee has been discharged in bankruptcy as to such debt, (2) the note was held and claimed by the intestate for over twenty years as heir at law of the deceased payee, but without administration, or (3) the debt was assigned to the administrators of the intestate as a part of his distributive share in the deceased payee's estate, after the distributee debtor had assigned his distributive share to third parties.

The master should not testify as to facts which he is called upon to decide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 188; Dec. Dig. ⇨74.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Union, October, 1885.

This was an action by Mrs. M. A. E. Sartor, widow of John P. Sartor, against the administrators of said J. P. Sartor, and his nieces and nephews, for the partition and settlement of his estate. John P. Sartor died intestate January 16, 1884, possessed of a considerable estate, real and personal, leaving as his distributees and heirs at law, his widow and several nieces and nephews. Among the nephews were Robert Beaty, jr., W. S. McJunkin, and John W. Sartor, against whose interest in this estate the administrators alleged certain claims, based upon the facts below stated as to each.

Robert Beaty, jr., gave his sealed note for $3,437.73, in November, 1861, to William Sartor, son of John P., payable at one day. Said William died intestate and unmarried in August, 1862, leaving as his heirs at law his father and one brother, James W. This note then passed without administration into the possession of John P. In 1868, Beaty was adjudged a bankrupt, and in 1870 received his discharge. In his schedule of liabilities he stated this note as a debt due by him to "John P. Sartor;" and said John P. received dividends thereon. James W. Sartor died in 1881, leaving his father, John P., his sole heir at law. The amount due on this note October 1, 1885, was $8,580.49.

W. S. McJunkin gave his sealed note for $39.70 to John P. Sartor in November, 1862, payable at one day. On April 24, 1869, James W. Sartor obtained a judgment against said McJunkin for $5,100.45. On April 25, 1884, the administrator of James W. Sartor assigned this judgment, as a part of his distributive estate, to the administrators of

John P. Sartor. McJunkin *went into bankruptcy, but was never discharged. On January 22, 1884, he assigned all his interest in the estate of his uncle to his (McJunkin's) children.

John W. Sartor (nephew of John P.) gave his two sealed notes to said John P.—one for $200, payable July 28, 1860, and one other for $200, payable August 11, 1861, credited with $12.25 on January 13, 1864.

Some of the defendants alleged that the personal estate of the intestate had been unfairly sold by the administrators, and that articles were purchased by them at an undervalue. Upon this subject the master testified in behalf of the administrators.

The master reported that all of the above named defendants must account for the above amounts out of their distributive shares in the estate; and that the sale of the personalty was fair and for full value. Upon exceptions by Beaty, McJunkin, and John W. Sartor to this report, the Circuit Judge passed the following decree:

The first, second, and third exceptions, in substance, allege that the master erred in finding and recommending that Robert Beaty, jr., should account for his note given to William Sartor out of his distributive share of the estate of the intestate, John P. Sartor. It is contended that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer does not apply 1. Because the debts are not in the same right. 2. Because the debt has been discharged in bankruptcy. 3. Because the debt has been discharged by presumption of payment arising from lapse of time.

The payee of the note, William Sartor, died intestate in 1862, leaving as his distributees his surviving brother, James W. Sartor, and his father, John P. Sartor. John P. Sartor, the intestate, had the note in his possession, claiming it as his own at his death, and for a long time prior to his death. From the lapse of time, administration, or an assignment of the note, or anything else, would be presumed to give efficacy to the possession of the note by the intestate, John P. Sartor. In rendering a schedule of the list of his creditors, under oath in bankruptcy, Robert Beaty, jr., designates John P. Sartor as the owner and holder of said note. John P. Sartor and his son, James W. Sartor, the other distributee, both received dividends on said note in *bankruptcy, in the name of John P. Sartor. James W. Sartor died intestate, leaving his father, John P. Sartor, the intestate, as sole distributee.

As John P. Sartor was at least the equitable owner of said note at the time of his death, Robert Beaty, jr. would not be permitted, under the circumstances, to deny that said note is part of the assets of the estate of John P. Sartor, in a proceeding in equity, in which he is demanding a distributive share of said estate. In Falconer v. Powe, Bail. Eq., 156, the court say: "Equity will enforce a discount of mutual demands between the parties really interested, although the demands are not in the same legal right, and therefore could not be set up in discount at law." The doctrine of equitable retainer is based upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity. Under the authority of Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C., 216, the discharge in bankruptcy cannot avail the defendant, Robert Beaty, jr., in this action.

More than twenty years elapsed between the maturity of the note and the death of John P. Sartor, the intestate. If there has been no payment by the debtor, or acknowledgment of the debt during this interval, the note must be considered paid, notwithstanding the fullest conviction that it never has been paid. Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq., 380. In the case of Stover v. Du- ren, 3 Strobb., 450 [51 Am. Dec. 634], the court say: "Even an admission that payment has not been made, cannot of itself destroy the effects which considerations of public policy have given to a certain period of time, whether payment has or has not been made." In Shubrick v. Adams, 20 S. C., 51, it is held that the artificial force of the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time is conclusive, unless overthrown by testimony of the character required to resist a debt barred by the statute of limitations.

Whilst the statute of limitations merely affects the remedy, it appears from these and other decisions in this State, that the artificial force of the presumption of payment affects the debt in cases where the force of such presumption is not overthrown by testimony of the character indicated. The only evidence that can remove the presumption of the payment of the debt of Robert Beaty, jr., is his written admission under oath in bankruptcy as *to the existence of the debt. I conclude that this would be sufficient in this proceeding in equity, to rebut the presumption of payment from lapse of time, as to the note of Robert Beaty, jr.

It is further contended, under the eighth exception, that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer can only apply to the personal estate, as the title to the land descended to the heirs at law upon the death of the intestate. In this case the land has been sold, and the proceeds are in court to be distributed under the order of the court. In the case of Wilson v. Kelly, supra, it was held that until the son (W. D. F. Kelly) accounted for his indebtedness, he was not entitled to receive any portion of his father's estate. In the more recent case, In re Covin's estate, 20 S. C., 475, it is held that a note of a devisee, barred by the statute of limitations, could not be set off against the devisee, but his interest in the residue of lands and personal property directed to be sold by the executors should be retained.

The reason given for the distinction is that the will gave the devisee title against everybody except creditors; and the note, even if not barred by the statute, could not be counter-claimed against the land. But his interest in the residue, the court says, is in a different position. The will directs the residue to be sold and the proceeds equally divided. The devisee's portion of the proceeds of sale will be in the hands of the executors—his creditors—and they (the executors) will have the right to apply it to the debt he owes. This right is accorded to the executors as the creditors of the devisee, having funds in their hands, to a portion of which the devisee is entitled under the will. If the title of the devisee to the land devised is protected against all claims except creditors, it would seem that the title of the heir at law to intestate's land, cast by operation of law at intestate's death, should have the same protection except as to creditors.

The administrators in this case could only be regarded as creditors of the distributees to the extent of the personal estate in their hands for distribution. The administrators alone in this case seek to have the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer applied. The intestate's estate is entirely solvent. Under such circumstances the administrators invoke the aid of the court to do what they can't do, to wit: to subject the real estate of the heir *at law to equitable retainer. According to the reasoning of the court in the case In re Covin's estate, supra, I conclude that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer should not be applied to the interests of the distributees in the land of the intestate, John P. Sartor. I, however, concur with the master, and conclude that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer should apply to the distributive interest of Robt. Beaty, jr., in the personal estate in the hands of the administrators of John P. Sartor. The master's report must, however, be modified to conform to these views.

The fourth and fifth exceptions refer to the indebtedness of W. S. McJunkin, under the judgment obtained against him, April 30, 1860, by James W. Sartor, the intestate son of John P. Sartor. The grounds relied upon by the assignees under their exceptions are payment, as well as discharge in bankruptcy. The assignment by W. S. McJunkin of his distributive interest was made subsequent to the death of John P. Sartor. In no event could the assignees occupy a better position than their assignor, the distributee. The judgment referred to has been assigned by the administrator of James W. Sartor, to the administrators of John P. Sartor, who was at his death sole distributee of his son, James W. Sartor. The judgment debt, therefore, became assets in the hands of the administrators of John P. Sartor for distribution.

Whilst the discharge of W. S. McJunkin in bankruptcy would prevent the judgment creating a lien upon the distributive share of W. S. McJunkin in the estate of John P. Sartor, yet the judgment overthrows any presumption of the payment of the debt arising from lapse of time. Under the authority of Wilson v. Kelly, supra, the debt is not discharged by bankruptcy. I conclude that the debt of W. S. McJunkin, evidenced by the judgment in favor of James W. Sartor, assigned to the administrators of John P. Sartor, should be set-off against the distributive share of W. S. McJunkin, in the personal estate of John P. Sartor; but not as to the real estate. To this extent the master's report must also be modified.

Under the sixth and ninth exceptions, the sealed note debts of W. S. McJunkin and John W. Sartor will be considered. The plea of payment has been interposed by the assignees, as to these notes. The master concludes that there is no difference, in principle, between a note barred by the statute and a lapse of time raising a presumption of payment, in the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer. As the debt must be regarded as paid, and the artificial presumption, arising from lapse of time, must be regarded as conclusive, until overthrown by testimony of the character heretofore indicated, and as the statute of limitations merely affects the remedy and not the debt, I cannot concur in this view of the master.

The master only recommends that the debt of James W. Sartor should be off-set against his distributive interest in the personal estate of the intestate. The sealed note of W. S. McJunkin became due November 3, 1862, and the two sealed notes of John W. Sartor became due July 27, 1860, and August 10, 1861, respectively, each payable to the intestate, more than twenty years prior to his death. It does not appear from the testimony that there has ever been any payment or acknowledgment of either of these notes for more than twenty years prior to the intestate's death, and the only ground upon which the master held these notes subject to equitable set-off seems to be the analogy that he held to exist between the effect of a bar by the statute and the presumption of payment from lapse of time. This point was not considered in Wilson v. Kelly, or in the case of In re Covin's estate, supra; but from my view of the decisions as to the effect of the presumption arising from lapse of time, I conclude that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer cannot apply to the note of W. S. McJunkin and the two notes of John W. Sartor above referred to. The master's report as to these notes must be overruled.

The seventh exception alleges that the master erred in concluding that the purchases by the administrators at the sale of the personal property were made at the value of the articles purchased. The finding of the master is supported by the testimony, and will not be disturbed. This exception is overruled.

It is ordered and adjudged, that, except as overruled or modified by this decree, the master's report herein, filed October 3, 1885, be confirmed and made the judgment of this court.

From this decree, Beaty and McJunkin appealed upon the following exceptions:

*1. For that his honor held that the note given by Robert Beaty, junior, to William Sartor, was subject to the rule of equitable retainer, out of Robert Beaty, junior's, share of the personal estate of John P. Sartor, deceased.

2. For that his honor held that the discharge in bankruptcy cannot avail the defendant, Robert Beaty, junior, in this action.

3. For that his honor held that the doctrine of equitable set-off or retainer, should apply to the distributive interest of Robert Beaty, junior, in the personal estate in the hands of the administrators of John P. Sartor's estate.

4. For that his honor held that the debts of W. S. McJunkin, evidenced by the judgment in favor of James W. Sartor, assigned to the administrators of John P. Sartor, should be set off against the distributive share of W. S. McJunkin in the personal estate of John P. Sartor.

5. For that his honor held as follows: "The finding of the master—as to the value of articles sold—is supported by the testimony, and will not be disturbed." When the referee himself testified upon the issue he was considering, upon a matter material to the issue.

6. For that his honor did not set aside the finding of the referee, as to the value of the articles sold, because the referee acted as witness and judge of an issue of fact in the same case.

7. For that his honor did not hold that John P. Sartor's receiving a dividend from the bankrupt estate of Robert Beaty, junior, prevented the operation of the doctrine of equitable retainer.

8. For that his honor held that the claim presented by the administrators of the estate of John P. Sartor, deceased, of the note given to William Sartor by Robert Beaty, junior, was in the same right as the claim of Robert Beaty, junior, for his distributive share of the personal estate of John P. Sartor, deceased—as regards the doctrine of equitable retainer.

9. For that his honor did not refer the matter of the value of the articles sold at the estate sale to a new referee.

Plaintiff and the administrators also appealed upon the following exceptions:

Because his honor, it is respectfully submitted, erred in hold*ing as follows, to wit: 1. That the administrators in this case could only be regarded as creditors of the distributees to the extent of the personal estate in their hands for distribution.

2. That the doctrine of equitable set-off, or retainer, should not be applied to the interest of the distributees in the land of the intestate, John P. Sartor.

3. That the debt of W. S. McJunkin, evidenced by the judgment in favor of James W. Sartor, assigned to the administrators of John P. Sartor, should not be set-off against the distributive share of W. S. McJunkin, in the real estate of John P. Sartor.

4. That the doctrine of equitable set-off, or retainer, cannot apply to the note of W. S. McJunkin and the two notes of John W. Sartor.

5. That the interest of Robert Beaty, jr., and W. S. McJunkin in the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of John P. Sartor should not be applied to the debts of said parties to the estate of the intestate.

6. That the doctrine of equitable set-off, or retainer, did not apply when the debt of a distributee was evidenced by a sealed note more than twenty years past due.

7. That W. S. McJunkin had been discharged in bankruptcy.

8. That the administrators alone in this case seek to have the doctrine of equitable set-off, or retainer, applied.

9. For that his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding as follows, to wit: That there was no difference, in principle, between a note barred by the statute of limitations and one barred by lapse of time, in the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off.

10. That the whole interest of those distributees who are indebted to the estate of the intestate was liable for the debts of such distributees, and that the interest of such distributees in the proceeds of the sale of the real estate was liable for such debts, as well as the respective interests in the personal estate.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for Beaty and McJunkin.

Mr. David Johnson, jr., for the administrators.

July 19, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*302

*Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. It will be sufficient for the understanding of this case, to state the questions which are before us on appeal, with the further statement that the pleadings are in proper form to have these questions adjudicated, and that the facts involve them. These questions are as follows:

1st. Can the equitable doctrine of set-off or retainer be allowed to an administrator against the share of a distributee in the personal estate or against an heir at law as to his share in the real estate, one or both, by virtue of a sealed note held by said administrator on said distributee and heir, due more than twenty years before the action, which note was originally given to a third party, but had been in possession of the intestate for years before his death and up to his death, and had reached the possession of the administrator by virtue of his office as administrator, the said distributee having enumerated this note in a petition for bankruptcy, filed within twenty years, as unpaid, and as belonging to the intestate, and having since been discharged in bankruptcy, and the intestate having received dividends on said note from the bankrupt's assets? Under these facts, can the administrator claim the right at settlement of the estate to retain from the personal assets and the real estate of the intestate, so much of the share of the distributee (debtor), as may be necessary to discharge the note in question? Or can this right be resisted and defeated on the ground, either of want of mutuality in contract, bankruptcy, or presumption of payment by lapse of time, one or all?

2nd. Can retainer be allowed an administrator against a distributee and his assignee on a judgment obtained within twenty years by a third party, and which the said administrator has become possessed of by transfer to him in payment of the interest of his intestate in the estate of the judgment creditor, since deceased? Can the claim of retainer be defeated for the want of mutuality in the contracts, preventing set-off?

3rd. Can this doctrine of retainer be applied on sealed notes held by the administrator on distributees, and heirs of more than twenty years standing? Or will the presumption of payment extinguish the notes and prevent the retainer?

As to the first question, the Circuit Judge held, 1st, that the doctrine of retainer did not apply to the interest of a distributee *debtor, in the real estate of the intestate, subject to partition, nor in the proceeds thereof. 2nd, that it did apply as a general proposition to the interest of the distributee debtor, as to his share in the personal estate. 3rd, that discharge in bankruptcy of the distributee would not prevent the retainer, relying upon Wilson v. Kelly. 4th, that an acknowledgment of the debt by the distributee, within twenty years before action, in a petition filed for the benefit of the bankrupt act, was sufficient to prevent the presumption of payment from arising; and lastly, that the debts were in the same right, or sufficiently so, to authorize the set off, or retainer. As to the second proposition, he held that the judgment having been obtained within twenty years before action, no presumption of payment could arise, and the administrator being the legal holder of the judgment, as administrator, he could claim a set off, or retainer, even against the assignee of the distributee. As to the third proposition, he held that the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of the full period of twenty years before action, was conclusive, extinguishing the notes, and therefore leaving no room or ground for the claim of retainer—different in this respect from the statute of limitations, which only suspends the remedy, but does not presume payment.

The ruling of his honor upon the first proposition, that the doctrine of retainer did not apply to the interest of the distributee in the real estate of his ancestor, is supported by the case of In re Covin's Estate, 20 S. C., 475. That it did apply to the personal estate, and that bankruptcy would not prevent its application, is supported by Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C., 216. And it is hardly necessary to cite authority in support of the proposition, that the enumeration of the debt by the bankrupt in his sworn petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act, within twenty years before action brought, in which petition the bankrupt acknowledged the debt to be unpaid, and set it down as one of the claims entitled to a portion of his assets, was sufficient to prevent the presumption of payment, the acknowledgment giving a new starting point for the currency of the presumption. His honor held, further, that the objection, that the debts were not in the same right could not avail here.

Even admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the claim *of the administrator here, was not, and could not be, set up as a legal set off or counter claim to the distributee, yet that is not the principle upon which the doctrine of retainer is founded in a case like that before the court. "The right of retainer depends upon the principle, that the legatee or distributee is not entitled to his legacy or distributive share while he retains in his own hands a part of the funds out of which that and other legacies or distributive shares ought to be paid, or which is necessary to extinguish other claims on those funds. And it is against conscience that he should receive anything out of such funds without deducting therefrom the amount of the funds which is already in his hands as a debtor to the estate. And the assignee of the legatee or distributee in such case takes the legacy or distributive share subject to the equity which existed against it in the hands of the assignor." The above is an extract from the case of Smith v. Kearney [2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 533], in which Chancellor Walworth delivered the opinion, and in which most of the authorities upon the subject are referred to and discussed, and especial reference is made to this case and the cases there cited, as being applicable not only to the immediate point now under consideration, but also to several other points involved in the case at bar. It was there held, that this doctrine did not apply to funds arising from the sale of real estate which descended to the debtor as one of the heirs at law, the proceeds of real estate converted into personality being still considered as real estate. Smith v. Kearney, 2 Barb. Ch. [N. Y.], 534.

The same principle as that found in the extract above, has been perhaps more directly and clearly expressed by Lord Cottingham in Cherry v. Boulton (4 Myl. & Cr., 412-447), as follows: "It must be observed that the term set off is very inaccurately used in cases of this kind. In its proper use it is applicable only to mutual demands, debts, and credits. The right of an executor to retain a sufficient part of a legacy given by the creditor to the debtor to pay a debt due from him to the creditor's estate, is rather a right to pay out of the fund in hand, than a right of set off; such right of payment, therefore, can only arise where there is a right to receive the debt so paid, and the legacy or fund so to be applied in payment of the debt must be payable by the *person entitled to receive the debt." Whether, then, the claim in the hands of the administrator could be set up or not, as a strict counter claim, yet it being a debt against the distributee and a debt which he holds as administrator, the right of retainer under the above principle as to the personal estate seems to us to be complete, both against his distributee and his assignee.

This disposes of all of the questions embraced in the rulings of his honor above, except the one arising out of that ruling in which his honor differentiated a case where the debt of the distributee was barred by the statute, and a case where it was presumed paid by the lapse of twenty years or more before action, his honor holding in the latter case, that the presumption of payment was a bar to the retainer. We concur with this ruling. The lapse of twenty years, as has been said in several cases, has an artificial force, and extinguishes the debt, as effectually as absolute payment. In the absence of all such testimony, which in law would revive an unsealed note barred by the statute of limitations. Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C., 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618], and the cases there cited. Such being the effect of the presumption, we think his honor was correct in holding in this case, that the retainer could not be claimed by the administrator against the sealed notes of over twenty years standing.¹

In the application of these principles to the case at bar, Robert Beaty, jr., was held accountable for his note to the extent of his interest as a distributee in the personal estate of the intestate. So, too, the share of W. S. McJunkin in the personal estate was held subject to the judgment in the hands of the administrator against him, but the sealed notes against the said McJunkin and John W. Sartor, being presumed paid by the lapse of twenty years, were adjudged extinguished, and therefore could not give foundation to the right of retainer. It is stated in the decree of the Circuit Judge that W. S. McJunkin had been discharged in bankruptcy. This seems to have been a mistake, as admitted in the argument on both sides; that question, therefore, does not arise as to him. The judgment against McJunkin was obtained in April, 1869, and we do not see why this judgment did not *have lien on the interest of McJunkin in the real estate of the intestate, thereby giving the administrator the right to have that interest subjected to its payment.

in addition to the right of retainer as to his share in the personal estate, if necessary.

The counsel of defendants, appellants, has, by permission, reviewed the case of Wilson v. Kelly, supra. We have carefully considered the grounds presented in opposition to that case, and have not found them sufficient to overrule it. Previous to that case it had been decided, that a debt barred by the statute of limitations could still be claimed out of a legacy or distributive share of the debtor in the estate to which he was thus indebted, under the law of retainer as set forth above. This was upon the principle that the statute of limitations did not extinguish the debt, but only prevented a bar to an action thereon: the moral obligation to pay still remaining, which obligation would support a promise to pay. See the cases referred to in Wilson v. Kelly. This principle, it was thought, applied to a discharge in bankruptcy: that the discharge did not pay the debt, but prevented any further action for its recovery, leaving the debt unpaid and the moral obligation unaffected. In fact, that a debt due by a discharged bankrupt occupied almost the exact position of one barred by the statute, and could, like a debt barred by the statute, be paid out of a legacy or distributive share of the debtor in the estate to which he was indebted, by retainer.

In the case of Cherry v. Boulton (4 Myl. & Cr., 18 Eng. Ch. R., 448), which the counsel claims overruled Ex parte Man, where the bankruptcy was held not sufficient to prevent the retainer, the facts were that the assignee in bankruptcy was claiming the legacy of the bankrupt as part of his assets, and the court held that inasmuch as the assignee was only liable on the debt to the extent of the dividend to which the creditor was entitled, the retainer could be allowed only to that extent, and that as to the balance of the debt a retainer could not be enforced. This was upon the ground that the party claiming the legacy, to wit, the assignee, did not owe the debt, except as to the dividend, and consequently the remainder of the legacy after the dividend was paid therefrom was due the assignee with no counter claim against it. The Lord Chancellor, in delivering the opinion in *that case, said: "In the present case, however, the bankruptcy of the debtor having taken place in the life time of the testatrix, her executors never were entitled to receive from the assignee more than the dividends upon the debt, and although the bankrupt had not obtained his certificate and the liability incident to that state remained upon him, yet he, for the same reason, was never entitled to receive the legacy, and consequently there was never a time at which the same person was entitled to receive the legacy and liable to pay the entire debt. The right, therefore, of retaining a sufficient sum out of the legacy to pay the debt, can never have been vested in any one. The assignee who claims the legacy would, indeed, have been liable to the payment of any dividend upon the debt, had it been proved, and the master of the rolls proposed to the executors to make provision for deducting the amount of such dividend from the amount of the legacy." And he further says: "That in all the cases, except that of Ex parte Man, the liability to pay the debt and the right to receive the money had been at some time vested in the same person, and all that the court did in these cases was to consider that the party liable to pay the legacy had actually done what the law considers him entitled to do, namely, to apply a sufficient part of the legacy to the payment of the debt."

The facts in Ex parte Man, the Lord Chancellor says, were as nearly as possible the same as in the case he was discussing. Ex parte Man is reported in Mont. & McA., 210. This volume has not been within our reach, but we suppose it was a case like Cherry v. Boulton, supra, where the assignee of the bankrupt was claiming the legacy, and consequently a case like Cherry v. Boulton, where the liability to pay the entire debt and the right to claim the legacy never vested in the same person, and consequently, as in Cherry v. Boulton, the administrator or executor had no foundation to retain the legacy for said entire debt. In the case at bar, however, the distributive share in the estate of the intestate is claimed by the distributee himself. He owes the entire debt and he claims the distributive share. Thus the two are vested in the same person, and the state of things exists, the absence of which authorised the judgment in Cherry v. Boulton, *overruling Ex parte Man, and which, had they existed in that case, would have no doubt resulted in a different judgment.

It is urged that the creditor here having received dividends out of the bankrupt assets, should prevent the retainer and Orpen in re Beswick v. Orpen, 16 L. R. Ch. Div., 202, is referred to as sustaining this proposition. In that case, at a meeting of creditors by resolution, a composition of 2s. 6d. was accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them. The executors did not prove the debt under the composition, and the debtor assigned his share in the estate to a third party, who sued the executor. The executor claimed the right to retain for the full amount of the debt. It was held that he could retain only to the amount of the composition, the court holding that the debt was within the scope and operation of the resolution of the creditors passed under the bankrupt act, and was bound by them, the 2s. 6d. being accepted as satisfaction of the whole debt. We do not understand that proving the debt and receiving dividends in bankrupt proceedings, is the same thing as resolution of composition, where the creditors agree to accept a certain amount in satisfaction of the whole, and, therefore, we do not regard the case of Orpen v. Beswick as applicable here.

Upon the whole, we sustain the Circuit Judge except as to the liability of W. S. McJunkin's share in the proceeds of the real estate to the judgment against him. This judgment having lien upon this share, it should be applied so far as may be necessary to the payment thereof.

As to the exception that the referee should not have testified on the matter of the value of the property purchased at the sale by the administrators. The principle contended for is doubtless correct. Eliminating this testimony from the case, that remaining seems quite sufficient to sustain the findings of fact on that subject.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified to the extent of subjecting the share of W. S. McJunkin in the proceeds of the real estate to the judgment against him; and in every other respect that said judgment below be affirmed.

Before Fraser, J., Georgetown, May, 1885.

The appeal in this case was from the following Circuit decree:

The action has been brought by the plaintiff as an incorporated company. The defendant, David Risley, does not distinctly admit or deny the fact of incorporation, but in his answer several times refers to plaintiff as "said company." The organization with officers was that of an incorporated body, and not that of a partnership, and the testimony nowhere discloses the names of the partners, if there were such, but all persons referred to as interested in the property of the company are referred to in such terms as are entirely consistent with the idea of their being stockholders in a company. I therefore conclude that the plaintiff is, as alleged, an incorporated company. The defendant, David Risley, was its president, and had the management of its affairs at the mill at Georgetown.

On April 21, 1881, Francis S. Parker, Eliza T. Parker, and others, conveyed to David Risley a certain parcel or lot of land described in the complaint, and called the "Parker lots." The consideration on which the said conveyance was made was that it was in payment of certain accounts due on the books of said company by James R. Parker, Rutledge Parker, and Arthur M. Parker, amounting in all to five hundred and ninety-six $8-100 dollars.¹ After the conveyance was made David Risley erected *on the "Parker lots" a large number of tenement houses, with material and labor furnished and paid for by the company. The account of these transactions was kept and charged to the "Parker lots," and all rents credited on the same account. On June 11, 1883, the amount of balance against the "Parker lots" was $4,199.76, and this amount was then charged, by order of David Risley, to his own individual account.

According to the manner in which this account was kept, it does not, when compared with other accounts, indicate with any certainty whether they were kept as the individual account of David Risley, or of the company. In my view it is not important. The account of David Risley, amongst other things, shows that on August 31, 1880, an amount of $5,831 16-100 was credited to him. The deed for the "Parker lots" was made on April 21, 1881, and on June 30, 1882, the same amount of $5,831.16, covering the same items, was, by David Risley's consent, charged against him in his account. There was a crisis in the affairs of the company June 11, 1883, and after this entries were made on the account of David Risley, including $12,076.19 "interest on stock," and other large items to his credit, by which there is a large apparent balance in his favor.

I have come to the conclusion, however, that at no time during which these funds were being drawn from the company assets for the purchase and improvement of the "Parker lots," was there any legitimate balance in favor of David Risley, which he had a right on his own volition to draw and appropriate to his own use. If it be admitted that King and other officers of the company knew that David Risley was making these investments for his own use and benefit, which I think has not been established, it cannot give validity to the transaction. There has been no act of the company which authorized it, so far as appears in the evidence, nor has there been any authority conferred by any corporate act on any of the officers to make such use of the assets. It does not appear who are the copartners or stockholders, whether Risley, Lloyd, and King, or whether a much larger number. Whoever or how many there may be, there should in my view have been some act of the corporation as such to authorize such use of its assets.

*I therefore find that David Risley, president of the company, used the assets of the company to purchase and improve the "Parker lots," not having a right so to use the said assets, he being in debt to the company at the time, and not having the authority of the company to use the assets for the purchase of property for his own use.

Having come to the conclusion that the Palmetto Lumber Company was not a partnership, but an incorporated company, it is not important to consider what would be the effect of the withdrawal by one partner of all or a part of his interest in the assets, and the investment of it in property in his own name, without the consent of the other members of the firm. We must consider the case of the president and business manager of a corporation, who invests its assets, by his own will, in property in his own name and for his own use, and the effects of such transaction on the property thus purchased. Whether the practice, which seems to have been a common one with this company, of allowing its officers, and perhaps its stockholders, to use the funds and accounts for the ordinary expenses of living, and perhaps as a substitute for money, was a proper one, cannot affect the question here.

The general and well-settled rule is, that when one person furnishes, at the time of the purchase, the consideration, and another takes the title, it is a question of intention whether or not there is a resulting trust. If the title is made to certain relatives, the presumption is that it is a gift. If the title is made to a stranger, the presumption is that there is a resulting trust in favor of him who furnishes the consideration. In either case, however, it is a question of intention on the part of the person who furnishes the consideration, an intention which may, notwithstanding the presumption, be shown by parol testimony. There is, however, a large class of trusts, constructive trusts, which do not in any way depend on intention, and are declared and enforced by the court contrary to the express intention of the party who took and holds the title. It is perhaps too narrow a view to say that in all cases the court gives relief on the ground of fraud.

Besides other cases, "a constructive trust arises" whenever "another's property has been "wrongfully appropriated and converted into a different form. If one person having money or any kind of property belonging to another in his hands, wrongfully uses it for the purchase of lands, taking title in his own name; or if a trustee or other fiduciary person wrongfully converts the trust funds into a different species of property, taking to himself the title; or if an agent, or bailee, wrongfully disposes of his principal's securities, and with the proceeds purchases other securities in his own name; in these and all similar cases equity impresses a constructive trust upon the new form or species of property, not only while in the hands of the original wrong-doer, but as long as it can be followed and identified in whosoever hands it may come, except into those of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice; and the court will enforce the constructive trust for the benefit of the beneficial owner or original cestui que trust, who has been thus defrauded." Pom. Eq., § 1051. It seems to me that the facts bring this case clearly within the principle thus laid down, and that there is a constructive trust in favor of the plaintiff in the Parker lots, and the improvements put upon them since the purchase.

Under this view of the case the judgment of the defendant, Mrs. Risley, whether bona fide or not, should not be enforced against the property.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the defendant, Mrs. Georgie H. Risley, be perpetually enjoined from enforcing in any way against the said Parker lots her judgment against her codefendant, David Risley. It is further ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff is entitled to a constructive trust in the said Parker lots, and that the same be, and is hereby, established and declared. It is further ordered that the sheriff of Georgetown County do proceed to sell, &c.

From this decree the defendant, David Risley, appealed upon several exceptions raising the points decided by this court.

²The cases are generally reported in the chronological order of their filing, but owing to the confusion incident to the removal of the Supreme Court records from the State House, it has been found impossible to preserve this order with the succeeding cases of this volume, without delaying its publication.—REPORTER.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action in the nature of a bill in equity, instituted by the plaintiff company against David Risley and his wife, Georgie H. Risley, to set up a resulting trust in certain parcels of land known as the "Parker lots," and to enjoin the sale of them as the property of David Risley under a judgment confessed by the said Risley to his wife, Georgie H. Risley. The plaintiff alleged that the "Palmetto Lumber Company is a body corporate under the laws of this State," doing business in Georgetown in the manufacture and sale of lumber; that about the year 1881, one Parker, being indebted to the corporation in the amount of $600, made an arrangement with the company, by which certain parcels of land known as the "Parker lots," were to be conveyed to them in payment of the debt; that David Risley was then the president and active business man of the company, and he caused the conveyance of the same to be made to himself individually, and kept the deed from the record, while he was putting costly improvements on the lots at the expense of the company; that in June, 1883, the directors and stockholders, having, as they supposed, discovered that there was something wrong, took measures to secure themselves, whereupon David Risley placed the deed on record, falsely claiming the lots as his individual property, and confessed a fraudulent judgment to his wife, Georgie H., which was levied upon the same, &c. The plaintiff prayed that a resulting trust in the said lots might be declared in their favor; that the levy made upon the "Parker lots" as the property of David Risley be set aside, and the judgment of the wife, Georgie H. Risley, be perpetually enjoined as fraudulent and void, &c.

Georgie H. Risley demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. David Risley answered to the merits, "denying each and every allegation in said complaint contained not hereafter specifically

"admitted." He answered fully, denying that he purchased the aforesaid "Parker lots" as president, for and in behalf of the company, but for himself individually, claiming that as president he had no right to purchase lands for the company; that in the accounts he charged himself with the "Parker debt," and all expenses incurred for improvements on the "lots," and that therefore "the purchase money and all sums expended for improvements were his own money and means," &c., but in his answer he did not specifically deny the allegation of the complaint that the "Palmetto Lumber Company" is a corporate body under the laws of this State.

The cause came on for a hearing before Judge Fraser. The plaintiff offered no proof of their charter of incorporation, but confined themselves to the merits of the case. The judge held that the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, was an incorporate company, and that the defendant, David Risley, was its president and had the management of its affairs at the mill at Georgetown. He also decreed upon the testimony that the plaintiff corporation had a resulting trust in the "Parker lots," enjoined the enforcement of the levy on the execution of the wife, Georgie H. Risley, and ordered the land sold, &c. From this decree the defendant, David Risley, appealed upon numerous exceptions, which, being long and in the "Brief," need not be set out here. The defendant, Georgie H. Risley, did not appeal, and therefore the demurrer goes out of the case.

The first three exceptions of David Risley make the point that the Circuit Judge erred in not dismissing the complaint, for the reason that the plaintiff, having offered no proof of its charter as a corporate body, failed to show legal capacity to sue. This raises, in an equity suit, a question analogous to that of non suit in a law case for lack of proof; and involves the consideration of the point as to what proof was necessary under the pleadings. One of the first rules of pleading under the code is, that "every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, as prescribed in section 170. * * * shall, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true." Code, § 189. Section 170, as to the manner in which allegations must be "controverted," provides that "the answer of the defendant must contain a general *or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof, sufficient to form a belief," &c. The plaintiff in the complaint alleged that it was "a body corporate" under the laws of the State; and the defendant in his answer did not make specific denial of the fact alleged, but in general terms denied "each and every allegation in the complaint contained not specifically admitted."

Did this answer sufficiently "controvert" the allegation, so as to put the plaintiff to proof of its corporate existence? As the allegation concerned only the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue, we think it was necessary for the defendant to controvert it by an express specific denial, not difficult to make, in order to put the fact properly in issue. It is true that a "general denial" puts in issue all the material allegations constituting the cause of action. Pom. Rem., § 666. But, strictly speaking, an allegation of corporate existence is no part of the cause of action, but has reference rather to the means and manner of enforcing it. Want of legal capacity to sue is one of the matters stated in section 165 of the Code, as causes of demurrer. When it appears on the face of the complaint, the objection can be made only by demurrer; but it may be made by answer, when it does not so appear. When the objection is made by demurrer, there is no doubt whatever that it "must distinctly state the grounds of objection;" and we cannot see why less should be required when it is allowed to be made by answer. "Under a general denial the defendant cannot insist that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, where that fact does not appear on the face of the complaint." Wait. Ann. Code, 248 and notes; Insurance & Banking Company v. Turner, 8 S. C. 111; Steamship Company v. Rodgers, 21 Id., 33.

It is urged that this case is not at all analogous to that of the Steamship Company v. Rodgers, supra, for the reason that there the words of the answer were, "has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of the complaint," and here they are "denying each and every allegation in the complaint contained," &c. In respect to requiring the plaintiff to make proof of its corporate existence, we think *that both statements have the same effect; and that, being only different forms of stating a "general denial," neither is sufficient to put the plaintiff to the proof of its corporate existence. A special denial is necessary in an answer as well as in a demurrer. "An answer alleging that defendant has not 'knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief,' &c., makes a complete denial." Wait. Ann. Code, 244 and notes.

But in the particular indicated, this case is precisely similar to that of the Insurance & Banking Company v. Turner, supra. In that, as in this, the defendant in his answer "denied each and every allegation of the complaint." In that case, after calling attention to section 167 of the [old] Code, which sets out the objections that must be taken by demurrer, when the matter appears upon the face of the complaint, the opinion of the court proceeds as follows: "The clear intention of these sections is that the defendant shall give, by his demurrer or answer, specific notice that he intends to rely on one or more of these specific defences, if he wishes to make them available. A general denial of all the facts in the complaint is not a compliance with these requirements of the code. The object of these provisions is to relieve the plaintiff from any necessity of preparing to meet such objections on the trial, unless notified by the pleadings that the defendant intends to rely on one or more of them," &c. If the defendant means to rely on the defence that the plaintiff has no corporate existence, it is very easy to say so specifically, and thus notify the plaintiff. We cannot say that the Circuit Judge committed error in ruling that under the pleadings and evidence the plaintiff, as alleged, was an incorporated company, and organized and officered as such.

All the other exceptions but the last, make the objection in various forms, that it was error in the judge to declare a trust in favor of the plaintiff in the "Parker lots." Although the findings of law and fact are not kept separate, it is manifest that this question is largely one of fact, which has been decided by the judge below. We have read the testimony carefully, and it seems that, briefly stated, the following facts were proved: that the business of the company was to deal in lumber and shingles; that David Risley was president and the active manager; that the company held a claim against one Parker for about $600, and Risley, without any express authority for that purpose, used this debt in the purchase of certain lands, known as the "Parker lots," upon which he had houses built at the expense of the company; that the "account as to the Parker lots," including the original purchase money (Parker debt), and the costs of improvements, was at first kept separate to itself, without distinctly showing who claimed to be the real owner, but finally Risley put on record a conveyance of the lots to himself individually, and about June, 1883, after the suspension of the company, had himself charged with the "Parker debt" and the costs of improvements, and claimed that the said lots were his own property, purchased for himself with his own money, and subject to be levied and sold under the judgment confessed to his wife, Georgie H. On this state of facts, we cannot say that the Circuit Judge erred in declaring a trust in favor of the plaintiff in the lots known as "Parker lots," and claimed by the said David Risley as his individual property.

There can be no doubt of the general rule, that where one furnishes the money to purchase land, and the title is taken in the name of another, a trust results in favor of the person furnishing the money. It is very clear that in the purchase of the "Parker lots," Risley used the claim of the company against Parker, and took title in his own name, and we cannot see any good reason why the case should not fall under the operation of the general rule as to "resulting trusts." It is true that the Parker debt was, at least in part, the property of Risley as corporator, and that as president he was the agent and manager of the business. But it does not strike us that these facts could give him the right to charge himself with the Parker debt, and then in effect to draw it out of the till, and invest it in property for himself, without raising a resulting trust in the property so purchased. But we do not think the case makes it necessary for us to go into that subject. It seems to us enough to say, that as president and agent of the company, Risley was already a trustee for the company, and that it was a breach of that trust to use the money or securities of the company in the purchase of lands, taking title in his own name. "It is well settled that whenever a trustee or agent deals on his own account and for his own benefit, with the subject submitted to his charge, he becomes chargeable with the purchase as a trustee." 4 Kent (6th edit.), 306; Perry Trusts, § 127; Pom. Eq., § 1051.

Risley as president was certainly never expressly authorized by the company to use the Parker debt for his own purposes, and it was therefore wrongful and a breach of trust for him to use it in the purchase of lots, taking title in his own name—something like the case of a watchman placed to guard property, taking it himself. We do not see that this wrong was in any way cured by the trustee charging himself on the books with the Parker debt and the costs of the improvements placed upon the lots; for there may be a great difference between owning the land itself, and having only an account for the amount paid for it, which account possibly may be, and in view of the judgment confessed to Mrs. Risley, most probably is, entirely without value.

The Circuit Judge (as the plaintiff may be in failing circumstances) referred it to the clerk of the court "to inquire and report any facts which will enable the court to determine whether a counsel fee shall be paid out of the fund to attorneys for plaintiff and what is a proper fee to be allowed." This was purely a reference of enquiry, and decided nothing. We cannot say that in making it, the judge committed error of law; but we reserve our judgment as to whether a counsel fee should be allowed under authority of the court.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Fairfield, June, 1885.

To the case as stated in the opinion, it may be added that the witness Groeschel was the clerk and brother-in-law of defendant and was put up by plaintiff only to prove the execution of a receipt on the back of a mortgage.

Mr. O. W. Buchanan, for appellant.

Mr. J. W. Hanahan, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action of claim and delivery of personal property before a trial justice and a jury. No bond was given by the plaintiff. An amendment was allowed inserting in the summons an allegation claiming as damages eight dollars for detention of the property. The words of the summons were "that L. Samuels is in unlawful possession of certain personal property of him the said Thomas Dillard, viz., a one-horse wagon, which has been converted into a two-horse wagon," &c. The defendant denied that the courts of trial justices have jurisdiction of an action for claim and delivery of personal property; but if so, this action could not be maintained, for the reason that the summons did not state "that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the wagon," and the plaintiff was not required to give bond before action brought. The court overruled the objections, holding that the code gave the jurisdiction, that the summons sufficiently stated plaintiff's title to the property; and, as immediate possession of the wagon was not demanded, a bond by the plaintiff was unnecessary.

There was much testimony on both sides, and during the progress of the trial, "I, Groeschel, agent of the defendant in the action, was called by the plaintiff as a witness. Counsel for defendant then proposed to ask him (witness) questions tending to bring out the defendant's case. It was ruled that it was proper to defer the examination of witness as to these matters until after plaintiff had closed, and that while such examination was entirely proper after the plaintiff had closed, yet at this particular stage of the proceeding it was improper. (Defendant excepted.) After the plaintiff had rested, the witness, Groeschel, was fully examined by counsel for the defendant." The trial justice charged the jury "that they had the right to take into consideration their own knowledge of the character of the witnesses offered by the other side; that in determining what weight they should give to the testimony of the witnesses, they could take into consideration their character as known to themselves, even if there was no testimony offered as to their reputation for truthfulness or untruthfulness," &c. The jury found for the plaintiff "the wagon in dispute, and, if it cannot be found, fifteen dollars."

The defendant appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, and the Circuit Judge having affirmed the judgment below, he appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: I. That his honor erred in holding that a trial justice court has, under the constitution, jurisdiction of the action of claim and delivery of personal property, where there is also a claim for damages in the action, for the detention of the property. II. That his honor erred in holding that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the refusal of the trial justice to allow cross examination of an important witness to bring out the defendant's case, save and except as to matters brought out on the direct examination; whereas said ruling was erroneous, and if the cross examination had been allowed, the plaintiff would not have been allowed to impeach the witness by asking him and other witnesses if he had not made different and contradictory statements; and such action on the part of the trial justice did cause prejudice to the rights of the defendant. III. That his honor erred in holding that the trial justice's summons was sufficient; whereas it does not state on its face that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property, and although this objection had been raised in the court below, and also argued before his honor. IV. That his honor erred in confirming said action of the court below, that the jury had a right to judge of the character of the witnesses from their own knowledge of them, even in the absence of testimony to that fact, and although said objection was argued before his honor, and in substance was one of the exceptions to the judgment below.

First, Sub-division 11 of section 71 of the Code, gives jurisdiction to trial justices in "an action to recover the possession of personal property claimed, the value of which, as stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, shall not exceed the sum of one hundred dollars." We do not see that this provision is in conflict with that of the Constitution, section 22, article IV., which declares that "justices of the peace shall have such jurisdiction as may be provided by law in actions ex delicto, when the damages claimed do not exceed one hundred dollars." The constitution limits the power to give jurisdiction to cases where the damages claimed do not exceed one hundred dollars, and the code only undertakes to give it when the property does not exceed in value that sum. If we assume that the provision of the code contemplated the value of the property in the light of damages, then the only effect would be to limit the jurisdiction to cases in which the value of the property added to the specific damages claimed, would not exceed one hundred dollars. In this case the value of the property was stated to be twenty, and the damages for detention eight dollars. We think the trial justice court had jurisdiction.

Second. As to the third exception. The same section of the code above cited does provide that the plaintiff may, at the time the action is brought, but not after, "claim the immediate delivery of the property," and if he does so, he must enter into an undertaking with sureties, &c. But if he makes no such claim, it is enough, as we understand it, that the affidavit of the plaintiff should state the value of the property, &c., and that "the plaintiff is the owner, or entitled to the immediate possession of the property claimed." The summons stated "that L. Samuels is in unlawful possession of certain personal property (describing it) belonging to him, the said Thomas Dillard," &c. This was not in the exact words of the law, that "the plaintiff is the owner," but it was substantially the assertion of title to the property. The trial justice court is not a court of record.

Pleadings are *not required to be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. "Upon hearing the appeal (from the judgment of a trial justice) the appellate court shall give judgment according to the justice of the case, without regard to technical errors and defects, which do not affect the merits," &c.

Third. But while technicalities are overlooked, there are some requirements as to the forms of procedure in trial justice courts. Sub-division 15, of section 88, of the Code positively declares, "that the provisions of the code of procedure, respecting forms of actions, parties to actions, the rules of evidence," &c., shall apply to these courts. The rule of evidence is well settled in this State, "that in the cross-examination of a witness, counsel may ask him questions bearing upon the whole case, so as to bring out matters of independent defence, and are not confined to the matters testified to in the examination in chief." Kibler v. McIlwain, 16 S. C., 551. According to this rule, it was error in the trial justice to refuse the defendant's counsel permission to cross-examine generally the witness (Groeschel), when put on the stand and examined as a witness by the plaintiff; and the Circuit Judge, upon that ground, should have ordered a new trial.

It did appear in the argument for the plaintiff in this court, that the Circuit Judge, after dismissing the appeal, made a statement as follows: "With reference to the second ground of appeal, I stated before signing the order that the trial justice had erred (as was admitted by plaintiff's counsel) in limiting the defendant in his cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, Groeschel, to matters brought out on the direct examination. But as it appeared from the testimony as well as the report of the trial justice, that the witness had subsequently been examined fully by the defendant, I did not regard this error as material or prejudicial to defendant," &c. We have no doubt whatever, that the Circuit Judge honestly thought that the error was not "material or prejudicial to defendant." But the defendant complains that it did prejudice his case, and it is difficult to affirm with certainty that it did not. We can well understand how it might do so in several ways, and as it was admitted error, we think it the *safer course to require compliance with the admitted rule upon the subject.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for such orders as may be proposed in conformity with the conclusion herein announced.

25 S. C. 323

CONTINENTAL INSURANCE COMPANY v.
BOYKIN.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Insurance ⚡187.]

Defendants insured their residence with the plaintiff company against fire for five years at long rates, payable annually in advance, giving their note for the deferred premiums, with a stipulation that the whole note should become due on failure to pay any instalment at maturity. The policy provided that on non-payment of a premium the policy should be void, and on non-payment of an instalment the policy should not be binding during the period of such default. Defendant failed to pay his second instalment. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full unpaid balance of the note.¹

Messrs. Kennedy & Nelson, for appellants.
Mr. W. M. Shannon, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs insured the residence of the defendant, S. J. Boykin, situate in Kershaw County, against fire, under policy No. 2537, and dated November 16, 1880. The insurance was for five years, and was at the long rates of insurance, being twenty-five per cent cheaper than short rates. The policy contained, among other stipulations, the following, which are set forth in the "Case," as the only ones mate*rial here, to wit: 1st. * * * "If the assured shall have neglected to pay the premium, * * * then, and in every such case, this policy shall be null and void. 2d. The company shall not be liable for any loss or damage under this policy, if default shall have been made in the payment of any instalment of premium due by the terms of the instalment note. 3d. On payment by the assured or assigns of all instalments of premiums due under this policy and the instalment note given thereon, the liability of this company on this policy shall again attach, provided written consent of the superintendent of the Southern department be first obtained. * * * But this company shall not be liable for any loss happening during the continuance of such default of payment, nor shall any such suspension of liability under this policy on account of such default have the effect of extending such liability beyond the period of its termination; as originally expressed in writing hereon. * * * And, further, that no attempt by law or otherwise to collect the note given for cash premium, or any instalment of premium due upon any instalment note, shall be deemed a waiver of any of the conditions in this policy, or shall be deemed in any manner to revive this policy, but upon payment by the assured or his assigns of the full amount due upon such note and costs, if any there be, this policy shall thereafter be of force, unless the same be inoperative or void from some other cause than non-payment of such note. * * * Further, this company may at any time cancel this policy, returning the unexpired premium pro rata. The assured may at any time have the policy cancelled by paying the customary short rates for the expired time of full term."

In consideration of the insurance with the above stipulations, the defendants executed a note or contract, of which the following is a copy: "$150. For value received in policy No. 2537, dated the 16th day of November, 1880, issued by the Continental Insurance Company of New York, we promise to pay to said company, or order (by mail if requested), thirty-seven 50-100 dollars upon the 1st day of November, 1881, thirty-seven 50-100 dollars on the 1st day of November, 1882, thirty-seven 50-100 dollars upon the 1st day of November, 1883, and thirty-seven 50-100 dollars on the 1st day of November, 1884, without interest. And *it is hereby agreed and covenanted that in case of the non-payment at maturity on any one of the instalments herein named, the whole amount of instalments remaining unpaid on said policy shall become immediately due and payable."

The action below was upon this paper, the plaintiff alleging that no part of said note had been paid, except the first instalment, due the first day of November, 1881, and judgment was demanded for the balance, to wit, the sum of $112.50. * * * The defendants admitted the execution of the paper sued on, and also that no other but the first instalment had been paid. They contended, however, that the policy constituted the contract between the parties, and that under said policy, upon their failure to pay the second instalment on November 1, 1882, there was no longer any risk carried by the plaintiff, but since then there has been an utter failure of consideration, the company carrying no risk upon the house insured. Wherefore they demanded judgment, that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

By consent the case was referred to the master, upon whose report, with exceptions thereto by plaintiff, the Circuit Judge, his honor, Judge Hudson, decreed that said exceptions be sustained, and that plaintiff have leave to enter judgment for the sum of $112.50 and costs—the judge holding "that the express covenant in the note being so explicit as to prevent the court from any effort to relieve the parties to the note from the full consequences of failure or neglect to pay any instalment at maturity." The appeal assigns error to this ruling of his honor, and contends that the clause attached to the note, whereby on failure to pay any one of the instalments at maturity, the whole became due and payable, was in the nature of a penalty, and, as such, plaintiff could only recover the actual damage sustained.

The appeal requires construction of the two papers above referred to, to wit, the policy and the note. The policy contains the contract of the plaintiff, and the note that of the defendants. They were executed at the same time and refer to the same matter, and to be properly construed they must be read together. In the policy the plaintiff contracts to insure the residence of the defendant, S. J. Boykin, for a certain period, and upon certain conditions and stipulations, which are set forth above. These *stipulations are plain and easily understood, and even from a most cursory reading it will be seen that they were intended, not as a means of vacating the contract, but were inserted as conditions thereof, describing and indicating the character of the policy which the plaintiff was to issue, and did issue. The plaintiff took the risk of defendant's residence against fire for the period mentioned (at long rates) for the sum of $150,² which was twenty-five per cent. less than short rates, this amount to be paid promptly in annual instalments, upon the condition that upon default of any instalment, not that the contract of defendant should end, but that the risk should cease during such default, with the privilege to the defendants to re-attach said risk upon certain conditions; and with the further privilege to defendants to cancel the policy by paying the customary short rates for the expired time of full term. For this policy, with such conditions and stipulations, the defendant agreed to pay $150 in annual instalments, as stated above, with an express covenant incorporated in the note, that in case of non-payment of either instalment at its maturity, the whole amount remaining unpaid on said note should become at once due and payable.

When these contracts are thus read, the one after the other, it seems plain that defendants contracted to pay plaintiffs $150 in instalments for policy of insurance covering defendants' residence for a period of years, with the contingency that plaintiffs' risk might cease during this period upon default of defendants in paying the instalments; not, however, with any stipulation that defendants should be relieved from any portion of the $150, but, on the contrary, with, as we have stated above, an express covenant that upon the default of defendants, which was to discontinue the risk, the whole amount of the $150 remaining unpaid was to become due and payable.

Now, we do not see that the plaintiff has failed in any respect to comply with its portion of the contract; on the contrary, it has furnished to the defendants all that the contract required, and the defendants have received all that they were entitled to. They could have continued the risk of the plaintiff for the full *period of the policy, had they chosen to do so, and if the plaintiff has been relieved from liability short of that time, it is the fault of the defendants in not complying with their portion of the contract. Upon this default, with full knowledge that the plaintiff would be released thereby, they covenanted to pay the whole insurance money. This contract may have been an unwise and improvident one, but still the defendants made it, and as was said by Judge Hudson in his decree: "It being so explicit, the court is prevented from any effort to relieve the parties from the full consequences thereof." See Williams et al. v. Albany Insurance Company, 19 Mich., 451 [2 Am. Rep. 95]; American Insurance Company v. Isaac Stoy, 41 Mich. 385 [1 N. W. 877]; Wall v. Home Insurance Company, 36 N. Y., 157.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CONTINENTAL INSURANCE COMPANY v.
HOFFMAN.

(April Term, 1886.)

[Insurance ⇨187.]

Continental Insurance Company v. Boykin, ante, p. 323, approved, and the same construction given to a like contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 399; Dec. Dig. ⇨187.]

Before Kershaw, J., Fairfield, September, 1885.

The construction of the written contract in this case was submitted to the Circuit Judge, without a jury, who passed the following judgment thereon:

By the terms of the contract, on the failure of the assured to pay the first instalment of the note (as was the case here) the policy ceased to insure. In other words, the entire consideration of the promise to pay utterly and entirely failed. From that time there was no risk upon the company. Without risk to the company, there could be no consideration to the assured for the payment of the premium according to the promise, after default once made. It is true, it was provided that on payment of the amount due under the policy and the note, after default, the liability of the company should revive, but that was only on the *condition that the written consent of the superintendent of the Southern department, or other officer of the company, be first obtained. But, without such written consent, the payment of the premium would not have that effect. It remained optional with the company whether the policy should be revived or not. So long as that option remained with the company the performance by the assured of his executory contract to pay the premium could not be enforced by action.

If the note had been given and received as payment for five years indemnity, absolute and unconditional, then the action could be maintained under the conditions of the note, that all the instalments should be due on the failure of the assured to pay any one of the instalments at maturity, but here there is no such contract, no unconditional insurance for five years, paid for by the premium note. If the company, upon the failure of the assured to pay the first or any subsequent instalment of the premium as promised, had tendered her the written consent of the superintendent of the Southern department, or other officer of the company, to the revival of the policy upon payment of the amount due for the same, accompanied with a demand of payment, an action might have been had against the defendants for a failure, after such demand, to pay the sum due. But that would have been an action for a breach of contract, not a simple action on a note. This is not a promissory note, payable absolutely and at all events, but a promise to pay money, conditioned by many things which do not appear on the face of the instrument, detached as it is from the paper of which it was originally a part.

The true nature of the contract is declared in the case of The American Insurance Company v. Stoy, 41 Mich. 385 [1 N. W. 877], a case nearly identical with the one at bar.

* * * In that case, the condition that on the failure of the assured to pay any one of the instalments of the note, the whole should become due, is contained in the charter of the company, which was made a part of the contract by express words to that effect; while here, the condition is upon the face of the note. It was held there, that the condition did not bind the defendant, being in the charter merely, and not on the note.

I can see no reason why the provision here should at all affect the conclusions arrived at, nor why it should have made any difference in that case. Before the company could avail itself of the provision it must place itself in a position to offer an equivalent for the sum demanded. The time when the sum might be demanded is not material, with reference to this question of the failure of consideration. The utmost that the company could claim, under the condition that the whole should become due on the failure to pay any instalment, would be that the premium for the entire period should be paid in advance from the time of such default; but, in order to enforce such claim, it would be necessary to offer, in return for the payment demanded, a policy in full force and effect for the whole period. It would not do to say to the assured—"Pay me the whole premium down as a penalty for your default, and if I see fit to give you my written consent, as 'nominated in the bond,' you may have a policy of indemnity, such as you contracted for, in return for such payment."

Here the action was not commenced until after the last instalment became due. The company, at that time, could offer no consideration for the payment demanded, except (with the written consent of its officer) to renew the policy for the remainder of the current year, because it was expressly provided that the payment of the premium note, after default, and consequent suspension of liability, should not have the effect of extending the policy beyond the period of its termination, as originally expressed in writing thereon. There could, therefore, be no revival of the policy, to extend beyond the termination of the same, as originally established; and herein this case differs from that of Am. Ins. Co. v. Henley, 60 Ind., 515. The construction contended for by the company would have the effect, in this case, of giving the company premiums for five years' insurance, in return for an indemnity for less than two years. If correct, the company, in case of a default like that here, could sit quietly by until the end of the term of five years, and then collect the unearned premiums for four years, absolutely without any equivalent whatever. Such a construction is inequitable and unreasonable, and ought not to prevail.

The failure of the company to assert its rights for so long a period, during which it had some equivalent to offer the assured, and its postponement to a time when it no longer had any, might well be considered a waiver of any right it might have had under the contract. At least, the utmost it could demand, would be the actual damages sustained, if any, in consequence of the failure of the assured to comply with the contract. The stipulation that "in case of the non-payment, at maturity, of any one of the instalments" of the premium note, "the whole amount of the instalments remaining unpaid on said policy shall be immediately due and payable," is a penalty, and intended to secure the payments of the instalments as they matured. Another penalty was that the policy thereupon "ceased to insure." To make the whole note collectible without an equivalent, would be to construe this as a stipulation for the payment of liquidated damages.

Says Lord Holt, in his note to Barton v. Glover, Holt's N. P. Rep., 43: "Where a sum of money, whether in the name of a penalty or otherwise, is introduced into a covenant or agreement, merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object, the enjoyment of the object is considered as the principal intent of the deed or contract, and the penalty only as accessory, and, therefore, only to secure the damages really incurred." Or, as most felicitously expressed by Judge Glover, in Bearden v. Smith, 11 Rich., 555, "the distinction between penalty and liquidated damages is, that the former is a security for, and the latter is to be paid in lieu of, the performance of the act to be done." If we apply these terse and comprehensive tests to the present contract, it will at once be manifest that the stipulation in question was a penalty merely, and would not authorize the recovery, on the instrument, of more than the actual loss suffered by the company, if any. It follows from what has been said that the plaintiff has misconceived its remedy, and can have no relief in this action.

It is adjudged, that the complaint herein be dismissed on the merits, and that the defendants do recover of the plaintiff the costs of the action, to be inserted herein.

From this judgment, the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. O. W. Buchanan, for appellant.
Messrs. McDonald & Douglass, contra.

*August 10, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants upon a premium note given in consideration of a policy of insurance. The company covenanted to insure certain property against "loss or damage by fire and lightning" for a period not exceeding five years in the sum of $4,000. At the time the policy was issued the defendants paid the sum of $30.00 in cash, and gave a premium note for the sum of $120.00, the entire premium being $150.00. The contract of insurance was made on March 4, 1881, and on that day the cash payment was made and the premium note executed and delivered. In the note the defendants agreed to pay the amount in annual instalments of $30 each, on the 4th days of March, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, to be paid in advance. It is provided in the note, that, in case of non-payment at maturity of any one of the instalments, the whole amount of the instalments remaining unpaid shall become immediately due and payable. But the action was not brought until after the expiration of the whole term of five years.

The following condition or stipulation was attached: "It is also covenanted and agreed, that if default is made in payment at maturity of any of the instalments of premium, to be paid as stipulated in premium note given herewith, the whole amount of all instalments unpaid shall become immediately due and payable, and the policy of insurance issued thereon shall cease to insure, and the said company shall not be liable for any loss or damage which may accrue to premises, issued thereunder during such default, nor until said policy shall be revived by the written consent of the superintendent of said Company's Southern department or by an officer of said company, on payment to him of all dues thereon." It is further conditioned that "any suspension of liability under this policy, on account of such default, shall not have the effect of extending such liability beyond the period of its termination as originally expressed in writing herein [no such right therefore in this case]; that no attempt by law or otherwise to collect any premium due upon any instalment note shall be deemed a waiver of any of the conditions of this policy, nor shall it be deemed in any manner to revive this policy. This *company may at any time cancel this policy by returning the unexpired premium pro rata. The assured may at any time have the policy cancelled by paying the customary short rate for the expired time of the full term, (5 years)" &c.

The defendants refused to pay the first or any of the instalments of the premium note at maturity; and there was no proof before the court that the company ever made demand upon the defendants for payment of the said instalments or any one of them, and no evidence that notice was ever given by the company to the defendants through the mails or otherwise. There were no transactions between the plaintiff and defendants at any time between the date of the maturity of the first instalment of the note, and the date of the filing of the complaint in this action, July 24, 1885.

Upon the complaint and answer, and the facts as set forth, Judge Kershaw rendered a decree dismissing the complaint, upon the grounds therein stated, from which the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following grounds: I. For that his honor erred in holding that the instalment note therein was without consideration, null, and void; that the defendants should be allowed to avoid its payment, and that the policy for which the note was given was void; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, his honor should have held that there was a sufficient consideration and that said note was good and valid, due and payable, and that the policy was voidable and not void, and then only at the election of the insurance company. II. For that his honor erred in holding that said policy was void at the time of the suit brought herein especially, whereas it reads that it shall issue for five years from March 4, 1881, until March 4, 1886, the policy being the only evidence introduced upon that point by any one, and was taken by admission as what it purported to be on its face. III. That said decision was contrary to the law applicable therein, and that the decision, it is submitted, should have been in favor of the plaintiff.

This is certainly a very hard case. The insurance was avowedly for "five years." The company carried the liability only one year, for which they received the cash, but as to the other four years, the company carried nothing, carried no liability *whatever, for the reason that the instalments of the note were not paid at maturity, and yet now sues on those instalments, claiming that they are "good and valid, due and payable." At first view it would seem that this was a contract of insurance from year to year upon "the instalment plan" to run for a period not exceeding five years, as in the case of The American Insurance Company v. Sloy, 41 Mich., 385 [1 N. W. 877], cited in the judgment of the court below. But it seems that this company (Continental Insurance) had what are called "long terms" and "short terms"; that they charged a larger premium for one year (short) than for five years (long), and that this difference was twenty-five per cent.; so that the defendants, in this case, by taking a long insurance for five years, secured insurance for the year which they paid, at twenty-five per cent. less than they would have had to pay if they had taken the insurance for a single year, as was the practical result; and that this difference of $7.50, may be regarded as consideration for the note of $120.00.

It is true that one of the numerous stipulations and conditions attached, was that the assured might at any time have the policy cancelled; but, however, upon the express condition of "paying the customary short rates for the expired time of the whole term," which was not done. The simple failure to pay the instalments as they fell due, without payment of the additional short rate premium for the time then expired, can hardly be regarded as "a cancellation" under the very particular terms of the agreement. This appears to have been the contract, and although, as it seems to us, it was one-sided, unequal, and unjust, yet if parties, who are of full age and of sound mind, without misrepresentation, imposition, or fraud, choose to make such a contract, we know of no principle or authority which would justify the court in denying the right to enforce it. The precise point has just been ruled by this court in another case of the same plaintiff, Continental Insurance Company v. Boykin (case next ante [323]), to which reference is made, as conclusive of this case.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit for a new trial.

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, December, 1885.

This was an action by Baxter H. Moore against L. M. Gentry, sheriff, and F. M. Trimmier. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellants.

Mr. Ralph K. Carson, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. In this case the plaintiff alleges in his complaint that on February 28, 1880, one John Winsmith executed to him and one A. G. Floyd a mortgage on two tracts of land, one known as the Nimrod Moore tract, and the other as the Tom Wofford place, to secure the payment of a note for ten hundred and seventy-five dollars; that said Winsmith was at the time the owner in fee of several other tracts of lands; that on May 17, 1881, he sold and conveyed the Nimrod Moore place to one C. E. Smith for the sum of two thousand dollars, and on August 12, 1882, he sold and conveyed a tract, known as the White Oak Spring place, to one L. A. Mills for the sum of twenty-five hundred and one dollars, and on October 24, 1883, he sold and conveyed another tract of land to one R. C. Hunter for six hundred and forty-two dollars—all of which land lies in Spartanburg County, State of South Carolina; that on March 13, 1879, the defendant, Trimmier, recovered judgment against said Winsmith for the sum of sixteen hundred and fifty-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents; that in December, 1884, "under a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage, given to the plaintiff *and A. G. Floyd as aforementioned, which had been subsequently transferred to A. G. Floyd, the Nimrod Moore tract and the Tom Wofford tract were sold by the sheriff of Spartanburg County, and the plaintiff became the purchaser of the Tom Wofford tract for the sum of $1,310;" that in April, 1885, the sheriff levied upon the Tom Wofford tract as the property of said Winsmith under Trimmier's judgment, and advertised the same for sale; and that the property sold by the said Winsmith subsequent to the execution of the mortgage above referred to, is more than sufficient to satisfy said judgment. Upon this state of facts the plaintiff demands judgment that the defendants be enjoined from selling the Tom Wofford tract of land until they first exhaust the property sold by Winsmith subsequent to the execution of said mortgage.

The defendants demurred upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and Judge Wallace, who heard the case below, overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment granting the injunction as prayed for in the complaint. From this judgment defendants appeal upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, as the sole question presented is, whether the plaintiff, under the facts stated in the complaint, has any equity to the relief demanded.

It is very manifest that the sole object and effect of the action and of the judgment rendered therein is to throw the defendant, Trimmier, first upon the lands sold by Winsmith, after the execution of the mortgage, to the relief of the land bought by the plaintiff under the judgment of foreclosure; for there can be no doubt that Trimmier's judgment being the first lien on all of the land, he could, if necessary for the satisfaction of his debt, sell every one of the tracts of land mentioned in the complaint. Hence the only question presented is as to the order in which the lands of the plaintiff and those of the other purchasers, shall be held liable, the plaintiff contending that the lands of those who purchased after the execution are primarily liable, and that his can only be resorted to after theirs is exhausted, upon the principle that, where a judgment debtor sells or encumbers different tracts of lands, at different times, to different persons, while *all of the lands are eventually liable to be sold for the satisfaction of the judgment, if necessary, yet that the senior purchaser or encumbrancer has an equity to require the judgment creditor first to exhaust the lands of the junior purchasers or encumbrancers, and that the lands must therefore be sold in the inverse order of the conveyances or encumbrances.

This being so, it is clear that those who purchased from Winsmith subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, through which the plaintiff claims, have a very material interest in the question involved; in fact, they are the only persons who have any real interest in the question; for though the judgment creditor is a necessary party to the action for injunction, yet he has no real interest in the question presented, for let it be determined either way, he loses nothing except by the delay to which he is subjected in realizing his money. We think, therefore, that those who purchased from the judgment debtor, Winsmith, subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, having such a material and vital interest in the issue presented, are necessary parties to the action, and that no final judgment can properly be rendered until they have an opportunity to be heard upon an issue so seriously affecting their rights and interests.

These purchasers not being parties to the action would, of course, not be bound by any judgment rendered herein, and therefore if the judgment appealed from is allowed to stand, then when Trimmier levies his execution upon the lands of Hunter and Mills, or either of them, we see no reason why they could not, by their action for injunction, reopen the question raised by the plaintiff in this case, and contend that the plaintiff is, in fact, a subsequent purchaser to them, and that his purchase could not have relation back to the date of the mortgage, and thus invest him with the equity which the mortgagee may have had to require the judgment creditor first to exhaust the lands of those who purchased subsequent to the mortgage; thus subjecting the judgment creditor to further delay and expense. So that it seems to us, in any view of the case, all the necessary parties are not before the court, and for that reason alone, without intending to intimate any opinion either way, as to the merits of the question involved, the judgment appealed from cannot be permitted to stand.

*Indeed, we think that in actions of this kind, whether brought by a mortgagee or a purchaser at a foreclosure sale, the mortgagor, as well as any person who has bought subsequent to the mortgage, is a necessary party, so that the court, having all the parties interested before it, may render such decree as will properly adjust all the equities of the several parties.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, with leave to the plaintiff to apply to that court for permission to amend, upon such terms as to said court may seem meet, by bringing in the necessary parties.

Before ———, J., Greenville, ———.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. D. R. Speer, for appellant.

September 23, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a proceeding for dower, originally commenced in the Court of Probate and carried thence, by appeal, to the Court of Common Pleas. The only issue involved was as to the seizin of demandant's husband. The facts are not controverted, and are as follows: Bayliss Morgan, the deceased husband of demandant, during his life-time and during coverture, purchased a tract of land and went into possession of the same. He paid a large portion of the purchase *money, but died before completing the payment, and before receiving a deed for the land. After his death "the parties in interest" (which we understand to mean his heirs at law or legal representatives) paid the balance of the purchase money out of the assets of his estate. Bayliss Morgan, during his life-time, sold a portion of the said land, out of which dower is claimed, to one Mayfield, but died before making him a deed. After the death of Morgan a proceeding, to which the petitioner and Mayfield were parties, was instituted in the Court of Common Pleas, under which specific performance of the contract between Morgan and Mayfield was decreed, and a deed was made to Mayfield under the order of the court for the land which he had contracted to buy from Morgan. Mayfield afterwards sold the land to the defendant in this action and put him in possession of the same.

Upon this state of facts the judge of probate decreed that the defendant was not entitled to dower, upon the ground, as we understand, that there was no legal seizin in her husband. From this decree the petitioner appealed, and the Circuit Court rendered judgment affirming the decree of the Court of Probate, from which this appeal is taken. By this appeal petitioner contends: 1st. That where her husband has been in possession during coverture, it is not necessary for her to prove a legal title in him, and the defendant can only impugn her husband's seizin by showing a paramount title in himself as against the husband. 2d. That the defendant having gone into possession, and claiming title through the husband, is estopped from disputing the seizin of the husband.

To sustain her first position, appellant cites Smith v. Paysenger, 2 Mill. Con. R., 59; Forrest v. Trammell, 1 Bail., 77; Reid v. Stevenson, 3 Rich., 66, and the recent case of Stark v. Hopson, 22 S. C., 42. While some of these cases do contain language which seems to support the position contended for, yet upon examination of the points really presented for decision in those cases, and upon consideration of other cases subsequently decided, it will be seen that they do not go to the extent claimed for them. They only decide that a demandant in dower need not make out a regular chain of title in her husband, but that proof of his possession during coverture is prima facie sufficient evidence of the husband's seizin, but is not conclusive of that fact, as it may be rebutted, not merely by proof of title in the defendant paramount to that under which the husband held, but also by showing that although the husband was seized during the coverture, yet his seizin was of such a character as that his wife could not be endowed of the land, e. g., that the husband was seized as trustee (L'ault v. Payne, 2 Bail., 319), or that he held a leasehold and not a freehold estate in the land out of which dower is claimed (Whitmire v. Wright, 22 S. C., 446 [53 Am. Rep. 725]), or that the husband never had any legal title (Bowman v. Bailey, 20 S. C., 550).

To sustain her second position, the appellant cites the cases of Gayle v. Price, 5 Rich., 525; Pledger v. Ellerbe, 6 Rich., 206 [60 Am. Dec. 123]; Plantt v. Payne, 2 Bail., 319—relying on McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq., 223 [94 Am. Dec. 164], and Horde v. Landrum, 5 S. C., 213, to show that a purchase at sheriff's sale under an execution against the husband is the same in effect as a purchase directly from the husband. While it may be conceded that these cases do show that where a defendant in dower has gone into possession of the premises out of which dower is claimed under a deed from the husband, either directly or through the sheriff under a judgment against the husband, he is not permitted to deny that the husband had a legal title (though, as we have seen, he may show that such title was not of such a character as would support a claim of dower), yet we do not see how this will help the appellant, for it does not appear in this case that the defendant claims under a deed from the husband. On the contrary, the evidence conclusively shows that the husband never made any title to the defendant or to Mayfield, under whom the defendant claims, and hence the cases relied on do not apply.

Indeed, it appeals not only that the husband never had any legal title, but that he never was in a condition to demand one, for though he went into possession under a contract to purchase, and paid a part of the purchase money, yet having died before completing the payment, he never received a deed for the land, and was never entitled to demand one. Hence he never was in a condition to make a title to Mayfield, and he never undertook to do so. The payment of the balance of the purchase money *out of the assets of his estate after his death by "the parties in interest," certainly could not have the effect of investing him with seizin during the coverture so as to entitle his widow to dower. The extent of the husband's right was a mere equity to enforce the specific performance of the contract under which he went into possession of the land, and the defendant not claiming under a deed from the husband, but under a conveyance made by order of the court after his death, is not precluded from showing, as he did show, that the husband never had any seizin of the premises in question. Secrest v. McKenna, 6 Rich. Eq., 72. In the cases of Gayle v. Price, Plantt v. Payne, and Pledger v. Ellerbe, it appeared that the defendant claimed under a conveyance from the husband, either directly or through the agency of the sheriff, and therefore was not permitted to dispute the fact that the husband had legal title. Here, however, the defendant does not claim under any conveyance from the husband, and hence those cases do not apply.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BOMAR v. GIST.

[Trusts. ⚡206.]

It is a breach of trust by a trustee to use trust funds in part payment for land purchased for the estate, and give a mortgage for the balance of the purchase money; and the vendor, knowing of this breach, becomes a trustee for the cestuis que trust, and on foreclosing his mortgage must first account to them for their money before applying the proceeds to the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. ⚡206.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Spartanburg, November, 1885.

This was an appeal from the following decree:

In determining the rights as between plaintiff and the cestuis que trust, under the issues presented by the pleadings, it will be proper to consider: 1. Whether or not it was a breach of trust for the trustee to invest the trust funds in the house and lot upon the terms above set forth. 11. If the trustee was guilty of *a breach of trust in making said purchase, did the plaintiff have knowledge of such breach at the time he received the $550 cash payment and took the mortgage for the balance of purchase money?

It seems to me that under the provisions of the will of William H. Gist, and the large discretion therein conferred upon the trustee, the trustee was authorized to re-invest the proceeds of the sale of the trust land in real estate; otherwise the testator would not have directed the trustee to invest such proceeds of sale for the same uses that he had attached to the trust under said will. In this view I conclude that it would not have been a breach of trust for the trustee to have invested the proceeds of the sale of the Union County trust land in the house and lot purchased in Spartanburg from plaintiff. But it appears that the trustee has never sold the Union County trust land, and that the $550 cash payment necessarily must have come from some other source. According to the testimony of David C. Gist, and I conclude as matter of fact, that the $550 cash paid was realized from sales of cotton produced upon the trust land in Union County. Then the question arises, was it a breach of trust for the trustee to invest the income of the trust land in the house and lot purchased from plaintiff? The income was money, the investment of which in real estate is not authorized by the provisions of the will creating the trust. To invest the income in the purchase of the house and lot and the giving of a mortgage for the unpaid balance of purchase money, was a breach of trust under the authority of Mathews v. Heyward.

If the plaintiff had notice, at the time of such breach of trust by the trustee in purchasing the house and lot, he must be held so far responsible for the trustee's breach of trust as to be regarded as a trustee for the cestuis que trust, and should be compelled to refund the $550 cash paid by the trustee, with interest, and the cestuis que trust would not be affected by the mortgage. Had the plaintiff such notice? It appears that it was at the request of the trustee that the plaintiff conveyed the house and lot to the trustee, subject to the terms of the original trust under the will of William H. Gist. Plaintiff, by his deed, therefore became bound to take notice of the terms of the trust recited in his deed and in the will of William H. Gist. He was not, however, bound *to inquire beyond the trust recited in his deed and in the will, to ascertain the source from which the trustee derived the $550 cash paid, and could only be affected by the breach of trust upon the ground that he had actual notice, or was put upon due inquiry in that direction.

The terms of the trust of which plaintiff had notice, would clearly indicate that the trustee, clothed with an almost unlimited discretion, was authorized to sell and invest proceeds of the 1,600 acres of land in Union County. Plaintiff and John Earle Bomar, the attorney who drew the papers, both testify that, according to their recollection, the trustee stated at the time that he either wanted to sell or had sold the Union County tract of land, and wanted to re-invest in the house and lot, and hence the request that the house and lot should be conveyed to the trustee, subject to the trust under the will. The defendant, David C. Gist, however, testifies that at the time he told plaintiff that the $550 cash paid was the proceeds of rent cotton. Plaintiff and John Earle Bomar, Esq., both testify, according to their recollection, that no such statement was made by the trustee.

It seems to me that, under the circumstances, it would have been reasonable for plaintiff to conclude, either that the $550 payment in cash was from the sale of the trust land, or that, in anticipation of the sale of the trust land, this money was advanced by David C. Gist, to be reimbursed out of the sale to be made of the trust land. I cannot conclude from the testimony, that the plaintiff had such notice as would render him "responsible for the trustee's breach of trust," as to the rent money. In the case of Mathews v. Heyward, cited by defendants, it clearly appeared that the mortgagee had notice of the mortgagor's breach of trust, and upon this ground the mortgagee was held responsible for the breach of trust by the mortgagor.

It has been urged that if the money invested by the trustee in the house and lot had been the proceeds of the sale of the trust land, that under the authority of Mathews v. Heyward it would have been a breach of trust to encumber the property with a mortgage for the purchase money. As the only amount ($550) paid by the trustee on the house and lot comes from rent cotton, and not from sale of the trust land, this is a hypothetical view of the case. But assuming that the $550 cash paid by the trustee came from the sale of the trust land, it seems that the two cases are to be distinguished, as a large discretion was conferred upon the trustee in this case, who, under the terms of the trust, had 1,600 acres of land (at present prices worth from $10 to $12 per acre) with which, in the exercise of such discretion, he could at any time by sale relieve the house and lot of the mortgage. The terms of the trust under the will, of which plaintiff had knowledge, furnished this information as to the discretion and ability of the trustee at any time to prevent a sacrifice of the interests of the cestuis que trust, from the mortgage given for the balance of purchase money. No such facts appear in the case of Mathews v. Heyward. The real controversy between plaintiff and the cestuis que trust is over the $550 of rent cotton applied as a cash payment on the house and lot by the trustee, in breach of his trust. Having held that plaintiff did not have notice of the trust character of the cash payment, he cannot be held responsible for any breach of trust committed by the trustee. It was further claimed that the purchase by the trustee was not made for the benefit of the cestuis que trust and was improvident. The defendant, David C. Gist, the only witness on behalf of the defendants, testifies that his wife was anxious for the purchase of the house and lot, in order that their children, the cestuis que trust, might enjoy the benefit of the schools at Spartanburg. I am convinced from the testimony that the house and lot was worth the $2,200, the purchase money, and was yielding a rent of $210 per annum. I conclude that one of the main objects of the purchase of the house and lot was to educate the cestuis que trust, and that the purchase by the trustee, under the circumstances, was not improvident. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that the court would confirm the investment. If it should be considered improvident, it is the result of the large discretion with which the trustee is clothed by the terms of the trust.

I find as matter of fact: I. That the cash paid plaintiff by the trustee on the house and lot was derived from proceeds of sale of cotton from the trust land in Union County. II. That when plaintiff received the $550 cash on the house and lot, he had no knowledge that it was proceeds of the sale of cotton from the trust land. III. That the house and lot sold the trustee by plaintiff was worth $2,200.

I find as matter of law: I. That David C. Gist had the right, under the terms of the trust under the will of William H. Gist, to reinvest the proceeds of the sale of the trust land in the house and lot sold by plaintiff. II. That the trustee was not authorized to invest the $550 cash, from the proceeds of cotton from the trust land, in the house and lot purchased from plaintiff, and that the same was a breach of trust. III. That the plaintiff is not responsible for the breach of trust thus committed by the trustee. IV. That plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure upon his mortgage.

No personal judgment has been demanded against David C. Gist for any deficiency that may arise from the sale of the mortgaged premises. As the trustee has not exercised his authority to sell the trust land, this court will not order the trustee to sell the trust land to relieve the house and lot of the mortgage for the balance of the purchase money, but will direct the sale of the house and lot under plaintiff's mortgage, with a view, as far as practicable, to the protection of the rights of the cestuis que trust.

It is ordered and adjudged, that unless David C. Gist, trustee, shall in the meantime pay plaintiff the amount due upon the mortgage thereof, that the house and lot described in the mortgage of David C. Gist, trustee, to the plaintiff, William M. Bomar, dated November 3, 1883, in the city of Spartanburg, be sold; * * * that after paying the costs of this action the sheriff do apply so much of the proceeds of said sale as may be necessary to pay the balance of purchase money due plaintiff upon his mortgage debt against David C. Gist, trustee of the other defendants under the will of William H. Gist, and that he hold any surplus subject to the further order of this court.

From this decree the infant defendants appealed.

Mr. William Munro, for appellants.
Messrs. Bomar & Simpson, contra.

September 23, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. Under the will of his father, the defendant, David C. Gist, held certain lands in Union County in trust for his children, Laura Gist and others, his co-defendants, all of whom are minors. The terms of the trust are as follows: "For the use of his children, born and to be born, and their heirs forever, with power to said trustee to sell and convey the said tract at any time before the eldest of said children reaches the age of twenty-one years, and invest the proceeds thereof for the same uses." On November 3, 1883, the plaintiff sold and conveyed to the defendant, David C. Gist, as trustee as aforesaid, a house and lot in the city of Spartanburg for the sum of twenty-two hundred dollars, of which sum the said trustee paid five hundred and fifty dollars in cash, and executed to the plaintiff his three notes of five hundred and fifty dollars each, payable in one, two, and three years, secured by a mortgage of the premises. Upon default in payment of the first note and the interest on the other two, this action was commenced to foreclose said mortgage, the minor children of the trustee, beneficiaries under the trust, being made parties defendant.

David C. Gist, put in no answer, but the minors, by their guardian ad litem, answered, claiming that the cash payment was made with trust funds; that the land was conveyed to the trustee upon the same trusts as those declared in the will of their grandfather; that the purchase was not made for their benefit, but for the individual benefit of their trustee and as a residence for him; that said purchase was improvident and made without authority; and if carried out will result in loss of the trust money already paid; that all these things were well known to the plaintiff at the time of the purchase, and he thereby became a participant in the breach of trust committed by the trustee. They therefore demanded judgment that the purchase be rescinded, and the plaintiff required to refund to them the cash paid, with interest; or if a sale of the premises be ordered, that the said sum of money and interest be paid for the use of the minor defendants out of the proceeds thereof, before anything is paid to the plaintiff.

The testimony shows conclusively that the cash payment made by the trustee was made with money derived from the rents of the trust lands in Union; but there was a con-

dict of testimony as to whether this fact was known to the plaintiff at the time of the purchase, he claiming that he was led to believe by the trustee that the money was derived from the sale of the Union lands, and not from the rents of those lands. The testimony also shows that the trustee had the means of supporting his children and providing them with a house, and hence he had no right to use their trust funds for that purpose. The manifest object of the purchase of the house and lot in Spartanburg was to obtain a family residence with access to the schools in that city, though it appears that there was a residence on the Union lands, which had been occupied by the family, within reach of good schools, and we think it pretty clear that the real purpose of the purchase was, not so much as an investment of the trust funds, as it was to obtain the superior social and educational advantages afforded by a residence in the city.

The Circuit Judge found as a matter of fact that the cash payment was made out of the proceeds of the rents of the trust lands, but that this was not known to the plaintiff at the time of the purchase. And as matter of law he found that while the trustee, under the terms of the will, had the power to sell the Union lands and reinvest the proceeds thereof, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose, in the purchase of the house and lot in Spartanburg, he did not have the power so to invest the rents of those lands, and such an investment was, on his part, a breach of trust; but that the plaintiff, having no notice that the cash payment was made out of the rents of the lands, could not be implicated in such breach of trust. He therefore rendered judgment that the house and lot be sold and the proceeds, after paying the costs of the action, be applied to the payment of any balance that may be due to the plaintiff on the purchase money, and that any surplus that may then remain be held subject to the further order of the court.

From this judgment the minor defendants appeal upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, as in our judgment the whole case turns upon the single inquiry whether it was a breach of trust on the part of the trustee to use trust funds in making the cash payment on the property purchased, and at the same time encumbering the property with a mortgage to secure the payment of the balance of the purchase money. We do not suppose that there can be a doubt that it would be a breach of trust for a trustee to invest the trust funds in lands already encumbered with the lien of a mortgage, and we are unable to perceive the difference in principle between such an investment, and one in which, at the time of investment, the property is encumbered with a lien entitled to priority of payment; for in both cases the trust funds are imperilled, and unless the liens are removed, may be entirely lost. We understand the rule to be that where a vendor receives trust funds, knowing at the time that they are trust funds, in part payment of land, and takes from the trustee a mortgage to secure the payment of the balance of the purchase money, he thereby becomes a trustee to the extent of such cash payment, and when he forecloses his mortgage for the unpaid purchase money he must first account to the cestui que trust for the trust funds—the cash payment—before he can apply any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises to the unpaid purchase money. Mathews v. Heyward, 2 S. C., 239; Elliott v. Mackorell, 19 S. C., 238.

The fact that the trustee in this case held other trust property—the Union lands—by the sale of which the balance of the purchase money might have been paid, cannot affect the result. For it may be, and the testimony seems to indicate that such would have been the fact, that it would have required a sacrifice of the Union lands, or at least a great loss on their sale, if the trustee had been forced to sell them to obtain the means of paying the balance of the purchase money due on the mortgaged premises, in time to prevent a judgment of foreclosure; and thus, to save one portion of the trust funds, another portion would be jeopardized and perhaps sacrificed. Such a proposition certainly cannot be maintained. The breach of trust consisted in the investment of trust funds in property which was at the same time encumbered with a lien; and it was then that the plaintiff became trustee for so much of the trust funds as were used in making the cash payment, and as such must account for the same out of the proceeds of the sale of the property in which such trust funds were invested.

Under this view of the case it is wholly immaterial whether *the plaintiff, at the time of the purchase, knew that the funds used in making the cash payment were derived from the rents or the sale of the Union lands. He knew that they were trust funds, and that was all that was necessary to affect him with the trust. We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge erred in decreeing that the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, after payment of the costs of the action, should be applied to the payment of the balance due the plaintiff for the purchase money, without first providing for the refunding of the trust funds used in making the cash payment, with interest thereon, to the trust estate.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified, in accordance with the views herein announced.

25 S. C. 348

HALL & CO. v. KLINCK.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Corporations ¶265.]

The liability of the stockholders of a corporation to its creditors being a creature of statute, the nature and extent of such liability depends upon the special terms of the statute, in each particular case. In this case the terms of the charter being that "each stockholder shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors thereof in an amount besides the value of his share or shares therein, not exceeding ten per cent. of the par value of the share or shares held by him;"—one of the creditors might bring his individual action at law against one of the stockholders, to recover his debt to the extent of ten per cent. of the par value of the defendant's shares.

[2. Corporations ¶237.]

Money advanced with no time stipulated for repayment is instantly due, and therefore is a demand payable within a year. And this is a question of fact, which, in a law case, is concluded by the finding of the Circuit Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 908; Dec. Dig. ¶237.]

[3. Corporations ¶240.]

A creditor of the corporation, even though an officer or agent thereof, may avail himself of this provision of the charter. And, it would seem, that a stockholder, if a creditor, might also enforce his demand against a co-stockholder; but in this case the creditor, a partnership, was not a stockholder, notwithstanding all the parties were.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 936; Dec. Dig. ¶240.]

[4. Corporations ¶262.]

Neither a compromise made by plaintiff with all the other stockholders, which to no extent increased the liability of defendant, nor an offer by plaintiff to compromise with defendant, which was refused, affected *plaintiff's right to recover from defendant the full amount due by him under the terms of the charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1082; Dec. Dig. ¶262.]

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, July, 1885. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Mitchell & Smith, for appellant. Messrs. Smythe & Lee, contra.

September 23, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MEYER. This was an action brought by G. Oliveras Hall, as survivor of W. P. Hall & Co., against the defendant as a stockholder in the Kiawah Phosphate Company, to recover ten per cent. of the amount of his stock under one of the provisions of the charter of said company. It appears that the Kiawah Phosphate Company was formed under the general law authorizing the formation of certain classes of corporations and received its charter from the clerk of the court on January 9, 1882. The capital stock of said company was seventy-five thousand dollars, divided into shares of five hundred dollars each, of which the defendant, at the time of the formation of said company, and ever since, held ten shares. The firm of W. P. Hall & Co. was not a stockholder, but the individuals composing said firm were all stockholders, not, however, in the same proportions as they were interested in the firm of W. P. Hall & Co. One of these individuals, F. P. Salas, was the president, and another, W. P. Hall, was one of the directors of said company. The firm of W. P. Hall & Co. were duly appointed general agents of said company, and as such were charged with the financial affairs of the company, under the direction of the board of directors. These financial agents were authorized by the board of directors from time to time to borrow money for the use of the company as occasion might require, and under this authority the firm of W. P. Hall & Co. from time to time made large advances to the Kiawah Phosphate Company, exceeding in the whole the sum of fifty thousand dollars.

*The operations of the company proving unsuccessful, it was determined to sell out the property and settle up its affairs. Accordingly the property was sold, and after applying the proceeds of the sale to the amount due W. P. Hall & Co., there still remained a very considerable balance due to them. To meet this balance, resort was had to the liability of the stockholders under one of the provisions of the charter, which will hereinafter be set out. At first it was erroneously supposed that this liability was five per cent. of the stock held by each stockholder, and after some had settled upon that basis, it was ascertained that the correct amount of the liability was ten instead of five per cent. After this discovery was made, and after some negotiations, the plaintiffs agreed, by way of compromise, to accept five per cent. In discharge of the stockholders' liability, provided that amount was paid; otherwise they would claim the ten per cent. Accordingly all the stockholders, except the defendant, paid five per cent., and this still left a balance of over four thousand dollars due by the company, for which balance suit was brought by W. P. Hall & Co. against the company and judgment recovered and the execution issued thereon was returned wholly unsatisfied.

After the defendant had been several times offered the privilege of settling his liability at five per cent., as the other stockholders had done, and notified that if he refused to accept this offer, suit would be brought in which ten per cent. would be demanded, and after his refusal to accept such offer, this action was commenced. It appeared in evidence from the books of the company that W. P. Hall & Co. were the only creditors of the company, and the testimony also showed that even if all the stockholders had paid ten instead of five per cent. of their stock, there would still be a balance due to the plaintiffs exceeding the amount now claimed from the defendant.

The case was docketed on calendar No. 1, and upon the call of that calendar a motion was made by the defendant to transfer the case to calendar No. 2, upon the ground "that it was properly a case in equity, to which all the creditors and all the stockholders should be parties." The Circuit Judge refused the motion, holding that "the provisions of law applicable to the charter involved in this case differ from those of every other decided case *which I have been able to examine on same subject. They seem clearly to intend that every stockholder, to the extent of his liability, is subject to an action at law by any creditor who, after due effort, has failed to collect his debt from the company."

A jury having been waived, the case was tried by the court, when Judge Pressley, after hearing the evidence and the argument, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, saying: "The debt and insolvency of the company are proved. Plaintiff is sole creditor, and defendant is the only stockholder who has not settled his liability. The only serious issue of fact in the case is whether plaintiffs' debt was payable within a year from the time it was contracted. It was payable on call; the company had the right to pay, and the creditor the right to demand payment at pleasure—that I regard as a debt payable within the year."

From this judgment defendant appeals upon the several grounds set out in the records, which raise the following questions: 1st. Can this action be maintained at law, or is the remedy in equity alone where all the creditors and all the stockholders can be made parties? 2d. Was the debt due plaintiffs payable within a year? 3d. Does the stockholders' liability, under the charter, attach in favor of officers or co-stockholders in the company? 4th. Can the defendant be made liable for more than five per cent. of his stock?

As is said by Mr. Chief Justice Waite in Terry v. Little, 101 U. S., 217 [25 L. Ed. 864]: "The individual liability of stockholders in a corporation is always a creature of statute. It does not exist at common law. The first thing to be determined in all such cases is, therefore, what liability has been created. There will always be difficulty in attempting to reconcile cases of this class in which the general question of remedy has arisen, unless special attention is given to the precise language of the statute under consideration. * * * Undoubtedly, under the provisions of some charters, suits at law may be maintained by one creditor against one or more of the stockholders. The form and extent of a statutory liability of this kind depend upon the particular phraseology of the statute which creates the liability."

To determine, therefore, the first question presented by the grounds of appeal, we must look to the particular phraseology of *the statute creating the liability in this case.

That statute is now incorporated in the General Statutes as section 1362, and so much of it as relates to the questions here involved, reads as follows: "Each stockholder in the said corporation shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors thereof in an amount, besides the value of his share or shares therein, not exceeding ten per cent. of the par value of the share or shares held by him at the time the demand of the creditor was created: Provided, that such demand shall have been payable within one year." Now, in the particular phraseology here used, several things are observable. The language is each stockholder—not the stockholders generally; the liability is joint and several, not joint only; the amount of the liability is a fixed and definite sum, not proportionate to the amount of debts due or the liability of others. In fixing the time to which reference must be had to ascertain the amount of the liability of each stockholder, we find the singular and not the plural number used—ten per cent. of the par value of the shares "held by him at the time the demand of the creditor was created." And, finally, in the proviso the singular and not the plural number is again used: "Provided that such demand shall have been payable within one year."

From this analysis of the language of the section it seems clear that where there is a creditor of a corporation holding an unsatisfied demand against it, which was payable within one year, a several liability is fixed upon each stockholder to pay such demand to the extent of ten per cent. of the par value of the shares held by him at the time such demand was created. Such liability rests upon contract, implied from the acceptance of a charter containing such provision (Sullivan v. Sullivan Manufacturing Company, 14 S. C., 494; 20 S. C., 79; Flash v. Com., 109 U. S. 371 [3 Sup. Ct. 263, 27 L. Ed. 966]), and presents a clear case for enforcement by an action at law. The fact that under this construction of the statute it is barely possible that a single stockholder might be required to pay the total balance due by an insolvent corporation, after exhausting all of its assets, cannot affect the question. Our inquiry is limited to what is the proper construction of the language used by the legislature, and we have no power or disposition to question the policy of any of its acts. The question for *us to determine is, what is the remedy given to a creditor of a corporation against the stockholders by the act in question? If the remedy given operates harshly or inequitably as between the stockholders themselves, it is for them, and not the creditors, to invoke the aid of that tribunal which has the power to adjust the equities amongst themselves. Ogilvie v. The Knox Insurance Company, 22 How., 380 [16 L. Ed. 349].

So, too, the fact that under the construction which we have adopted, it is possible that one creditor may acquire an advantage over another by promptness of action, does not strike us as entitled to much, if any, consideration. It will be observed that the section of the act which we are called upon to construe, unlike many others which were designed to fix an individual liability upon the stockholders of a corporation for the protection of its creditors, contains no language indicating a purpose that the liability of the stockholders shall constitute a common fund to be applied to the payment of the creditors in proportion to the amount of their several demands. On the contrary, it fixes a liability to a definite, specified amount upon each stockholder to pay the demand of any creditor which shall have been payable within a year. It is, therefore, like the ordinary case of several creditors having demands against the same person, where, usually, the prompt and vigilant acquire an advantage over the dilatory and indifferent.

As has already been said, it is not to be expected that the various cases on this subject can be reconciled, because the phraseology used in the several charters which have been brought under review differ materially in declaring the liability of stockholders and directors, or trustees of a corporation. Hence we do not think that the cases mainly relied upon by appellant are applicable. For example, in Pollard v. Bailey (20 Wall., 520 [22 L. Ed. 376]), the language of the charter was: "Individual stockholders, having shares in said bank, shall be bound respectively for all the debts of the bank in proportion to their stock holden therein;" and the fact that the provision was for a proportionate liability, and not for a fixed sum, was held to be sufficient to show that such a liability could only be enforced by a proceeding in equity, to which all the creditors and all the stockholders should be made *parties, so as to enable the court to determine the proportionate liability of each stockholder. But in that very case the distinction between a provision for a proportionate liability, and one in which no such feature appears, was expressly recognized by the Chief Justice in delivering the opinion of the court, for he says: "The case is different from what it would be if the charter had provided generally that all stockholders should be individually liable for the payment of the debts." How much more pointed would the distinction be if the charter provided, as in the case now under consideration, that each stockholder should be severally as well as jointly liable to the creditors for ten per cent. (a fixed and definite sum) of the par value of the shares held by him at the time the demand of the creditor was created; provided such demand was payable within a year.

So in Terry v. Tulman (92 U. S., 156 [23 L. Ed. 537]), the provision of the charter was for a proportionate liability, and the remarks just made will dispose of that case. But, in addition to this, it may be observed that the point was not raised in Terry v. Tulman; but the justice who delivered the opinion of the court simply remarked that under the case of Pollard v. Bailey, supra, the proper proceeding was in equity. In Hornor v. Henning (93 U. S., 228 [23 L. Ed. 879]), the provision of the charter was that "if the indebtedness of any company organized under this act shall at any time exceed the amount of its capital stock, the trustees of such company assenting thereto, shall be personally and individually liable for such excess to the creditors of the company." So that there the liability was not for any fixed and definite sum, but for whatever amount the debts might be found to exceed the capital stock; and it was held that the true construction of the act was that the trustees who assented to such an increase of indebtedness beyond the amount of the capital stock were to be held guilty of a breach of trust, for which they were accountable to the creditors. Of course, such a liability could only be enforced by a proceeding in equity, and the case was again distinguished from those cases in which it had been held that an action at law might be maintained against a single stockholder by a single creditor; for there the liability of the stockholder, under the statute, is several and is limited to the amount of his stock, a fixed sum easily ascertained. It is very manifest, therefore, that the case of Hornor v. Henning is not applicable to the case now under consideration.

In Stone v. Chisolm (413 U. S., 302 [5 Sup. Ct. 497, 28 L. Ed. 991]), the provision of the charter was as follows: "The total amount of debts which such corporation shall at any time owe shall not exceed the amount of its capital stock actually paid in; and in case of excess, the directors, in whose administration it shall happen, shall be personally liable for the same, both to the contractor or contractors and to the corporation." The question was whether under this charter a single creditor could maintain an action at law against one or more directors, or whether such creditor must proceed by a creditor's bill in equity. The court held that the case could not be distinguished from Hornor v. Henning, and that the proper proceeding was in equity. We do not see, therefore, how the case of Stone v. Chisolm can be regarded as sustaining the view contended for by appellant.

On the other hand, the case of Flash v. Conn (109 U. S., 371 [3 Sup. Ct. 263, 27 L. Ed. 966]), cited by the counsel for respondents, seems to us more in point. The language of the charter there brought under review was as follows: "All the stockholders of every company incorporated under this act shall be severally, individually, liable to the creditors of the company in which they are stockholders, to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by them respectively, for all debts and contracts made by such company, until the whole amount of capital stock fixed and limited by such company shall have been paid in, and a certificate thereof shall have been made and recorded as prescribed in the following section." Now, although this language is not so strong as that used in the charter now under consideration, yet the court held that a single creditor could, under that charter, maintain an action at law against a single stockholder.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Woods uses this language: "Lastly, it is objected that the declaration sets out a case which should have been prosecuted in equity, and not at law. There is no ground for this objection to rest on. In the cases of Pollard v. Bailey, 20 Wall., 520 [22 L. Ed. 376]; Terry v. Tulman, 92 U. S., 156 [23 L. Ed. 537], to which we are referred in its support, the liability of the stockholders was in proportion to the stock held by them. Each stockholder was, therefore, only liable for his proportion of the debts. This proportion could only be ascertained upon an account of the debts and stock, and a pro rata distribution of the indebtedness among the several stockholders. This the court held could only be done by a suit in equity. But in this case the statute makes every stockholder individually liable for the debts of the company for an amount equal to the amount of his stock. This liability is fixed, and does not depend on the liability of other stockholders. There is no necessity for bringing in other stockholders or creditors. Any creditor who has recovered judgment against the company and sued out an execution thereon, which has been returned unsatisfied, may sue any stockholder, and no other creditor can."

It seems to us that the intention of the legislature, as derived from the language used in the charter now under review, was to protect the interest of creditors, and not stockholders, of the corporation, by affording the former a cheap and expeditious mode of enforcing the payment of their debts, thus ensuring, as far as practicable, the utmost good faith and the most prudent management on the part of those interested in corporations which, by virtue of associated capital, energy, and brains, necessarily acquire large advantages over the individual citizen. If the liability secured by this act could only be enforced by a proceeding in equity, oftentimes tedious and expensive, it would amount to a practical denial of the security intended to be afforded, in many cases, for creditors holding small demands would be deterred, by the expense and delay which they would have to encounter, from availing themselves of the remedy provided. We think, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit Judge in holding that an action at law could be maintained in this case.

The second question being a question of fact, and this being an action at law, is of course concluded by the finding of the Circuit Judge. We may add, however, that we do not see how Judge Pressley could have reached any other conclusion. We suppose there can be no doubt that in any view of the testimony, an action could have been brought by W. P. Hall & Co. at any time within a year, to recover payment of the debt due them by *the Phosphate Company, for it is conceded on all hands that no definite credit was given for any definite time; and if so, it must necessarily follow that the debt was payable within a year, for certainly no action could be maintained to recover payment of a debt until the same had become payable.

As to the third question presented by the grounds of appeal, we do not see how a doubt can be entertained. The provision in the charter is in favor of all creditors without distinction, and, therefore, if an officer or agent of a corporation is capable of becoming its creditor, we see no reason why the plaintiffs may not avail themselves of this provision of the charter, even though they may have been officers or agents of the company. That an officer or agent of a corporation may become its creditor, is conclusively shown by the following cases: Railroad Company v. Claghorn, Speers Eq. 545; Farrow v. Bivings, 13 Rich. Eq., 25; Albright v. Town Council, 9 Rich., 399; Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S., 587 [23 L. Ed. 328]. It is true, as is said in the case last cited, that a contract made by an officer of a corporation with it, is like the dealings of one occupying a fiduciary relation with the subject of his trust or agency, subject to the jealous scrutiny of the court to see that fair dealing has been observed; yet when such a contract is not open to any imputation of fraud or want of conscientious fairness, it stands as any other contract with a stranger. The case of Wardell v. Railroad Company, (103 U. S., 651 [26 L. Ed. 509]), relied on by appellant's counsel, presented a clear case of fraud on the part of the directors of the company, and therefore the contract was set aside.

We have not deemed it necessary to inquire whether a stockholder or member of a corporation can avail himself of the remedy provided by the charter in this case against the other stockholders, for the evidence shows that the firm of W. P. Hall & Co. was not a stockholder in the company. The fact that all the individuals composing the firm of W. P. Hall & Co. were stockholders cannot alter the case. In law the firm is a distinct person, different from the individuals composing it, with different rights, privileges, and liabilities, and must not be confounded with them. But even if the firm had been a stockholder, it would seem from the case of Farrow v. Bivings, above cited, *that it might still enforce this liability against the other stockholders.

The only remaining inquiry is, whether the defendant can be made to pay more than has been accepted, by the creditor, from the other stockholders by way of compromise. We do not think that anything can be plainer than that where a creditor offers a compromise which has been rejected, he is remitted to his original legal rights, especially when, as in this case, the offer is accompanied with a notice that if it is not accepted, the creditor will claim his full legal rights. The fact that the creditor has chosen to accept from others only a portion of their liability in full satisfaction of his demand against them, works no loss or injury to the defendant, for the evidence shows that even if the other stockholders had paid the full amount of their liability as fixed by the statute, there would still be a balance due to the plaintiffs largely in excess of the amount now claimed from the defendant as his liability under the express terms of the statute. So that whether the other stockholders have paid all or none of the liability imposed upon them, is a question which does not concern the defendant, but is a matter entirely between the plaintiffs and the other stockholders. If it had appeared that, by reason of the acceptance by the creditors from the other stockholders of only one-half of their liability, the amount necessary to be paid the plaintiffs by the defendant had been increased, then, perhaps, a different view might have been taken; but as this did not appear, it is not necessary for us to consider the case in that aspect.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Pleading ⚡369.]

An action for partition of land among the remaindermen in fee, after the death of the life tenant, and for an account and distribution of the estate of such life tenant, improperly joins two causes of action; and the Circuit Judge did not err in requiring the plaintiff to elect between the two.

Before Pressley and Cothran, JJ., Newberry, November, 1884, and February, 1885.

The order of Judge Pressley involved in this appeal is stated in the opinion of this court. Judge Cothran's decree was as follows:

The complaint of the plaintiff, the grandniece of the testator, John Paysinger, demands partition of the tract of land devised to her mother for life, the plaintiff claiming as a tenant in common with her uncle and aunts the share of the land to which her father, Martin, would clearly have been entitled if he had survived his mother, Mary Christina Mills. The clause of the will of John Paysinger to be construed is as follows: * * * Two of the five children of Christina, who were living at the time of the making of John Paysinger's will, and at the time of her death, have since died, one of whom, Martin, was the plaintiff's father.

If we were at liberty to interpolate the familiar expression, "the child or children of any child dying in the life-time of the mother (the life tenant) to take the share the parent would have been entitled to," &c., the claim of the plaintiff here could be sustained; but in the very teeth of the testator's expression—"and who may then be living," "the legal title (then) to vest in said surviving children," it would be pragmatism and unwarrantable to do so. Nor do I know of any technical and arbitrary rule of construction which would require the court to do such violence to the plain import of the words used by the testator. Authorities almost innumerable might be cited, but I am not familiar with a single one that would sustain the plaintiff's claim. Bannister v. Bull (16 S. C., 227), is one of the latest in which the term children used in a devise as here has been construed. It seems to me to be conclusive of this case.

The estate given to Mrs. Christina Mills was not conditional, *it was an estate for life, the title to remain until her death in the executors, per formam doni—proprio vigore, "without any act on the part of my executors," "the title was to vest in said surviving children." I do not see how the action can be maintained. It follows, therefore, that the complaint must be dismissed. And it is so ordered and adjudged, with leave to the defendants to enter up judgment and issue execution against the plaintiff for the costs.

Mr. M. A. Carlisle, for appellant.

Mr. Y. J. Pope, contra.

October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. John Paysinger died in 1844, leaving a will, by which he provided as follows: "I wish my executors to hold the legal title (which is hereby vested in them) to the tract of land on which my sister, Christina Mills, lives, purchased from Moses Riley, to the sole and separate use of my said sister during her life, and at her death to the use of all her five children, and those she may hereafter have, and who may be then living, in fee simple, the legal title to vest in said surviving children, without any act on the part of my executors," &c. At the time the will was written, and also at the death of the testator, Christina Mills had five children, but in 1848 one of them, Martin Paysinger, died, leaving a widow and one child, Mary J. Shanks. The life tenant, Christina Mills, died in 1881, leaving only three surviving children, Archy B. Mills, Mary Nichols, and Juliana Taylor, but one grandchild, Mary J. Shanks, daughter of Martin, the predeceased son, who instituted this action for the double purpose of requiring the executors of the will of Christina Mills to account for her estate, and also to partition the tract of land given as aforesaid by the will of John Paysinger to the said Christina for life with limitation over; claiming that, although her father, Martin, died during the life of the said Christina, she is entitled as tenant in common with her surviving uncle and aunts to the share her father, Martin, would have been entitled to, had he survived Christina, the life tenant.

*The "surviving children" claimed that the account of the estate of Christina was in no way connected with the right of partition as to the land, which was purely a question under the will of John Paysinger, and therefore demurred upon the ground that the two causes of action were improperly united. Judge Pressley held with the defendants, and sustained the demurrer, but gave the plaintiff permission to elect which cause of action she would proceed upon. She elected to proceed for partition of the land, and the complaint was dismissed as to the claim for account. The plaintiff excepted, and the case proceeded for partition. Afterwards the cause for partition came on for a hearing before Judge Cothran, who dismissed the complaint.

The plaintiff appeals to this court, both from Judge Pressley's order sustaining the demurrer and requiring the plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action she would proceed: and also from Judge Cothran's decree dismissing the complaint: "I. Because Judge Pressley erred in sustaining defendants' demurrer, and compelling the plaintiff thereby to elect the branch of the case yet to be determined. II. Because Judge Cothran erred in dismissing the plaintiff's complaint. III. Because the judge erred in construing the will of John Paysinger to mean only those children of Christina Mills who should be living at her death. IV. Because the judge erred in construing that the will gave to Christina Mills not a conditional estate, but an estate for life, the title to remain until her death in the executors, and that the title was to vest in the surviving children, to the exclusion of the grandchildren of Christina Mills, who survived her grandparent. V. Because the judge erred in not holding that, under the will, the plaintiff, through her father, Martin, with the defendants, took a vested remainder in the land described in the will," &c.

First, as to the demurrer. The argument of the appellant's counsel proceeds on the assumption that the land belonged to Christina in fee, and after her death descended to her heirs as such. If this were true, the argument would be unanswerable, but the fact is otherwise. Christina had only a life estate in the land, and that of course ended at her death. It was not a case for the application of the rule in Shelley's case. None of the parties held as the heirs of Christina, but, on the contrary, as devisees under the will of John Paysinger; and the construction of his will had no such connection with the existence or nonexistence of personal estate of Christina as to authorize a union of the two causes of action. We see no error on the part of Judge Pressley in sustaining the demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action.

Second. The plaintiff's claim for partition of the land must be determined by the construction of the will of John Paysinger. What did the testator mean by the words: "And at her death (Christina) to the use of all her five children, and those she may hereafter have and who may be then living, in fee," &c.? Although the children of Christina living at the time the will was executed were numbered (5), they were not named or described, and those were added who might be afterwards born; so that we take it this was a limitation over to a particular class of persons at a particular time. In this view the rule is, that while any of the class remain, they take the whole interest, excluding the representatives of any of the class who may have died before the time indicated for distribution. Clark v. Clark, 19 S. C., 350. Besides, ordinarily, the word "children" means the immediate offspring, and does not include "grandchildren." Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C., 220, and authorities there cited.

But in addition to these general rules of construction, the devise over in this case, by its express terms, was to take effect at the time of the death of Christina, and was limited to her children "who may be then living, the legal title to vest in said surviving children without any act on the part of the executors," &c.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgments of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. 362

GOURDIN v. TRENHOLM.

Ex parte FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Guaranty ⇨106.]

Two co-guarantors on a number of bonds fixed by agreement as between themselves the amount of their relative liabilities, and bound themselves to pay each to the other any sum that might be paid by either *in excess of his portion, and interchangeably executed mortgages to secure the fulfillment of this agreement. Held, that one of these guarantors had no right of action against the other until his payments exceeded the portion so assumed by him, and then only for the amount of such excess.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 116; Dec. Dig. ⇨106.]

[2. Guaranty ⇨79½; Judgment ⇨735.]

One of these guarantors having, after maturity, endorsed upon the bonds taken up by his co-guarantor (but to an amount less than his proportion) an acknowledgment that he (the endorser) was liable for a proportionate part thereof, and that his mortgage was a security therefor, such acknowledgment was without consideration and not binding, and certainly could not affect the rights of his then existing creditors. This point was not decided nor even considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in construing this agreement in Hampton v. Phipps, 108 U. S., 260 [2 Sup. Ct. 622, 27 L. Ed. 719].

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 94; Dec. Dig. ⇨79½; Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1263; Dec. Dig. ⇨735.]

[3. Mortgages ⇨27.]

As a consideration is necessary to the validity of a contract, it follows that an equitable mortgage based upon an agreement without consideration cannot be set up—certainly not to the prejudice of creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 45–53, 55; Dec. Dig. ⇨27.]

[4. Principal and Surety ⇨194.]

A surety cannot enforce contribution from his co-surety until the common debt, for which they are both liable, has been fully paid or satisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 619; Dec. Dig. ⇨194.]

[5. Bonds ⇨74.]

These bonds, if ever negotiable, lost this quality after maturity; and being paid by one of these guarantors and then reissued by him, this reissue amounted only to an assignment of his rights thereunder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. ⇨74.]

6. Question reserved, whether a surety who pays a bond debt in the lifetime of his co-surety, ranks as a specialty creditor in claiming contribution from the estate of the deceased co-surety.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson concurred in the result.

Before Cochran, J., Charleston, November, 1885.

The facts of this case are stated in the opinion. The report of Master Sass upon these facts was as follows:

The present claim is made on behalf of the holders of the B bonds, bearing the special endorsement, to be paid ratably from the fund of $11,535.60, above stated to be the product of the sale of the mortgaged property of Welsman, in preference to the holders of other B bonds, likewise guaranteed by Welsman & Trenholm, but not bearing the same endorsement. The claim for this preference is resisted by the holders of the unendorsed B bonds, and it is upon this question that I have now to pass.

It is urged on behalf of the holders of unendorsed B bonds, that the special endorsement itself shows that Mr. Welsman was under a misapprehension as to his liability, when he made the endorsement; that as a matter of fact he was not liable, as therein stated, for 31-71 of each bond, but for $310,000 of the whole debt of $710,000; and that the liability of 31-71 applied to another class of indebtedness, as will be seen by reference to the printed memorandum of agreement in evidence; that under said agreement Welsman was not bound to contribute anything to any sums that Trenholm might pay, until Trenholm had paid, and over paid, the amount of $400,000 for which he (Mr. Trenholm) was liable. And it is contended that this was such a misapprehension and mistake as will be regarded in equity as a ground for relief.

With this view I cannot agree. It must be observed that the fraction of 31-71 exactly expresses the proportion which $310,000 bears to the whole debt of $710,000, and there is therefore no necessity to suppose, because of the use of that fraction, that any confusion existed in Welsman's mind between his two liabilities upon the two classes of bonds. Granting the intention to apply the proportionate liability to each bond as stated in the endorsement, the fraction used is the proper fraction to express it. It will not be contended that Welsman's liability for the $310,000 was subsequent to that of Trenholm for the $400,000. They both subsisted together, and the proportion applied practically to each bond as fully as it did to the whole sum, if the parties chose so to apply it. I cannot therefore hold that Mr. Welsman "did not know what he was doing," and was inops consilii when he placed this endorsement upon these bonds. It seems to me from an examination of the whole matter, that he intended to do what the plain language of the endorsement implies, to acknowledge his liability to Mr. Trenholm for 31-71 of each bond bearing the endorsement, and to declare Mr. Trenholm entitled pro tanto to the security of the general mortgage.

But whatever was Mr. Welsman's intention, the mortgages in question have received judicial construction from the highest court in the land, and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the condition of the mortgages has not been broken, and that neither surety can claim indemnity against the other for an overpayment. As the bearing of this endorsement upon the question of the mortgages was clearly stated in the report of special master Lord as giving a practical construction of the contract by the parties themselves, and as this construction has been overruled by the decree of the Supreme Court reversing the report and decree below, I must hold the question to be res adjudicata, and it becomes necessary therefore to interpret the endorsement conformably with and in the light of the decision of the Supreme Court.

There is but one method by which the two can be reconciled. It must be taken for granted that the security of the mortgage spoken of in the endorsement was to take effect only when the condition of the mortgage should be broken, that is to say, when in the course of this process of redeeming the bonds one by one, the point should be reached at which Mr. Trenholm should have redeemed more than his proportion of the joint debt. This point never having been reached, the condition of the mortgage has never been broken, and Mr. Trenholm's right to enforce its security never took effect. So regarded, the endorsement becomes simply an acknowledgment by Welsman to Trenholm that the former's liability upon the bond had been paid by the latter.

Such being, then, the purpose and effect of the endorsement, with what rights did it clothe Mr. Trenholm? Plainly with the rights only of a simple contract creditor. Trenholm and Welsman were co-sureties upon the B bonds. They were jointly and severally liable for the payment of the whole issue. As between themselves they might agree to divide their liability in whatever proportions they pleased, but to the bondholders they were jointly and severally liable. Now, if one of two co-sureties pays the surety in default his proportion of the debt, but such claim ranks only as a simple contract debt. "A surety paying a bond debt will be treated in marshalling assets as a mere simple contract creditor." Story Eq. Jur., § 499 (d), and cases quoted. In Bank v. Adger, 2 Hill Eq. 266, Judge O'Neill says: "It was an entire debt due by all or either of the obligors; payment of it by one of the co-sureties entitled him to contribution as for so much money paid, laid out, and expended, and the debt thus due to him by his co-surety is a mere simple contract. This was ruled by Lord Chancellor Eldon in Copps v. Middleton, 1 Turn. & R., 224."

*Mr. Trenholm could not recover upon the bond against Mr. Welsman's estate, for he had paid the bond, and in the language of Lord Eldon, "it is gone and cannot be set up." Nor can the mortgage avail him, for it has been declared by the highest authority to be inoperative and unenforceable. He must rank, therefore, as a simple contract creditor, and his assigns can have no higher right than he himself had. The contention of the endorsed bondholders that they are bona fide holders of negotiable securities for value without notice cannot be sustained. The endorsement was placed upon the bonds after maturity, and the holders took them subject to all the equities between the parties. The very terms of the endorsement showed that the bond had been paid by Mr. Trenholm and had been re-issued as his individual liability. How, therefore, could such a bond be entitled to priority of payment out of the estate of the original guarantor over other bonds of equal date and rank which had not been paid? This court is administering the assets of Mr. Welsman's estate among his creditors. I cannot see how the specialty creditors, holders of the original issue of B bonds, guaranteed by Mr. Welsman, can be postponed in such administration to the holders of certain others of the same bonds through and by means of any act of such guarantor subsequent to the original guarantee.

Even if the endorsement was intended to have the effect of an equitable mortgage, as has been contended, it could not avail as against the bondholders. The endorsement of a negotiable security after it is due and dishonored, is a new and independent contract between the immediate parties. The holders of these endorsed bonds stand here, by their own claim, as Mr. Trenholm's assigns, and they can urge no higher claim than could have been set up by Mr. Trenholm himself. I hold, therefore, that the bonds bearing the special endorsement are not entitled to any preference or priority over the other B bonds proved in this case. And I so report.

Upon exceptions to this report, his honor filed the following decree:

After careful consideration of the pleadings in this case, the report of the master, the exceptions thereto, and the exhaustive *arguments of counsel, I am constrained to adopt the conclusions of the master as enunciated in his very able report.

I do not agree altogether with him in the view which he has taken of the nature and effect of the special endorsements made by James T. Welsman upon the bonds held and produced by the intervenors. These endorsements seem to me to be more in the nature of a memorandum for future and convenient use by Mr. George A. Trenholm, after he should have consummated the gigantic and impracticable scheme upon which he had entered, of paying off the indebtedness of $710,000, which he was able only partly to accomplish. But without elaborating my views upon this point, which would in the end consist with the master's conclusions in the main issue, I deem it sufficient and altogether consistent with my own convictions, to affirm his report and to make the same the judgment of this court. And it is so ordered and adjudged.

From this decree the First National Bank of Charleston and the South Carolina Loan and Trust Company appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because it is error of the presiding judge to confirm the report of the master, and make it the judgment of the court; and this because of matters outside of the case made in the pleadings; and which are not legally admissible in the case of a contract, expressed in terms clear and without ambiguity; and those terms being the highest evidence of the intention of James T. Welsman in the contract so made, as also of the proper interpretation of it.

2. Because the master in his report erred, and the presiding judge, in confirming that report, also erred, in holding that this case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hampton, Adm'r, et al. v. Phipps, when the decision in that case in no manner related to the special contract, made in the endorsement of James T. Welsman on the bonds now before the court; nor was the same referred to in the record or in the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

3. Because the terms in that endorsement were clear, positive, and freed from all ambiguity; and with the acknowledgment by James T. Welsman of his indebtedness to George A. Trenholm, and his plainly expressed intention to secure the payment of that *indebtedness, when he designated the security he then gave to make certain the payment of that indebtedness; and in such terms that he and the holder of the bond plainly understood what was that security.

4. Because by the conditions, subject to which only, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, the mortgages between George A. Trenholm and James T. Welsman could be enforced by the creditors of either against the other, under the principle of subrogation; and the bankruptcy of George A. Trenholm and James T. Welsman, which made the performance of such conditions impossible; it then became competent for either of these parties, by any other declaration, to subject the property of either to such other charges as the said George A. Trenholm or James T. Welsman chose to make. And this right was exercised by James T. Welsman in the endorsement he made on these particular bonds.

5. Because in the exercise of the power so belonging to the said James T. Welsman, he did give to the First National Bank of Charleston, and other holders of bonds with the like endorsement, in that endorsement a plain acknowledgment of indebtedness and to secure that indebtedness; and did for this purpose sufficiently and clearly designate the security so given.

6. Because the said James T. Welsman did not, during his lifetime in any manner, question or express a wish that the endorsement on these bonds should be construed otherwise and enforced than according to the plain intent and meaning of the terms used in such endorsement.

7. Because this endorsement on a bond, of which the holder is lawfully and for value in possession, carried with it to such holder all the security attached to or connected with the said bond; and intended and accepted as having added value given to the bond because of such security.

8. Because in this case the holders of bonds with such endorsement have all the rights, and are entitled to all the remedies, which in equity are applied in the cases of an equitable mortgage.

9. Because the presiding judge, in confirming the report of the master, has erred in his conclusion of law, that the holders of these bonds rank only as simple contract creditors; whereas the rule in this State is distinctly the reverse of that stated by the master, and erroneously accepted by the presiding judge as the law in this State.

10. Because the decree in this case should be, that the holders of the bonds, with the special endorsement thereon, are entitled to be paid out of the fund in court, the same being the proceeds of the sales of the real estate referred to in that endorsement as the security for the payment of these bonds.

The respondents submitted the following additional grounds in support of the Circuit decree:

1. That the said master should have found that Welsman was not bound to contribute anything to any sums that Trenholm might pay, until Trenholm had paid and overpaid the amount of four hundred thousand dollars, for which he (Mr. Trenholm) was liable.

2. That the said master should have found that the endorsement stating that Mr. Welsman was so liable, made by him on certain bonds which had been paid by Mr. Trenholm, was made under a clear mistake and misapprehension on the part of Mr. Welsman, against which equity will relieve the creditors of Welsman.

3. That the said master erred in holding that there is no necessity to suppose, because of the use of the fraction 31-71, that any confusion existed in Welsman's mind between his two liabilities upon the two classes of bonds.

4. That the master erred in holding that the proportion applied practically to each bond as fully as it did to the whole sum, if the parties chose to so apply it, and that it was so applied.

5. That the master erred in holding that endorsement created any liability on the part of Mr. Welsman to Mr. Trenholm.

6. That the master erred in holding that the bonds paid by Mr. Trenholm had been reissued by him or as his individual liability.

*October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. For the purpose of settling with the creditors of John Fraser & Co. and Fraser, Trenholm & Co., two of the partners in those houses, to wit, W. L. Trenholm and Theodore D. Wagner, executed a number of bonds, aggregating in the whole the sum of seven hundred and ten thousand dollars, by which they bound themselves, jointly and severally, to pay to James Robb and Charles T. Lowndes, as trustees, or the survivor of them, their assigns or the assigns of the survivor, the amount named in each of said bonds, at the several dates named therein, the last of said dates being the first day of January, 1873. Upon these bonds George A. Trenholm and James T. Welsman, by their endorsement under their hands and seals, guaranteed the payment thereof. These bonds were known and designated as B bonds, and the following endorsement was placed thereon by the trustees above named, viz.: "The within bond being exchanged for bills and claims under the agreement herein referred to, is assigned, set over, and transferred, and payment directed to be made to the holder hereof." To make good an unexpected deficiency in the assets of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., another lot of bonds, designated as C bonds, were issued by George A. Trenholm and James T. Welsman, which, however, are not involved in this case.

On May 3, 1869, George A. Trenholm and James T. Welsman entered into a written agreement, a copy of which is set out in the record, by which it is declared that the said parties "did, between themselves, agree that the limit and extent of the amounts for which each of them would respectively be liable should be as follows, that is to say, of the said sum of seven hundred and ten thousand dollars (the B bonds), that the said

George A. Trenholm should be liable for the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and the said James T. Welsman for the sum of three hundred and ten thousand dollars, and that in the obligation to be given under the second article of the said memorandum of final settlement of the sixteenth November, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight (the C bonds), the said George A. Trenholm should be liable for forty of seventy-one parts thereof, and the said James T. Welsman should be liable for thirty-one of seventy-one parts thereof, * * with the clear understanding and agreement that each would be respectively liable to the other for the full discharge of the said sum and the said proportion by them respectively undertaken, and that each would save and keep harmless and indemnified the other from all claim, demand, or damage for or by reason of the said guaranty and endorsement, and of such obligation, beyond the amount or proportion by each respectively assumed as hereinbefore stated."

It is further declared in the said agreement that the foregoing "does fully and truly recite and set forth the amounts and proportions for which each as to the other is respectively liable, because of the said guaranty and endorsement, and the said obligation by them made and undertaken, and that each is as to the other bound fully to discharge and satisfy such amount and such proportion as is hereinbefore recited and set forth as so undertaken by each as to the amount and proportion for which he is liable and that each will save and keep harmless and indemnified the other from all demand and damage for or by reason of the amount or proportion so undertaken by him." The agreement also provided that each should execute to the other a mortgage for his more perfect indemnity. In pursuance thereof the said parties did, on the same day, to wit, May 3, 1869, execute each to the other a mortgage to secure the performance of the covenants contained in said agreement.

In January, 1873, after the maturity of the B bonds, James T. Welsman signed the following endorsement, printed on certain of those bonds, to wit: "The proportion of the within bond for which the within bound James T. Welsman is liable, that is to say, thirty-one of seventy-one parts thereof, having been paid by George A. Trenholm, for that sum, with interest, James T. Welsman is indebted to George A. Trenholm, and the mortgage from James T. Welsman to George A. Trenholm, bearing date May 3d, A. D. 1869, and recorded in the mesne conveyance office, Charleston County, in book H., No. 15, page 571, is acknowledged by James T. Welsman to be security for the same to the said George A. Trenholm or his assigns."

George A. Trenholm died on November 17, 1876, without ever having paid his proportion of the B bonds, and it is conceded that his estate is insolvent and utterly unable to pay such proportion. James T. Welsman died July 17, 1877, without ever having paid his proportion of the B bonds, and it is likewise conceded that his estate is utterly insolvent and will never be able to pay his proportion of said bonds.

Sometime in 1878, certain holders of bonds guaranteed by Trenholm and Welsman, filed a creditors' bill in the Circuit Court of the United States, claiming the benefit of the mortgages of May 3, 1869, given by Trenholm and Welsman, each to the other. This claim was resisted by Hampton, a judgment creditor of both Trenholm and Welsman, whose judgment was junior in date to said mortgages, and by the executor of James Welsman, the father of James T. Welsman, who held a mortgage executed in 1871, upon some of the property embraced in the mortgage of Trenholm to Welsman, dated in May, 1869. The Circuit Court sustained the claim of the bondholders and ordered a sale of the property covered by the mortgages. This decree was, however, reversed by the Supreme Court (see Hampton v. Phipps, 108 U. S., 260 [2 Sup. Ct. 622, 27 L. Ed. 719]), and under that decision the Circuit Court of the United States ordered the balance of the funds in the hands of the referee, arising from the sales of the property of Welsman embraced in the mortgage to Trenholm, to be transferred to the State court, there to be applied in due course of administration. This balance, amounting to something over eleven thousand dollars, is now in the hands of the master, and constitutes the fund over which the present controversy has arisen.

The appellants, as holders of certain of the B bonds, bearing the endorsement placed upon them by Welsman, a copy of which is hereinbefore set out, claim that they have a prior lien upon the fund in controversy by reason of such endorsement, and this claim is resisted by the holders of B bonds upon which there is no such endorsement. The master, to whom the issues were referred, for the reasons stated in his report, which is set out in the record, disallowed the claim of the appellants and held that they could only claim as simple contract creditors of the estate of Welsman. The Circuit Judge, while not endorsing all the reasoning of the master, overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report. From this judgment the holders of the bonds bearing the Welsman endorsement appeal upon the several grounds set out in the "Case," and the unendorsed bondholders, according to the proper practice, give notice that they will undertake to sustain the judgment confirming the master's report, upon grounds other than those upon which the master bases his conclusion.

We do not propose to consider these grounds seriatim, but shall confine ourselves to the consideration of those questions which arise upon the record and are material to a proper decision of the case. We may say, however, in the outset, that we do not agree with the master in holding that the question is res adjudicata by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. That court simply held that under the case as presented to it, the right of subrogation set up by the bondholders could not arise, because by a proper construction of the terms of the mortgages of May 3, 1869, they were only intended to indemnify the said parties for any excess beyond the sum or proportion which each had assumed to pay, and as it was conceded that neither had paid nor could pay anything in excess of the sum or proportion he had assumed, no liability from one to the other had arisen or could arise, and hence there was nothing upon which either could base a claim for indemnity, and therefore nothing upon which either mortgage could be rendered operative. As was said by the court: "Unless one of them had been compelled to pay, and had in fact paid, an excess beyond his agreed share of the debt, there could have been no breach of the conditions of the mortgage, and consequently no right to a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises. * * * The mortgages were not created for the security of the principal debt, but as a security for a debt possibly to arise from one surety to the other;" and as under the conceded facts of that case such possible debt had not then arisen and could not afterwards arise, inasmuch as neither party had paid or could pay anything in excess of his share, the conclusion necessarily followed that there was no debt and no liability from one to the other, and therefore nothing to support either mortgage. As the court in that case well said: "There is, therefore, no right to the subrogation insisted on, *because there is nothing to which it can apply." In this view we entirely concur, but in that case the question of the effect of the Welsman endorsement, upon which the appellants now rely, does not seem to have been raised, and no allusion seems to have been made to it in the opinion of the court.

Indeed, we do not see how it would have been pertinent to the question which the Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to determine. As we understand it, the controversy there was between the B bondholders as a class, and certain lien creditors, whose liens arose subsequent to the date of the mortgages of May 3, 1869, but prior to January, 1873, when the Welsman endorsement was placed upon certain of the B bonds, under which appellants now set up their claim. Hence, in that controversy, it was not necessary or important to determine the effect of the Welsman endorsement; for, even giving it the full effect now claimed for it by the appellants, it certainly could not override the previous liens created by Hampton's judgment, which was recovered on June 19, 1869, or the mortgage to the elder Welsman, executed June 13, 1871. We do not think, therefore, that the question presented in this case can be regarded as res adjudicata by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Hampton v. Phipps, supra. It certainly was not in terms decided or even alluded to in the opinion of the court, and according to our view it was not even pertinent to the question there raised.

A good deal has been said as to what were the intentions of Welsman when he signed the endorsement on the bonds in question, and as to whether he was not then under a mistake as to his liability to his co-guarantor or co-surety, Trenholm, for that was really the true relation in which these parties stood to each other; but according to the view which we take of the case it will not be important to determine these questions. Assuming, then, for the purposes of this inquiry, that Welsman when he signed the endorsement intended precisely what the words there used import, and that his purpose was to admit an indebtedness to Trenholm to an amount represented by a specified fractional part of the bond, and to acknowledge that such indebtedness was secured by the mortgage, we propose to consider what are the rights of the *parties. There can be no doubt that Trenholm and Welsman, practically as co-sureties on the bonds, were each liable to the lawful holders thereof for the full amount of the bonds; but, in the absence of any special agreement between themselves, they would each be liable, as between themselves, for only one-half of the full amount. Hence if either one of them paid the full amount of the bonds, he would have a valid claim against the other for one-half of the amount so paid.

But it is equally true that this relative liability, as between themselves, might be fixed by special agreement at a different proportion from one-half. It is an undoubted fact in this case that these parties did exercise this right, and did by special agreement in writing and under seal, fix their relative liability each to the other, and it is a circumstance not without significance, that in doing so they fixed their relative liability so far as the B bonds were concerned (the ones out of which this controversy arises), at specified sums of money, and not as in case of the C bonds at fractional parts of the whole debt. It seems to us that the true import and meaning of this agreement, a copy of which is set out in the record, is that, while, of course, Trenholm and Welsman were each liable to the bondholders for the full amount thereof, yet as between themselves they had divided the debt into two portions—one of four hundred thousand dollars, for which Trenholm alone was responsible, and the other of three hundred and ten thousand dollars, for which Welsman alone was responsible. In other words, that as between these parties there were two debts—one of $400,000, and the other of $310,000, the former due by Trenholm and the latter by Welsman, and that until one paid some portion of the liability of the other, he could have no claim upon the other.

This seems to us the necessary construction of the words used by the parties in the agreement, for the liability of each to the other is expressly declared to be a liability for any amount "beyond the amount" which each had respectively assumed to pay. It is quite clear, therefore, that under the terms of this agreement, Trenholm could have no claim whatever against Welsman until he had paid something in excess of four hundred thousand dollars, and then only for such excess, and as it is conceded that *he never did pay as much as $400,000, it is quite clear that Welsman never was under any legal, or even moral, obligation to pay Trenholm anything by reason of their co-suretyship on the B bonds under the express terms of the agreement defining their relations in reference to that matter.

This being so, even if the endorsement placed upon certain of these bonds by Welsman should be construed as an agreement to pay to Trenholm thirty-one of seventy-one parts of each bond upon which it was placed, it follows that there was no consideration whatever for such agreement; there was no antecedent liability which could constitute such consideration, and it is not pretended that any consideration passed at the time the endorsement was placed upon the bonds, and it not being under seal, it must be regarded as a mere nudum pactum. It cannot be said that Trenholm's right to call on his co-surety, Welsman, for contribution constituted a sufficient consideration for the agreement contained in the endorsement, because no such right did then or has ever existed.

In 3 Pomeroy Equity Jurisprudence, section 1418, this right of contribution between co-sureties is defined as follows: "Where there are two or more sureties for the same principal debtor, and for the same debt or obligation, whether on the same or on different instruments, and one of them has actually paid or satisfied more than his proportionate share of the debt or obligation (the Italics being ours), he is entitled to a contribution from each and all of his co-sureties in order to reimburse him for the excess paid over his share, and thus to equalize their common burdens. * * * The right, however, may be controlled or modified by express agreement among the co-sureties or debtors." Now, Trenholm, as we have seen, not having paid "more than his proportionate share of the debt or obligation," as fixed by the special agreement of the parties, there is no excess over his share for which he could call on Welsman to reimburse him. The endorsement placed upon certain of the B bonds cannot, therefore, be regarded as anything more than an agreement by Welsman, without any consideration, to pay to Trenholm a certain proportion of each bond so endorsed, and an acknowledgment that the performance of such promise is to be secured by the mortgage of May 3, 1869.

*The want of consideration, if nothing else, would be sufficient to prevent such an agreement from being set up as an equitable mortgage, in derogation of the rights of bona fide creditors. As is said in 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1231: "The theory of equitable liens has its ultimate foundation, therefore, in contracts express or implied;" and as a consideration is necessary to the validity of a contract, it follows that an equitable mortgage based upon an agreement without consideration cannot be set up, certainly not to the prejudice of creditors. Indeed, the Court of Equity will not enforce a voluntary trust, however meritorious the objects of it may be, as long as it is merely "executory, incomplete, imperfect, or promissory." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 997, and 1 Story Eq. Jur., §§ 433, 987. But more than this, Welsman, being in debt at the time, could not, even by a formal mortgage, without any consideration, fix a lien on his property which could take precedence of such debts.

But even if Trenholm had paid more than his proportion of the debt, and thereby acquired the right to call upon his co-surety, Welsman, for contribution, he could not enforce this right to the prejudice of the common creditor. The right of contribution, resting, as it does, upon principles of equity and not upon contract, will not be enforced by a Court of Equity to the injury of the prior and higher rights of the creditor to be paid his debt in full, for which he has a right to look to all the sureties. Hence a surety cannot enforce contribution from his co-surety until the common debt, for which they are both liable, has been fully paid or satisfied in some way. Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Wh. & Tud. Lead. Cas. Eq., *100, and the notes to that case. It seems to us clear, therefore, that in no view of the case could Trenholm, by virtue of the endorsement placed upon certain of the B bonds or otherwise, successfully claim a right to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the property covered by the Welsman mortgage.

And we think it equally clear that the appellants, claiming, as they must do, through Trenholm, as his assignees, can have no higher rights than he had. The appellants certainly cannot claim to be purchasers of negotiable securities; for even assuming that the bonds were made negotiable by the endorsement placed upon *them by the trustees (as to which, however, we do not feel called upon to express any opinion), they acquired possession of them after they became due, and after they had lost their negotiable character, if they ever had any. But, in fact, the appellants never became the purchasers of the bonds as such. When Trenholm paid these bonds, they lost their character as bonds, certainly their negotiability, and by what right he, or his representative after his death, could re-issue them as bonds, we are at a loss to conceive. They were in Trenholm's hand, after payment of them by him, nothing more than evidences of indebtedness to him by the principal obligors and by his co-surety, which, in the strongest view which can be taken for appellants, he could, by virtue of the equitable doctrine of subrogation, set up against them as specialty claims; but they certainly had none of the features of negotiable securities. When, therefore, these bonds were re-issued, as it is said, by Trenholm, or by his representative after his death, it amounted to nothing more than a transfer of such claims—not of the bonds as such—to the persons to whom they were delivered. Assuming, then, for the purposes of this case only, without considering the question that such claims could be and were properly assigned to the appellants, it is manifest that their position is that of assignees of unnegotiable claims, and their rights can be no higher or better than those of their assignor.

From the foregoing views it follows that the appellants, as holders of the papers originally issued as B bonds, which now bear the special endorsement placed upon them by Welsman, have no claim upon the fund in controversy; and as, by the judgment appealed from, they have been practically excluded from any participation therein by being placed in the rank of simple contract creditors, and as the respondents, while not appealing from the judgment below, have given notice that they would ask this court to sustain said judgment upon other grounds than those upon which it was based, one of which was that the special endorsement placed upon the bonds now sought to be set up by appellants, created no liability on the part of Welsman to Trenholm, we feel warranted in simply affirming the judgment. In doing so, however, we do not wish to be understood as endorsing *the proposition that where one of two sureties pays a bond debt, in claiming contribution from the estate of his co-surety he can rank only as a simple contract creditor. Upon that question the authorities in this State, as well as elsewhere, are conflicting, and we prefer to reserve our opinion until a proper case for its decision arises.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, with the reservation above mentioned, be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred in the result.

Before Pressley, J., Barnwell, November, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Elliott & Howe, for appellant.

Mr. A. B. Comer, contra.

October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant corporation before trial justice W. M. Bostick, on September 5, 1885, of which notice was given to the company on September 11. On September 15, the defendant gave notice of appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, upon the ground "that manifest injustice had been done the defendant by the said judgment, and that defendant's fault in not being present at the trial was excusable." The plaintiff, disregarding the appeal, had one of the freight cars of the company levied on to satisfy the judgment, and thereupon the defendant applied to Judge Pressley at chambers to restrain the sale under the levy aforesaid; and as it appeared that an appeal was pending, Judge Pressley ordered the levy released, "and that all proceedings under said judgment and execution be stayed until the appeal therefrom to the Court of Common Pleas shall be heard, the notice in said appeal having been served within the time prescribed by law in such case." From this order the plaintiff gave notice of appeal.

Afterwards at the regular term of the Court of Common Pleas, when the case was reached on the docket, the plaintiff, having previously given notice to that effect, moved to dismiss the appeal upon two grounds: first, that the notice was not served within the time prescribed by law; and second, that the exceptions and grounds of appeal are not sufficiently definite and specific. The judge granted the motion and dismissed the appeal, "because of insufficiency of the notice of appeal." From this order the defendant corporation appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "I. Because his honor erred in holding that the notice of appeal was insufficient. II. Because his honor erred in holding that the notice of appeal was not sufficiently definite. III. Because his honor erred in holding that the notice of appeal should have stated further grounds than 'that manifest injustice had been done defendant, and that defendant's neglect was excusable.' IV. Because his honor erred in holding that affidavits should have been served with said notice of appeal," &c.

There is nothing in the view urged that the matter of the sufficiency of the appeal was, or should have been, "adjudicated" in the application of the defendant to suspend the enforcement of the execution. That application was made at chambers, and the judge could do no more than he did—"stay all proceedings upon *the judgment and execution, until the regular appeal to the Court of Common Pleas could be heard."

The very object of exceptions is to point out the particulars in which the errors of law complained of consist. When, in the case of a judgment rendered by default in a trial justice court, the defendant seeks a new trial upon the ground that his "default was excusable," the act itself which gives the right, expressly declares that, "If the defendant failed to appear before the trial justice, and it is shown by the affidavits served by the appellant or otherwise that manifest injustice has been done, and he satisfactorily excuses his default, the court may, in its discretion, set aside or suspend judgment and order a new trial." &c. Subdivision 1, section 368, of the Code. It was certainly not a compliance with this provision of the law for the appellant simply to state as a ground of appeal "that manifest injustice had been done, and that defendant's default in not being present at the trial was excusable," without stating any of the circumstances which made it "excusable." Such exception gives no fact upon which the discretion of the judge may be exercised. It is really no more than the expression of the opinion of the defendant himself, which would very probably exist in the case of every judgment rendered by default. Besides, if the particular facts had been fully stated, and the Circuit Judge had exercised his discretion and rendered his judgment on the facts, such judgment would not have been appealable to this court, which only corrects errors of law, except in cases in chancery. See LeConte v. Irwin, 19 S. C., 556, and authorities.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, October, 1885.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. L. Wait, for appellant.

Mr. J. H. Heyward, contra.

October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant on April 1, 1885, and, upon the affidavit required in such cases, instituted supplementary proceedings against him on September 23, 1885, in which Judge Wallace ordered that the defendant, Thomas W. Davis, "should appear before S. J. Douthitt, Esq., master for Greenville County, at his office in the city of Greenville, on September 26, instant, to make discovery on oath concerning his property," &c. This order Davis resisted, and gave notice that he would apply to Judge Wallace for an order vacating the aforesaid order in supplementary proceedings, upon the ground that in another case, on the second day of January, 1884, David P. Verner, Esq., was appointed receiver of the property of the said debtor, under supplementary proceedings instituted in a suit by the "Dauntless Manufacturing Company" against him, before the plaintiff, Sparks, had obtained his judgment.

Judge Wallace refused to vacate the order directing the debtor to be examined, holding that "all the conditions prescribed by the code, as precedent to supplementary proceedings, existed in the above entitled action at the time the order sought to be vacated was signed: that appearing, the plaintiff was entitled to the order. The fact that a similar order had been taken in another action by another plaintiff against the same defendant cannot affect the plaintiff's rights, because he was not a party to that action and had no power to intervene in it and examine the defendant or submit other testimony touching his estate and effects. The fact that a receiver having been appointed under *another action, is a bar to the appointment of another receiver in this action, does not destroy the right of the plaintiff here to his statutory method for the discovery of property applicable to his judgment, and which, if discovered, may be administered by the receiver already appointed," &c.

From this order Davis appeals on the following exceptions: "I. Because his honor erred in refusing to vacate the order for supplementary proceedings in this action, when it appeared that a receiver for all of the defendant's property, which could be applied to the payment of his debts, had already been appointed under supplementary proceedings in another action. II. Because when it appeared that supplementary proceedings had been instituted against the defendant in another action and a receiver appointed thereunder, no other order for supplementary proceedings against him should have been made, unless it had appeared in the affidavit therefor that he had acquired property since the date of the receiver's appointment in the former proceeding, which would be applicable to the judgments against him, and the order for the examination in this action should have been dismissed for that reason. III. Because in any event the examination should have been confined to the period of time subsequent to the date of the receiver's appointment in the former proceeding, and his honor erred in deciding that the plaintiff in this action was entitled to an unlimited examination into the defendant's affairs under this proceeding," &c.

Section 312 of the Code provides that "when an execution against property of the judgment debtor * * is returned unsatisfied, the judgment creditor, at any time after such return made, is entitled to an order from a judge of the Circuit Court, requiring such judgment debtor to appear and answer concerning his property before such judge at a time and place specified in the order, within the county to which the execution was issued." (The examination may now be before a referee appointed for that purpose. Section 316.) Section 318 of the Code, after giving the judge power to appoint a receiver of the property of the judgment debtor, provides: "But before the appointment of such receiver, the judge shall ascertain, if practicable, by the oath of the party or otherwise, whether any other supplementary proceedings are pending against the judgment debtor; and if such proceedings are so pending, the plaintiff therein shall have notice to appear before him, and shall likewise have notice of all subsequent proceedings in relation to said receivership. No more than one receiver of the property of a judgment debtor shall be appointed," &c.

It thus appears that the right to institute supplementary proceedings is given to every judgment creditor who can make the required showing, without any limitation or qualification whatever. Each creditor is independent of the others, and entitled for himself to seek his legal remedies. In order, doubtless to secure the regular and orderly administration of the discovered assets or property of the debtor, the appointment of receiver is limited to one. We cannot, however, see that there is any inhibition against a judgment creditor instituting his own proceeding, at least down to the time of the appointment of a receiver, who, when appointed, is required to perform certain duties for all those claiming the remedy of the statute. In the case of Kennesaw Mills Co. v. Walker, 19 S. C., 104, cited by the counsel of the appellant, there were two independent proceedings by different creditors, and the debtor was examined in both cases; but as the time and place and referee were the same in both, they were allowed, as a matter of convenience, to be heard together.

Even after the appointment of a receiver in one case, we find no absolute prohibition against the institution of other supplementary proceedings by a different creditor, only that "notice should be given of all subsequent proceedings in relation to such receivership," &c. Besides, in this case the plaintiff, Sparks, had not obtained his judgment when Mr. Verner was appointed receiver in 1884; and therefore being in no sense a party to the proceeding in which he was appointed, he had no power to intervene in it and examine the defendant, or to submit other testimony touching his property and effects. We do not understand that the order authorizing the plaintiff, Sparks, to examine the defendant, contemplated the appointment of another receiver in his case, and as the Circuit Judge said: "The statute does not seem to provide that this remedy is to be enforced by one judgment creditor only, or that the remedy is exhausted by being *enforced in one action, and that subsequent judgment creditors have no right of discovery under it."

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The Court of Common Pleas of Abbeville had no jurisdiction to render judgment against an administrator (resident in Greenville) of an intestate (also resident in Greenville) for an account of his administration of an estate of which he had been appointed receiver in Abbeville, where the estate was located.

3. Cause remanded, with leave to apply for a change of venue.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, April, 1885.
The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Stokes & Irvine and Perrin & Cothran, for appellants.

Messrs. W. O. Bradley and W. H. Parker, contra.

October 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was commenced on August 24, 1883, in the County of Abbeville, against the defendant as administratrix, with the will annexed, of E. S. Irvine, deceased, and as his legatee and devisee, for an account of the estate of the plaintiffs which was in the hands of the said E. S. Irvine as receiver, in which judgment is demanded against the defendant, as well as such administratrix, as legatee and devisee, on account of assets descended, for any balance that may be found due upon such accounting. The said E. S. Irvine, though appointed receiver in the County of Abbeville, where the estate placed in his charge was located, and where he made his returns as receiver, was a resident of Greenville County, and so continued up to the time of his death, and all his real estate is located in the last mentioned county. The defendant was, at the time of the commencement of this action, and is yet, a resident of the County of Greenville, where she qualified as administratrix, made her returns as such and received her final discharge, upon her ex parte application for that purpose, though she undertook to make a final return and settlement of the accounts of her testator as receiver before the judge of probate for Abbeville County.

The case was heard by Judge Pressley while holding the Court of Common Pleas for Abbeville County, who rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, from which the defendant appeals upon several grounds affecting the merits, and also upon the ground that the court in Abbeville had no jurisdiction of the case against the defendant, who is a resident of the County of Greenville. This question of jurisdiction does not seem to have been raised in the Circuit Court, and therefore the Circuit Judge made no ruling upon it. But, as has been frequently held, a question of jurisdiction may, for the first time, be raised in this court, and therefore we must first determine that question before we can look into the merits; for if it shall be determined that the court which undertook to render judgment in this case had no jurisdiction of it, then the so-called judgment is a mere nullity, and there would be no necessity or propriety for us to inquire into the reasons upon which it was based.

The question is, could the court in Abbeville take jurisdiction of this case against the defendant, who is a resident of Greenville, unless the place of trial had been changed to the County of Abbeville by an order of the court under section 147, of which there is no pretence in this case? The code, after providing that certain specified actions, of which this is not one, must be tried in certain places, proceeds, in section 146, as follows: "In all other cases the action shall be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the time of the commencement of the action: * * * subject, however, to the power of the court to change the place of trial in the cases as hereinafter provided." It will be observed that the language used in these sections of the code in regard to the place of trial is of an imperative character—"must be tried" in sections 144 and 145, and "shall be tried" in section 146—and we do not see by what authority a court can dis*regard such an imperative mandate from the law-making power. This language clearly implies that a case cannot be tried elsewhere than in the place appointed for the purpose, unless the place of trial be changed under section 147 of the code; and therefore if tried in the wrong county, the trial and the judgment entered therein are nullities for want of jurisdiction.

This has been distinctly held in one case

(Trapier v. Waldo, 16 S. C., 276) and very plainly intimated in another (Steele v. Exum, 22 S. C., 276), where the exact point did not arise. For in Trapier v. Waldo, while the court held that the court in Charleston had acquired jurisdiction over the persons of those who had been made parties to a case for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate lying in Georgetown County, prior to the repeal of the first paragraph of section 149 of the old Code, yet, as to parties who were brought in by amendment, subsequent to such repeal, it could not take jurisdiction and the judgment as to them was therefore void. (Note.—In examining this case it will be necessary to bear in mind that the sections of the code are not now numbered as they were when the opinion in Trapier v. Waldo, was filed.) So in the case of Steele v. Exum, supra, the Chief Justice uses this language: "It may be true, no doubt it is, that so far as the trial of the cause upon its merits is concerned, that court had no jurisdiction, as under the code, supra, the defendants residing in other counties, the trial could not be had in Williamsburg: but did it not nevertheless have jurisdiction as to changing the place of trial?" and the case goes on to decide the only question then before the court, to wit: that the court did have jurisdiction of the motion to change the place of trial, and again uses this language: "But it is only because the court cannot have such complete jurisdiction that the power in question has been conferred." This language plainly and necessarily recognizes the idea that, while a court sitting for a county in which an action is improperly brought, may take jurisdiction of a motion to change the place of trial, yet it has not such complete jurisdiction of the case as would enable it to proceed with the trial of the cause on the merits. See also Tate & Thompson v. Blakeley, 3 Hill, 298.

*The cases of Lebeschultz v. Magrath (9 S. C., 276), and Parker v. Grimes (Ibid., 281), arose prior to the amendment of section 149 of the old Code, and therefore do not now apply. For that section as originally adopted, and as it read at the time those cases were decided, contained an express provision that if the action was not commenced in the proper county, the case might nevertheless be there tried, unless the defendant took the proper steps to have the place of trial changed; and hence while that was the law no jurisdictional question could arise, because jurisdiction to try the case in the wrong county was expressly conferred by the statute, unless the defendant saw fit to use the means provided for changing the place of trial to the proper county. But when that portion of section 149, containing this provision was repealed, as it has been by the act of 1879 (17 Stat., 14), the power to try a case in the wrong county has been taken away, and therefore it must be tried in the proper county, and the court of another county cannot take jurisdiction of it.

Respondents contend that this objection came too late, and that defendant, by submitting to the trial in Abbeville County without objection, has waived her right to have the place of trial changed. But if, as we have seen, the objection is jurisdictional, then such an objection never comes too late, and it is well settled that consent cannot give jurisdiction. Gallman v. Gallman, 5 Strobl., 207. Under the code as it originally read, a defendant could waive this objection, because the statute then provided: "If the county designated for that purpose in the complaint be not the proper county, the action may notwithstanding be tried therein, unless the defendant, before the time for answering expires, demand in writing that the trial be had in the proper county, and the place of trial be thereupon changed by consent of parties, or by order of the court as is provided in this section." Hence if the defendant failed to take the proper steps, at the proper time, to have the place of trial changed, he waived the right to do so, and the statute expressly provided that the trial might be had in the wrong county.

But since the language just quoted has been stricken out of section 149 by the amendment of 1879, above referred to, and that section, now numbered 147, contains no such provision, *there is no authority for trying a case elsewhere than in the proper county, unless the place of trial is changed by the court under section 147, and no requirement that the defendant shall demand a change of the place of trial, failing in which will warrant a trial to be had in the wrong county. Nothing now remains but the imperative mandate that the action "shall be tried" in the county designated by the statute as the proper county for that purpose. The cases of Green v. Bookhart (19 S. C., 466), and Union Bank v. Northrop (Ibid., 473), are cases in reference to proceedings supplementary to an execution, in which it was held that mere irregularities will not affect the validity of such proceedings, and therefore do not apply here.

We think it clear, therefore, that the Court of Common Pleas for Abbeville County had no jurisdiction of this case, in which the only defendant is and was at the commencement of the action a resident of the County of Greenville; and that upon this ground alone, without reference to the merits, which it would be premature to consider now, the judgment appealed from must be set aside.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment appealed from be set aside, solely on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered it, without prejudice as to the merits, and that the case be remanded to the Court of Common Pleas for Abbeville County, so that the parties may, if they so desire, take the proper orders to change the place of trial.

Before Cothran, J., Greenville, July, 1885.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. A. Blythe, for appellant.

Mr. M. F. Ansel, contra.

October 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Simon Swandale died sometime in 1884, leaving a will, by which in the first clause he gave all his property, of every kind, to his wife and children (of whom G. Tupper Swandale is one) in equal shares. His property consisted mainly of a large hotel in the city of Greenville, known as the Mansion House, with the furniture therein, and his private residence and household and kitchen furniture. By the third clause of his will he directed his executors to sell the property known as the Mansion House, and by the fourth clause he provides that the executors may sell all the remainder of his real estate, and after the whole has been sold he directs that the proceeds be distributed amongst his wife and children as provided in the first clause of the will. The plaintiff, who is the widow of the testator and his sole qualified executrix, sold the Mansion House for the sum of seventeen thousand dollars and the private residence for the sum of thirty-three hundred dollars, leaving the personal property unsold.

The testator was adjudged, several years before his death, to be a person of unsound mind, and the appellant, G. Tupper Swandale, was duly appointed and acted as his committee, and at the time this action was commenced had not rendered his final account as such committee. The appellant is the head of a family and was, at the time of the testator's death, as well as before, living with said testator in the dwelling house above spoken of, and continued to reside there until the same was sold. He has contracted debts to an amount exceeding his interest in his *father's estate, and some of his creditors, having reduced their claims to judgment, levied upon his undivided interest in the real estate before it was sold.

The plaintiff, finding herself embarrassed in the administration of the estate as to the interest of the appellant, brought this action against him, making all his creditors parties, asking, amongst other things, that the appellant be required to account as committee, and that his interest in the estate may be ascertained and determined. The appellant answered, setting up his claim of homestead, which is resisted by his creditors, and this is the only issue presented by this appeal. This claim was rejected by the Circuit Judge, but for what reason does not appear, as only extracts from his decree are given in the "Case." It does appear, however, that the Circuit Judge determined that the interest of the appellant in the real estate must still be regarded as realty, notwithstanding the sale by the executrix, which did not operate as an equitable conversion into personalty; and to this part of the decree no exception has been taken by any of the parties.

It is stated in the "Case" that all of the debts of appellant were contracted "since the first of January, 1880," and as the amendment to the homestead clause of the constitution of 1868 was not adopted until December 13, 1880, this statement would leave it uncertain whether the question in this case was to be determined under the provision of the constitution of 1868, or under the amendment of 1880. This uncertainty has, however, been removed by the written admission of counsel, herewith filed, to the effect that all the debts were contracted since the constitution was amended, and therefore the question is to be determined under the homestead clause as it now reads. That clause is as follows: "The general assembly shall enact such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale, under any mesne or final process issued from any court, to the head of any family residing in this State, a homestead in lands, whether held in fee or any lesser estate, not to exceed in value one thousand dollars, with the yearly products thereof; and every head of a family, residing in this State, whether entitled to a homestead exemption in lands or not, personal property not to exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars." In pursuance of this constitutional man*date the general assembly did, on December 24, 1880 (17 Stat., 513), enact a law declaring the exemption in the language just quoted from the constitution.

It is very obvious that this language differs very materially from that employed in the original constitutional provision. There the language used is: "The family homestead of the head of each family residing in this State, such homestead consisting of dwelling house, out-buildings, and lands appurtenant," &c. This language indicates that the property intended to be exempted has already acquired the character of "the family homestead," which is defined to be "the dwelling house, out-buildings, and lands appurtenant," while the language of the constitution as it now reads is altogether different. It does not indicate that the property intended to be exempted has already acquired the character of the family homestead, but on the contrary the words are, "a homestead in lands"—that is, a place for a homestead, which either may or may not be dwelling house, for it is not defined as such in the constitution now of force, as it was in the original constitutional provision.

There must have been some reason for this very marked change in the phraseology used in the provision intended to secure this exemption, and we can conceive of none other than to remove the restriction by which the exemption was confined to a specified part of the debtor's property, and leave it altogether undefined and unrestricted except by its value. Under this view of the constitution as it now reads, when a debtor sets up a claim of homestead, it is not at all important to inquire whether such debtor has, or ever had, a family residence or dwelling house. If he has lands, he is entitled, under the express terms of the constitution, to claim a homestead in such lands, whether he ever lived on them or not; for there is nothing now to restrict the exemption which he claims to "the family homestead" or to "the dwelling house," or any other particular part of his lands.

If, therefore, the interest of the appellant in the proceeds of the sale of the real estate of his father is still to be regarded as realty, notwithstanding the fact that the land has been sold by the executrix for partition merely, as was held by the Circuit

Judge without appeal, we see no reason why the appellant may *not claim his homestead exemption in such interest after it has been finally ascertained. It is a mistake to suppose that the appellant's claim of homestead is in the family residence—the family homestead—of the testator, as seems to be assumed in the argument of the counsel for respondent. The question here is whether the appellant is entitled to a homestead exemption in his share of his father's real estate, now represented by the proceeds of the sale thereof in the hands of the plaintiff as executrix. No question, therefore, can arise as to whether two homestead exemptions can be claimed in the same property. When the share of appellant under the will has been ascertained, it becomes his own exclusive property, and it is in that alone that the exemption can be claimed.

As to the personal property, we do not see how there can be a question. Indeed, the Circuit Judge seems to have disregarded that altogether, under the assumption, which is alleged to be a mistake, that it would be exhausted in the payment of the debts of the testator. If that be so, then, of course, the appellant would be entitled to no share in it, and there would therefore be nothing out of which he could claim the personal property exemption. But if the Circuit Judge was in error in supposing that the personal property would be consumed in the payment of the debts of the testator, then the appellant would be entitled to an interest therein, and out of such interest we see no reason why he could not claim the exemption. This exemption under the amended constitution is not now, as formerly, confined to specified kinds of personal property, but embraces all of that class.

The position taken by respondent that the Court of Common Pleas has no original jurisdiction of a proceeding to lay off a homestead or assign a personal property exemption, while correct and fully sustained by the authorities cited, is not applicable in this case. This is not such a proceeding, but it is an action brought by an executrix to obtain instructions of the court in administering the estate of her testator, and one of the difficulties presented is this claim of homestead. So that for the purpose of effecting the object of the action, it becomes necessary to adjudicate simply the question of right to the exemption claimed, leaving it to the proper authority to admeasure and lay off the *particular property to which under such right the claimant may be entitled. See Munro v. Jeter, 24 S. C., 29.

The judgment of this court is, that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as rejects the appellant's claim of homestead be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

ASHLEY v. HOLMAN.

(April Term, 1886.)

1. In action by the committee of a lunatic against the executors of a former committee for an account of the value of services rendered by the lunatic, the Circuit Judge found that such services were rendered and fixed their value, and that these services were enforced for the committee's profit. On appeal, this court sustained the first finding because not wholly without evidence to support it, but reversed the other finding as without testimony and not a natural or necessary inference from the facts proved.

2. The questions adjudicated in the former appeal in this case, Ashley v. Holman, 15 S. C., 97, stated.

[3. Insane Persons ⇨74.]

If the committee of a lunatic exacts valuable labor from his ward, for his own profit and benefit, he is liable to account for the value of such labor; but if the service is enforced only for the proper discipline and healthful employment of the ward, the committee is not liable, notwithstanding incidental benefit to him therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. ⇨74.]

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Chappell, 34 S. C. 102, 12 S. E. 934, without specific application.]

Before Fraser, J., Barnwell, March, 1885.

This was an action by Joseph Ashley, committee of William Ashley, against W. A. Holman and W. A. Bailey, executors of William Ashley, sr., deceased. The Circuit decree omitting the statement of facts to be found in the opinion of this court, was as follows:

This being a case in which a trustee is called to account, and in which the claim is founded on the duties growing out of that relation and not upon a contract, and no attempt made to settle with the ward or his committee, until the payment of the two thousand dollars, not long before the commencement of this action, there is nothing on which to found a plea of the statute of limitations in this case. The ward was no party to the application to the Judge of probate, in reference to the making of annual returns, and is not bound by anything in it.

It is probably true that William Ashley, the elder, never dreamed that he was making himself liable to account for the services of his ward; but if he has made a mistake, it is not an unusual experience of trustees in their dealings with the matters committed to their care.

An examination of the record of the proceedings under which William Ashley, the elder, was appointed committee of his son, William Ashley, jr., and in which the order of maintenance was also made, does not, as I understand them, show that the order of maintenance in any way had reference to the mode in which the ward had been managed by his father, or was in future to be managed by him as the committee. Their legal effect on this point does not differ from what it is, as the same proceedings and order are set out in the complaint. As they were described in the complaint, the Supreme Court holds that they are no bar to this action. Ashley v. Holman, 15 S. C., 97. The only questions before the court were as to the mental capacity of William Ashley, jr., his fitness to control himself and manage his estate, as to the value of his estate and the amount necessary for his support and maintenance. There was enough for this latter purpose, and the court allowed that and no more. The court did not inquire if he could labor and earn wages, and it did not then seem necessary to do so.

Only questions of fact now remain to be disposed of: 1. Was the ward capable of rendering valuable services as alleged? 2. Did he render such services to his committee? 3. Were they required merely as necessary or proper discipline? 4. What, if any, was their value?

It will be impossible to discuss the testimony in detail, and I am at the disadvantage of not having seen the witnesses, and not having the aid of the master by his own judgment as to the conclusions to be derived from the testimony. It may be said, however, that the testimony of the two distinguished physicians who have been examined by commission refers to a hypothetical case, *which is not exactly the case now before the court. They, however, only give their opinion. On the other side, it might be said with at least some plausibility that there are many cases of mere idiocy where human ingenuity could utilize mere physical force and power even where the mind was gone, and even extraordinary mental powers are sometimes strangely joined in a person who would be a proper subject to be made a ward of chancery. If such an unfortunate should be able and should in fact engage in profitable employments, he should labor for himself and not his committee.

The great preponderance of testimony is to the effect that the ward did render valuable service to his father and committee during the whole time the relation of ward and committee existed between them, and which services would have been rendered by some else, either slaves or hirelings, if not rendered by him. Even in the last sickness of the father, when the tenderest care was due from all around him, the ward seems to have been trusted to perform important duties around his bedside, and this must have been with the knowledge of the family. I am not sure that the committee ought to be allowed to enjoy without account the services of his ward, even if such services were the best thing for his health and discipline, if these services had a money value over and above the cost of producing them. I am quite sure that the committee should account if the benefit to the ward was merely incidental, as I am inclined to think it was in this case.

The labor of the ward in this case was constant; and it was enforced under circumstances which, if not painful to himself, must have been so to those who took an interest in him. The chastisement which seems frequently to have been inflicted for mere neglect of duties required, was never, so far as appears from the testimony, inflicted after the day's work was over, to keep his ward from straggling away from his father's dwelling to places where he did not want him to go. The impression made on my mind by the testimony is not that there was any intentional unkindness towards the son, but that the father had become accustomed to his son's infirmities and gave way to his own, perhaps, ruling passion to economize and utilize all available labor about him. The testimony for the defence has been mainly of a negative character, and not sufficient to overcome the plaintiff's case.

When witnesses testify as to the value of services, they, to this extent, give their opinions, and it is the duty of the court to weigh their opinions in the light of the personal experience of the judge who tries the case. Two hundred dollars a year would have been, during all these years, a full compensation for the ablest of field hands and somewhat over the average for what was known as a full hand on a plantation. A full hand would not have been willing to do for less than any other work such as was required of the ward in this case. This, however, is not the test. What could this labor have been procured for? All the work done by him was such as was usually done by the inferior laborers on the plantations and who were scarcely half-hands—hands clothed and fed, not as a member of Mr. Ashley's family and at his table, but with such food and clothing as were usual on such plantations amongst the laborers, and at first cost. I think, therefore, that an average of one hundred dollars a year will be a fair allowance for the value of these services. Assuming, therefore, that the committee was chargeable with these services, at the rate of one hundred dollars a year, at the end of each year, and allowing on these sums simple and not annual interest, and deducting commissions, the plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment for that amount—the sum of five thousand one hundred and fifty dollars.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the defendants, as executors of William Ashley, the elder, deceased, do pay to the plaintiff, as committee, or guardian, of William Ashley, jr., of unsound mind, the sum of five thousand one hundred and fifty dollars and the costs of this action.

From this decree the defendants appealed upon the grounds substantially stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John J. Maher and Isaac M. Hutson, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In a former appeal in this case, involving the judgment of the Circuit Court, sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, this court, reversing the judgment below in that respect, decided that the order in chancery, dated in 1855, by which the testator of the defendants had been appointed the committee of William Ashley, the younger, and under which he was allowed the annual interest on the estate of the said William for his board and maintenance, did not in itself preclude a claim for compensation, on behalf of the said William, for services rendered said committee, after the relation of committee and ward had been established, if in fact the said William had rendered to his committee services of a character and under such circumstances as would entitle him in law to such compensation. The court further held in substance that while it was almost inconceivable that an incurable lunatic could earn wages by his labor, yet that this was a matter which would depend upon the facts of each case, and if any case wages had been justly earned by valuable services rendered by such lunatic, and exacted for the profit of the committee, that the doors of the court should not be shut against him because of his lunacy; and that in such case, where an action like the one below had been brought claiming an accounting from the estate of said committee, it could not be dismissed on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. And the case was then remanded to the Circuit Court under the above rulings.

Upon the case going back it was heard and tried by his honor, Judge Fraser (upon a mass of testimony taken by the master, all of which appears in the "Case"), who found the following facts: First, "That said lunatic did render valuable services to his father (the committee) during the whole time the relation of ward and committee existed between them." Second, "That said services were such as were usually done by inferior laborers, scarcely half hands, and therefore worth half wages, to wit: $100." Third. "That it was probably true, that William Ashley, the elder, never dreamed that he was making himself liable to account for these services." And fourth. That said services were enforced by the committee, not so much for the discipline and health of the ward, as for the reason that the father (com*mittee) "had become accustomed to his son's infirmities and gave way to his own ruling passion, to economize and utilize all available labor about him." In other words, as we understand this last finding, that the services of the ward were enforced for the profit of the committee, benefit to the ward being merely incidental. Upon these facts, his honor held that the estate of the committee should account, saying that he was not so sure but that it should still account even if said services had been enforced as a matter of discipline, and healthful exercise only. Whereupon he ordered and adjudged, that the defendants, executors of William Ashley, the elder (former committee), do pay the plaintiff, present committee, the sum of $5,050, and the costs of suit.

The appeal questions the correctness of his honor's findings of fact, denying upon the evidence the capacity of the lunatic to render service, that he rendered service of the value fixed by the judge, and also that said services were enforced for the profit of the committee, under the influence of a ruling passion to economize and utilize all available labor about him, instead of for the proper discipline of said lunatic—the appellants contending that the service rendered by the son was enforced by the father chiefly from a desire to promote the health and happiness of said son, said services having no real value to the father, because otherwise, what was done by him would have been done by his regularly employed servants and the "trash gang" without additional expense to the father, and that his honor should have so found.

The appeal also questions the principle of law which his honor applied to the facts as found, to wit: that although no contract, either express or implied, in the sense that both parties should assent thereto, could arise, one of the parties being non compos and therefore unable to assent, yet that a legal obligation independent of contract could and did exist here, arising out of the duty of the committee to charge himself with the value of the services received by him at the hands of his ward, upon which the action could be sustained—the appellant contending besides, that the service rendered here was rendered in the relation of parent and child, not for the benefit of the parent, and with no intention, expectation, or promise express or implied on the part of the parent to pay for them, and therefore they should *have been held gratuitous, and not susceptible of raising a charge.

Now, can the findings of fact below be sustained? is the first matter before us. We have carefully gone over the testimony reported in the "Case," voluminous and extensive as it is, and, guided by the light of those numerous cases of ours, in which it has been held that the findings of fact by the Circuit Judge will be sustained unless there is either an entire absence of evidence to support them, or the manifest weight thereof is otherwise, we have reached the conclusion that the facts found as to services being rendered by the ward to his committee, and as to their value, are not entirely without testimony, and they, therefore, must be regarded as established. There was very strong testimony the other way, however, so much so, indeed, that in attempting to balance the evidence on both sides, with the view to ascertain the preponderance, it is difficult to see how the conclusions below were reached, except that more reliance was placed in the witnesses of the plaintiff as a whole than upon those of the defendants. In fact, the testimony offered by the defendants was so strong in opposition to the plaintiff's claim, that respondent's distinguished counsel frankly admitted in his argument here, "That if the testimony of these witnesses (alluding to certain witnesses of the defendants just named by him) is to be relied on implicitly, as a truthful representation of the facts, the case of the plaintiff has not been established." Saying further: "That the little that William did in the way of required and enforced service according to this testimony could have been of no value to the committee, and might well be considered only the necessary and healthful discipline to which he should have been subjected as contributing to his physical comfort and health." The contest, then, must have been very close, and might have turned either way, depending upon the estimate in which the testimony on either side was held by the Circuit Judge. Notwithstanding this, however, the findings of the Circuit Judge, mentioned above, having evidence to support them, must be sustained, under the rule in such cases.

But the other important finding, that these services were enforced by the committee upon his unfortunate son, for his own *profit, under the promptings of a ruling passion to economize and utilize all available labor about him, rather than for the discipline, health, and happiness of said son, we do not sustain, because after a careful analysis of plaintiff's testimony, we fail to find any evidence supporting it. True, there is abundant testimony on the one side, that the son did do many things in and about the house, yard, and horse lot, such as making fires, cutting and hauling wood, shucking corn, feeding and watering horses and other stock, seeing to the barn keys, and doing other small chores about the premises, and also that these to a great extent were required and enforced by the father, and that they were of some value to him; but we find no testimony as to the motive of the father in enforcing said service. The witnesses who speak of the fact, say nothing as to the motive, and there is certainly no direct or positive testimony on that subject from the plaintiff.

Nor do we think such finding is a reasonable or natural inference from the other facts of the case, in the face of the evidence that William Ashley, the elder, was a man of large fortune, owning, up to emancipation, over 150 slaves, with an abundance of personal property of all kind, and no doubt a large landed estate, and the father of the unfortunate lunatic, of whose estate and person he had very properly been appointed the committee. Can it be, that with these surroundings, and with no need for the labor of his son, he was so lost to all the promptings of parental affection, not to say of common humanity, as to be willing to make a degraded menial servant of him, and for no other reason than for profit to himself? We cannot think so. We cannot think that this is a legitimate inference from the facts that service was rendered, that it was enforced, and that to some extent it was valuable in the sense that others would have had to render it if the son had not—to which extent the testimony of the plaintiff goes, but no further.

It must be remembered that William Ashley, the elder, is in his grave. This action has been instituted since his death. In his life he never dreamed that he would be expected to account. And it does not appear that he ever gave any full explanation to any one as to the government of his son and the purpose he had in view in requiring him to be employed. But the fact that he was silent upon this subject to his overseers, his slaves, and hired laborers, adds nothing to the probability of the inference mentioned. But he was not entirely silent. The picture which Mrs. V. V. Hohman gives of the condition of his son and what the father said, when he attempted to keep him from the negro quarter, and prevent him from drawing water, cutting wood for the negroes, and nursing their children, is striking and significant, and furnishes to some extent a key to the conduct of the father. She said: "He tried the plan of making him stay in the house and to divert him there; but nothing he could do could interest or amuse him. He would sit with his head drooped, the picture of despair. * * * And her father said, that plan would not do—that he would pine away and die." There being no direct testimony upon this point, and the inference drawn not being a necessary or natural one from the facts proved, we feel constrained, under the authority of the cases above referred to, to overrule said finding.

Now the question arises, whether under the facts before this court, the judgment below can be affirmed? This raises the legal question, when and under what circumstances can a lunatic earn wages, chargeable upon his committee?

Before proceeding, however, to this question, it would be well to determine the points settled on the previous appeal,¹ and therefore needing no further examination here. The precise point brought up in the exception in that appeal, and which this court adjudged definitely, was, whether the order in chancery of 1855, appointing William Ashley, the elder, committee of his son, precluded all claim for services rendered, if any, by said son. This court held that it did not, overruling the judgment below. That question is therefore res adjudicata here. This court also, in response to the argument of the appellant, in which an effort was made to sustain the judgment below, on the ground that the ward being non compos could not make a contract, and therefore on that account there could be no cause of action in his behalf, even though the order in chancery above did not preclude his claim, held that this was not sufficient, and that notwithstanding no contract could be made between the parties, in the sense that both should assent thereto, one of them being non compos, and therefore unable to assent, yet that the law might raise an obligation between such parties, independent of contract to pay for services rendered. The court, however, did not determine or specify the conditions upon which such obligation would arise, or the character of cases in which it would be enforced. It simply adjudged the question that it was not impossible for a non compos to earn wages; or rather the fact of one being non compos did not in itself shut the doors of the court against him. This last question, it is true, was not distinctly raised in the appellants' exceptions in the former appeal, but we think it was raised sufficiently in the argument to prevent our utterances thereon from being entirely obiter. At all events, upon further reflection, we see no reason to change or modify our opinion then expressed. These matters are therefore dismissed, and we will now proceed to the question, whether the facts before the court bring the case under any principle of law which can sustain the judgment below.

We have examined, as far as practicable, all text books and reported cases within our reach, and, singular to say, while we have found the law to be that a non compos may be held liable to others for services of a certain character, to wit, necessities furnished, medical attention, &c., on the ground of an implied contract, notwithstanding his admitted incapacity to make a contract, yet we have found no case where others were held liable to him for services rendered. Nor have the distinguished and zealous counsel in the cause referred us to any case where the precise question here has ever before been presented to the courts. Coming in this shape, then, before us, it has been exceedingly embarrassing, and its decision either way has been surrounded with difficulties, and especially so on account of the possible influence which the decision one way or the other may have upon the happiness of that unfortunate class of persons in behalf of one of whom in the person of William Ashley, the younger, this question for the first time in the history of our judiciary has been raised.

To lay down the rule that a committee can work his afflicted ward constantly, indiscriminately, and for his own pecuniary *profit, and yet pay him nothing, nor account in any way to his estate, because he cannot make a contract, would be a principle not only dangerous to this stricken class, but shocking to every sense of justice. And yet, on the other hand, to hold that a committee is to be held to a strict account and made to pay for every service rendered by his ward, as if no such relation as that of committee and ward existed, and without regard to the object had in view by the committee in requiring the service, and that, too, after the lapse of years, during all of which time the committee had never conceived that he was imposing upon himself such an obligation, as in this case, would be dangerous to the committee, and besides would in a great degree destroy the purposes of his guardianship, preventing the exercise of proper discretion in the discipline and control which should be administered, and the plan which he should adopt in the government of his ward.

In the absence of direct authority and with no case before us where the question here has been considered and discussed, we are left to general principles as applied in analogous cases, and we do not see why the principle enforced against a lunatic for necessary services rendered him, should not be applied in his favor, where he has rendered necessary service to another. Nor why his committee should not be responsible where the evidence is plain that he has enforced and accepted such service for his own benefit and profit. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and if one having control of a non compos, who is unable to contract, yet able to do valuable work, enforces that labor for his own benefit, he should not escape responsibility. If, however, the service has been enforced by the committee not for his profit, but for the proper discipline and healthful exercise and employment of the ward, as the best thing to be done for his comfort and happiness, although with incidental benefit to the committee, we see no ground for accountability, and especially so in a case like the one at bar, where the committee was the father of the ward, was a man of large fortune, in no way in need of the service rendered, had no idea that he was annually creating a debt against himself, which was to be enforced against his estate after his death, when he would have no opportunity to meet the claim by explanation, counter-claim, or otherwise, and when, too, although *he bequeathed nothing directly to his said son, he yet charged his whole estate with his comfortable support and maintenance.

Our conclusion is, that while the Circuit Judge was not in error as to the principle of law which he applied to the facts as found by him, yet one of those facts being overruled, and that fact being the one which made the law enforced applicable, the judgment becomes erroneous.

It is therefore the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In January, 1862, an order was obtained in the Court of Equity for Lexington District (now county), in partition proceedings for the sale of certain real estate of one George Sawyer, sr., deceased, his heirs at law all being parties thereto. At the sale of said real estate, his widow, Catherine Sawyer, one of the defendants here, became the purchaser, at and for the sum of $10,285, to secure which sum she executed her bond with one John W. Sawyer and William Fort as sureties to Henry A. Meetze, commissioner in equity, and also a mortgage of the premises. Some time after this and before the proceedings in partition had ended, to wit: in July, 1869, Jane Fulmer and Jasper Sawyer, two of the parties to said proceedings, having died, an order was obtained from Judge Boozer to amend the bill in Sawyer v. Sawyer, making their heirs at law parties defendant, and also an order appointing guardians ad litem of certain minors. These orders were obtained on motion of the aforesaid Mr. Fort, who was a relative of the parties, and the attorney having in charge the partition proceedings.

In August, 1869, two petitions were filed, one purporting to have been signed by Mrs. Catharine Sawyer, and praying that she might be released from her purchase of the said real estate, and that her bond and mortgage be given up and cancelled and a re-sale of the land be had. This petition was based upon the great and unexpected change which had taken place in her condition on account of the results of the war. The other petition purported to have been signed by the other heirs at law, the minors signing through their guardians ad litem, and prayed same as the first one. These petitions were referred to a special referee by Judge Boozer, to inquire and report whether it was best for the infants that the bond and mortgage should be released, &c. Mr. Fort was the attorney for the petitioners. The reference was held, and, as it appears, without notice to any of the parties or their guardians ad litem. Upon a favorable report coming in, Judge Boozer, in open court, on December 11, 1869, decreed that the former sale be rescinded, the bond and mortgage *cancelled, and that it be referred to the referee to report upon what terms a re-sale should be ordered.

In accordance therewith a report was afterwards made, not signed, however, by the referee, Griffith, C. C. P., but by his deputy clerk, Mr. Harman, recommending a sale of the premises in two parcels, &c., upon which report Judge Boozer, at chambers, on December 29, 1869, decreed a sale, which was made by the sheriff of Lexington on February 7, 1870, at public outcry, George Sawyer being the purchaser of both tracts at $1,175—said to have been a very inadequate price. This bid of George Sawyer was on same day transferred to Mr. Fort, to whom the sheriff executed titles, upon his giving bond and mortgage to secure the credit portion of the purchase, the cash portion having been credited on the costs of sale and the fee of Mr. Fort as complainants' solicitor. No part of the bond and mortgage has been paid except $195, which was paid by Mr. Fort to Mrs. Catharine Sawyer as her dower in the purchase money. This sale was afterwards confirmed by an order of Judge Melton.

It appears as a further fact found in the case by the Circuit Judge, Judge Hudson, that before the sale mentioned above, to wit: February 7, 1870, Mr. Fort, the attorney in the cause of Sawyer v. Sawyer, and a creditor of the estate of George Sawyer, sr., and George Sawyer, jr., also a creditor and heir and administrator of George Sawyer, sr., and John W. Sawyer, also a creditor and heir of George Sawyer, sr., agreed together that William Fort should not bid at the sale of the land against the said George and John W. Sawyer, provided that if they or either of them should become the purchaser, he or they would transfer their bid to the said Fort; George and John, however, to take possession and when they paid said Fort what was due him by the estate, he would make title to them.

William Fort died in 1875. Under the above state of facts the action below was commenced in 1884, by the plaintiffs, grandchildren and heirs at law of George Sawyer, sr., against Catharine Sawyer, the widow and an heir at law of the said George, and also the other heirs at law of the said George, and also against the administrator and heirs at law of William Fort, deceased, demanding judgment, that the tract of land in question *be sold, and the proceeds be applied to the payment of the bond and mortgage of Catharine Sawyer, given at her purchase of the land, March 11, 1862, in the partition proceeding before mentioned, and that judgment be entered up for any deficiency against the said Catharine and her sureties, John W. Sawyer, and the estate of William Fort; and to this end that the sale made to William Fort, February 7, 1870, be set aside, &c., and if this be refused, that the re-sale of the land under the orders above be set aside and a new sale be had.

The heirs of George Sawyer, sr., who were made defendants, answered, admitting the allegations of the complaint and joining in the prayer for relief, except the defendants, George Sawyer, jr., and John W. Sawyer, who claimed that they were entitled to the land under the agreement made by them with Mr. Fort at the sale of February 7, 1870, and they demanded a dismissal of the complaint and a specific performance of the contract with Mr. Fort as against the heirs of the said Fort, their co-defendants. The other defendants, heirs at law of Fort, denied the alleged combination at the sale, and claimed that all questions as to the bond and mortgage had been adjudicated by the proceedings under the petitions; that all facts connected with the sale were known or by due diligence could have been known, and they submitted that all relief against said sale, if at any time the heirs of George Sawyer were entitled thereto was barred by laches and the statute of limitations.

His honor, Judge Hudson, heard the case, and upon the facts stated (which, upon examination of the "Case," will be found to be the material facts) he held "as matter of law, that the plea of former adjudication as to the bond and mortgage set up as a defence by the Fort heirs to the demand for foreclosure by the Sawyer heirs was not binding and effectual against the plaintiffs, Eliza C. Derrick, George A. Fulmer, John W. Fulmer, Mary L. Fulmer, Amanda M. Boozer, Mary E. Crim, and Maria J. Leaphart, for the reason that they were not parties to or bound by the proceedings following up the petitions aforesaid. * * * That all the other heirs at law of George Sawyer, sr., are bound by said proceedings up to and including the order of December 14, 1869. This decree released Mrs. Catharine Sawyer from her bond and mortgage, and was made in open court." And he decreed a foreclosure of the Catharine Sawyer bond and mortgage to the extent of the interests of said plaintiffs, adjudging that the heirs of Jane Fulmer were entitled to one-sixteenth of two thirds of said bond, with interest from November 11, 1885, and the heirs of Jasper Sawyer to the same amount; that all the other parties to the suit, whether as heirs or creditors of George Sawyer, sr., were precluded from setting up any claims, as they were barred by estoppel, laches, and lapse of time. He found further as matter of law, that the order of Judge Boozer passed December 29, 1869, at chambers, ordering a re-sale of the land, was and is assailable and invalid for the want of jurisdiction, and that the sale had thereunder on February 7, 1870, was also impeachable, because the order was granted at chambers, and that it was also voidable because of the agreement between Mr. Fort and George and John W. Sawyer, but that the heirs of George Sawyer, sr., who attack said sale and who signed the petition, and who were not minors, either knew the facts or had the means of knowing them, and because of their negligence and laches in not applying sooner, they cannot complain of the defects of said sale, and are barred of any relief.

As to the claim of affirmative relief set up by George and John W. Sawyer, he held that said claim, arising upon a contract which was illegal and against public policy, could not be entertained, they being left where the court found them, with the legal title of the land abiding in William Fort, deceased, as against all the parties to the action contesting it, except those to whom relief was especially granted. He finally ordered, on failure of Catharine Sawyer, John W. Sawyer, and the estate of William Fort paying or causing to be paid to the plaintiffs the sums allowed them by a day fixed, that the land be sold under the bond and mortgage of the said Catharine, &c., with leave to said parties to have judgment and execution for such deficiency, if any, that might occur, but upon compliance with the terms of the decree, that the heirs of Fort have full possession of the tract of land as against all parties to this action who dispute in any manner the title of William Fort, deceased.

The plaintiffs, Deborah Baggott, Martha

Fallow, Ella Williamson, Ansel Sawyer, and Howell Sawyer, excepted and appeal upon several grounds:

1st. Because his honor erred in holding that said plaintiffs were bound by the decree of Judge Boozer of December 14, 1861 (1869), as a bar to the foreclosure sought, whereas he should have found that Howell Sawyer was not a party to said proceeding, and that the other plaintiffs had no knowledge of said decree, or the references upon which it was based, the same having been procured by William Fort in his own interest, and against the interest of his clients.

2d. That his honor having found that the decree of Judge Boozer was made "at chambers," and therefore the court was without jurisdiction, and the sale tainted by a combination to chill the bidding, he should have found said sale absolutely void, and have ordered a re-sale.

3d and 4th. That his honor erred in finding that these parties were barred by negligence, laches, &c., whereas he should have held as matter of law that laches should not have been presumed against them, because of the relations which existed between them and their attorney, Mr. Fort, and because of the minority of some of the parties.

5th. That he erred in not admitting the testimony of George and John W. Sawyer.

6th. That he erred in decreeing full possession to the heirs of Fort, the same never having been asked in the pleadings.

The other defendants, heirs at law of George Sawyer (except George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer), appealed upon the same grounds as above; the widow, Catherine, adding an exception as follows: That his honor erred in finding that the reception by her from William Fort of one-sixth of his bid at the re-sale, estopped her from questioning the same.

George Sawyer and John W. Sawyer appealed upon the following exceptions:

1st. Because his honor erred in not admitting and considering the testimony of George and John W. Sawyer, where they testified to transactions with Fort, said testimony being competent under section 2025 of the General Statutes.

2d. In decreeing that full possession of the land in question should be given up to the estate of Fort, because the same was never asked for by said estate, and such relief is contrary to all the pleadings in the case.

3d. In not excluding as incompetent the agreement between George Sawyer and H. Arthur Fort, the same having been altered and erased in several important particulars.

4th. That his honor having admitted the special agreement, he erred in not admitting and considering the testimony of George Sawyer as to payments made to Colonel Fort, same being competent under section 400 of the Code. This testimony should have been admitted in favor of John W. Sawyer.

5th. That his honor having found the sale of February 7, 1870, and the title of Colonel Fort thereunder valid, he erred in not finding that George and John W. Sawyer entered into possession of the land under the agreement with Colonel Fort, that he would make them titles when they paid him what was due him by the estate of George Sawyer, sr. That he erred further in not finding that they had paid said money, and in not decreeing specific performance in their behalf.

It will be observed that there is no appeal from the plaintiffs in whose behalf relief has been granted, nor have the heirs of Fort appealed. Nor do the exceptions of those who have appealed question the rulings made in favor of the successful plaintiffs. So much of the decree, therefore, as has adjudged the successful plaintiffs entitled to have the original mortgage of Catherine Sawyer reinstated and foreclosed for their benefit, on the ground that they were never parties to the proceedings by which she was released from her purchase, and her bond and mortgage cancelled, under the order of December 14, 1869, must be regarded as established and submitted to by all parties, and the judgment based upon that ruling must be enforced in behalf of said plaintiffs, whatever may be the consequences to the other parties.

The unsuccessful heirs of George Sawyer, sr. (except George, jr., and John W. Sawyer), however, claim that they, too, were entitled to the benefit of the foreclosure ordered upon several grounds. First, they say, that as to the defendant, Howell, he was in no way a party to the proceedings which led up to the decree of Judge Boozer of December 14, 1869, releasing Catherine Sawyer from her bond and mortgage, and that the other complaining parties had no knowledge of said decree or the references upon which it was made. Contra to this, it must be remembered that there is a wide difference between the position of the excluded heirs and the successful plaintiffs as to the original bill of Sawyer v. Sawyer; a difference too, which affects very differently the rights respectively of these classes under the proceedings in that case. All of the excluded heirs, including Howell Sawyer and Mrs. Cook, for whom an especial appeal is urged, were parties to Sawyer v. Sawyer from the beginning to the end, while at no time were the successful plaintiffs parties to any portion of said proceedings—so held by the Circuit Judge without appeal.

The petitions which led up to the order of Judge Boozer of December 14, 1869, releasing Mrs. Catherine Sawyer, were proceedings, it seems, in the case of Sawyer v. Sawyer, to which the excluded heirs were all parties. The order of December 14, 1869, was passed in open court, after the report of a referee upon the propriety of such an order, and although we can see no reason why a second guardian ad litem was appointed for Howell Sawyer, yet there seems to be no doubt that he was properly in court up to that time, and being so, he, with the others who were also in court, having submitted to the decree made without appeal, cannot now at this late date avail themselves of the defence that they had no knowledge of said decree or of the references upon which it was based. There must be an end to litigation, and if parties to actions fail to attend to their own interest while the action is in progress, or lose their right of appeal by negligence and inattention, they must take the consequences. Whatever may have been the justice or propriety of the order of December 14, 1869, there can be no doubt that all who were parties to the proceeding which resulted in that order are bound, the same having been passed in open court, and submitted to for years and without appeal.

But, it is urged in behalf of the appellants, admitting that they are bound by the decree of December 14, 1869, yet they are not bound by the order of sale subsequently passed by Judge Boozer, said order having been passed at chambers, and that his honor having held the court without jurisdiction, on that account it was error on his part not to vacate and set aside the sale made thereunder, and thereupon to order a re-sale. This would be sound doctrine if these appellants had not been parties to that proceeding, or being parties had resisted said order and had appealed therefrom. But having been parties thereto, and not only parties, but at the same time active in promoting said order and in bringing about the sale, it is too late now, after the lapse of years, fifteen or more, to complain. They are estopped from raising the question of jurisdiction. Under all the circumstances, that question was beyond the reach of the Circuit Court, so far as the appellants were concerned.

It is urged, again, that the sale should have been set aside on account of the combination between Mr. Fort and George and John W. Sawyer not to bid against each other, which the Circuit Judge found as matter of fact existed at said sale. But here also the Circuit Judge found as matter of fact that these appellants knew of this conspiracy, or of facts and circumstances connected therewith sufficient to put them on an inquiry which would have developed it, and he ruled that said appellants having submitted to said sale, without protest or objection up to this action, they could not now complain, and were barred by their own laches of all relief. We think this ruling of the Circuit Judge is sustained by authority. See Kerr Frauds, 303-305; Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. 87 [17 L. Ed. 836].

Nor do we think that the ruling of his honor as to the claim of George and John W. Sawyer for affirmative relief was erroneous. They were parties to the conspiracy as to the bidding at the sale, which was illegal and against public policy, and they had no rights, therefore, either legal or equitable which the court could enforce, and it was right that the court should leave them where it found them.

We do not see the pertinency of the exception made by all of the appellants, in which it is complained that his honor refused to admit and consider the testimony of George and John W. Sawyer as to transactions with Mr. Fort, deceased; nor that of George and John W. Sawyer that his honor, having admitted *the special agreement, he erred in not admitting and considering the testimony of George Sawyer as to payments made to Colonel Fort. We do not find in the argument reference to the folios where the admission of this testimony was insisted upon and refused, and exception taken. All that we find in the decree of his honor on this subject is that he found as matter of fact: "That before the sale of February 7, 1870, William Fort, who was attorney in the cause of Sawyer v. Sawyer, and a creditor of the estate of George Sawyer, sr., and George Sawyer, jr., who was a creditor and an administrator and heir of said estate, and John W. Sawyer, who was a creditor and heir of said estate, agreed together that William Fort would not bid against said George and John at said sale, provided, &c. * * * This finding," he said, "is obtained irrespecand upon the testimony of Ansel Sawyer, where it was not objected to, and the statements of Colonel Fort in the answer in the Murphy dower case, and the statement of his heirs in the complaint in the ejectment case. In fact, the senior counsel for the Fort heirs, Mr. Rion, in his argument admitted that such agreement existed, but denied its legal effect." This branch of the case, in the mind of the Circuit Judge, turned upon the existence of this illegal agreement, of which there appeared abundant testimony, independent of any effect which the appellants might have hoped to accomplish by the admission of the testimony of George and John W. Sawyer.

This brings us to the last exception taken by all the appellants, wherein error is alleged, that his honor decreed that full possession of the land in question should be given up to the estate of Fort. We do not find anything in the pleadings which authorizes this portion of the decree. The action was instituted by a portion of the heirs of George Sawyer, sr., praying judgment that a bond and mortgage given by Catherine Sawyer in the purchase of certain real estate of the said George Sawyer, deceased, under partition proceedings, be enforced by foreclosure of the mortgage, with an alternative prayer that if this could not be done, that a certain subsequent sale of said real estate be set aside, and a re-sale ordered and the proceeds distributed. The relief first above mentioned has been decreed to some of these *heirs, but denied to the others, the latter being held bound by the sale sought to be vacated—the result being that the successful plaintiffs, heirs, are entitled to share in the proceeds of the sale to Mrs. Catherine Sawyer, and the others in the proceeds of the sale to the Fort heirs. Provision is made in the decree for the successful heirs, but none for the appellants.

We think the appellants, styled herein as the unsuccessful heirs, should receive their shares respectively of the sale made to Fort. They have been held to that sale, and they are entitled to have it enforced against the estate of Fort and his heirs, all of whom are before the court. To this end the decree below should be modified and amended so that unless the Fort heirs shall pay to said unsuccessful heirs their shares respectively in the purchase by William Fort of said real estate by a time to be fixed, that then the land be sold in satisfaction of his bond and mortgage given at said purchase; or should a sale be made under so much of the decree below as gives relief to the successful heirs in the foreclosure of the mortgage of Catherine Sawyer, that this sale shall also be in foreclosure of the mortgage of William Fort; the proceeds of said sale, if made, to be distributed between the successful heirs, their shares therein being as decreed below, and the balance between the appellants, their shares being ascertained according to the purchase price of William Fort; and should there be a deficiency in either, that the successful heirs have judgment and execution against Catherine Sawyer and her sureties, and the appellants judgment and execution against the estate of William Fort, if any, for the same.

It is the judgment of this court that so much of the decree as adjudges possession of the lands to the Fort heirs be reversed, and so much as affords relief to the successful heirs, plaintiffs, be affirmed; and that the case be remanded, so that such modification as is herein above decreed in favor of the appellants may be made, the shares of said appellants in the proceeds of the Fort mortgage to be ascertained upon reference or otherwise as the Circuit Court may determine.

In this case, a petition for rehearing was tiled by the Fort heirs, upon the ground that William Fort had fully paid the bond and mortgage given by him for his purchase at the re-sale; and that the statement to the contrary found in the Circuit decree was a manifest mistake of fact.

January 18, 1887. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. The petition is based upon a statement that the finding of his honor, Judge Hudson, "that no part of the Fort bond and mortgage had been paid except $195, the widow's dower," was founded upon a mistake of fact, and as this finding constituted in part the basis of our judgment, a rehearing is asked. In the absence of an admission from all the parties that there was such a mistake, we cannot alter the record, and must assume that the findings below were correct, there having been no appeal from said finding. The petition is therefore dismissed.

LOWRY v. THOMPSON.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. States ⇐ 191.]

Plaintiff contracted to sell his land to the State Land Commissioner, received a small portion of the purchase money, and executed his deed, which was never delivered, but was surreptitiously taken possession of and retained by that officer, and no further payments were made. This office was abolished and all its assets directed to be turned over to the secretary of State, to be held subject to the control of the Sinking Fund Commission, which was composed of certain State officials, and this title deed thus came into the possession of the secretary of State. Upon the refusal by the commission to return this deed, plaintiff brought action against the Sinking Fund Commission for its recovery. Held, that the action was really against the State, and therefore was not maintainable in any of the courts of the State. Cases reviewed.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson dissenting.

Before Cothran, J., Richland, July, 1884.

This was an action by James M. Lowry against Hugh S. Thompson, governor, W. E. Stoner, comptroller general, and others, as Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, for the recovery of a title deed. Upon the point decided by the court, the opinion fully states the case.

*417

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund of the State of South Carolina to recover the possession of two papers in the form of deeds, purporting to be conveyances of certain tracts of land in the County of York, by the plaintiff to C. P. Leslie, as land commissioner of the said State, the consideration mentioned therein aggregating the sum of seventeen thousand five hundred and ninety-nine dollars. The case as made for the plaintiff was, in substance, this:

Sometime in the year 1870, the plaintiff agreed to sell to the said Leslie, as land commissioner, the said tracts of land at the price named as the consideration in the said papers, to be paid in cash. Accordingly the papers were drawn up, signed and sealed, but not delivered, and were placed by the plaintiff in the hands of one Gulick to be delivered to the said land commissioner when the balance of the purchase money should be paid, the plaintiff having previously received twenty-four hundred dollars on account thereof. While the papers were thus in the possession of Gulick, the said Leslie applied to him for them so that they might be submitted to the attorney general for examination and approval, alleging that this was necessary in order to enable him to pay the balance of the purchase money. Gulick delivered the papers to the agent of Leslie for the purpose of examination, with the understanding that they were to be returned to him after they had been examined. They never were returned, but the said Leslie upon various pretexts neglected to do so, although repeated demands were made upon him for their return both by plaintiff and the said Gulick, and on the contrary, the same were surreptitiously put upon record in the proper office in York County.

By the act of February 15, 1872, the office of land commissioner was abolished, and in the second section of that act it was *provided: "That all books and papers pertaining to the office of the land commissioner be turned over to the secretary of State on and after the passage of this act. And the secretary of State shall execute the duties heretofore devolving upon the land commissioner." By the act of 1878, now section 60 of the General Statutes, it was provided: "The secretary of State shall take charge of all property of the State, the care and custody of which is not otherwise provided for by law. He shall hold the same subject to the directions and instructions of the commissioners of the sinking fund." Section 61: "Hereafter no grants of vacant lands shall be issued, except to actual purchasers of the said lands for value; and all vacant lands purchased by the late land commissioners of the State shall be likewise subject to the directions and instructions of the commissioners of the sinking fund." And then by section 62, which is but a re-enactment of the act of 1870, the several public officers mentioned in the title of this action are constituted the commissioners of the sinking fund, "to receive and manage the incomes and revenues set apart and applied to the sinking fund of the State." And by section 63, it is made the duty of the said commissioners "to sell and convey, for and on behalf of the State, all such real and personal property, assets, and effects belonging to the State, as is not in public use," with certain exceptions which need not be mentioned here, and apply the proceeds as therein directed.

It seems that the papers in question, together with the other books and papers pertaining to the office of land commissioner, were, when that office was abolished, turned over to the secretary of State, and the same are now in the possession of that officer. On October 18, 1883, the plaintiff made a formal demand upon the commissioners of the sinking fund for the papers in controversy, which not being complied with, this action was commenced for their recovery. As the secretary of State has not been made a party, the action seems to be based upon the theory that though the papers in question are in the actual possession of the secretary of State, yet they are only held by that officer as the mere hand of the commissioners of the sinking fund, and being subject entirely to their control, the action is brought against them alone, as they alone can direct the disposition of them.

*The Circuit Judge held that the land commissioner originally obtained possession of these papers by fraud, and the subsequent fraudulent holding of them by that officer "followed the papers into the hands of the present defendants, his successors, who still hold, but should not be allowed to retain, possession of the same," and that the value of the papers to the plaintiff should be measured by his liability under the covenants of warranty therein, to wit: the sum of seventeen thousand five hundred and ninety-nine dollars. He therefore rendered judgment that the plaintiff do recover from the defendants the papers in question, and in case the specific property cannot be delivered up, that he recover the value thereof, to wit: the sum of fifteen thousand, one hundred and ninety-nine dollars. From this judgment defendants appeal upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be mentioned here. Upon the argument of that appeal the court suggested a question of jurisdiction not raised by the parties, to wit: whether the action was not, in fact, though not in form, an action against the State, and as such not maintainable in any of the courts of the State, and ordered a re-argument upon that question, which has been had.

It will be necessary, first, to dispose of the question of jurisdiction: for if it shall be determined that the court has no jurisdiction, then it would be not only unnecessary but improper to undertake to decide any of the other questions in the case.

That a State cannot be sued in any of its courts, without its express consent, which can only be given by the legislative authority, is a proposition so universally conceded as to render any argument or authority to support it wholly unnecessary. If, however, authority should be asked for, it will be found in almost every case which will be hereinafter cited, where it will be found that the proposition has either been distinctly decided or expressly recognized, and we are not aware of any authority to the contrary. As it is not pretended that any such consent was given in this case, the first inquiry is, whether this is really an action against the State. The fact that the State is not named as a party to the record is not conclusive of this inquiry, though at one time it seems to have been so held in the case of Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat., 738 [6 L. Ed. 204], followed by Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203 [21 L. Ed. 447]; but these cases, so far as this particular point is concerned, are entirely inconsistent with the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where the rule seems to be now well settled that an action though in form against an officer of a State, if it is in fact a suit against the State itself, cannot be maintained even though the State is not made a party on the record. Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S., 711 [2 Sup. Ct. 128, 27 L. Ed. 448]; Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., 109 U. S. 446 [3 Sup. Ct. 292, 609, 27 L. Ed. 992]; Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S., 52 [6 Sup. Ct. 608, 29 L. Ed. 805].

Indeed, it being universally conceded that a State cannot be sued without its consent, except in the limited class of cases in which a State may be sued in the original jurisdiction expressly granted to the Supreme Court by the constitution of the United States, it is only in cases where the State is not named as a party defendant in the record, that any real question of jurisdiction can arise: for if the State is named as a party defendant in the record, that precludes further inquiry, and the court, it is universally conceded, cannot take jurisdiction. In Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., supra, Mr. Justice Miller reviews this whole subject and admits that it is not an easy matter to reconcile the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject; and while disavowing any attempt to do so, he proceeds to deduce from them certain general principles. After laying down the general principle that a State cannot be sued without its consent, except in the limited class of cases above alluded to, he says: "This principle is conceded in all the cases, and whenever it can be clearly seen that the State is an indispensable party to enable the court, according to the rules which govern its procedure, to grant the relief sought, it will refuse to take jurisdiction;" and after adding that the courts have, "in some instances gone a long way in holding the State not to be a necessary party, though some interest of hers may be more or less affected by the decision," he proceeds to classify the cases in which this has been done, as follows:

"1. It has been held in a class of cases where property of the State, or property in which the State has an interest, comes before the court and under its control in the regular course of judicial administration, without being forcibly taken from the *possession of the government, the court will proceed to discharge its duty in regard to that property. And the State, if it chooses to come in as plaintiff, as in prize cases, or to intervene in other cases when she may have a lien or other claim on the property, will be permitted to do so, but subject to the rule that her rights will receive the same consideration as any other party interested in the matter, and be subjected in like manner to the judgment of the court. Of this class are the cases of The Siren, 7 Wall., 152, 157 [19 L. Ed. 129]; The Davis, 10 Wall., 15, 20 [19 L. Ed. 875]; and Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S., 436 [2 Sup. Ct. 878, 27 L. Ed. 780]." It will be observed that in the case of The Davis, supra, while the lien for salvage on the personal property of the United States was fully recognized, yet it was held that such lien could not be enforced by a suit against the United States, or by a proceeding in rem where the possession of the property can only be had by taking it out of the actual possession of the officers or agents of the government charged therewith, but that as it appeared in that case that the property was not taken out of the possession of any officer or agent of the government, but from the common carrier to whom it had been delivered for transportation from one port to another, when the government came in and asserted its claim to the property, it would be required to discharge the lien before the property would be delivered to it.

"2. Another class of cases is where an individual is sued in tort for some act injurious to another in regard to person or property, to which his defence is that he has acted under the orders of the government. In these cases he is not sued as, or because he is, the officer of the government, but as an individual, and the court is not ousted of jurisdiction because he asserts authority as such officer. To make out his defence he must show that his authority was sufficient in law to protect him." The somewhat famous case of United States v. Lee, 106 U. S., 196 [1 Sup. Ct. 240, 27 L. Ed. 174], is cited as belonging to this class, and to it we may add the subsequent case of Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S., 270 [5 Sup. Ct. 903, 962, 29 L. Ed. 185].

"3. A third class, which has given rise to more controversy, is where the law has imposed upon an officer of the government a well defined duty in regard to a specific matter, not affecting the general powers or functions of the government, but in the performance of which one or more individuals have a distinct *interest capable of enforcement by judicial process." Amongst the cases mentioned as illustrations of this class are, Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203 [21 L. Ed. 447]; which, however, is questioned as going to an extreme limit, if not beyond it; Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S., 531 [23 L. Ed. 623]; and Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat., 738 [6 L. Ed. 204], which last mentioned case is declared to go no further than to decide: "That where a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain a personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel performance; and when such duty is threatened to be violated by some positive official act, any person who will sustain personal injury thereby, for which adequate compensation cannot be had at law, may have an injunction to prevent it." As a further illustration of this class we may add the recent case of Allen v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 114 U. S., 311 [5 Sup. Ct. 925, 962, 29 L. Ed. 200].

We have felt warranted in making these liberal quotations from the case of Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., because it is manifestly a well considered case, in which the whole subject is reviewed and ably treated, and the case has been distinctly recognized and followed in one of the most recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—Hagood v. Southern, supra.

It may be well to mention here that the title of the case (United States v. Lee) much relied on to support the jurisdiction in this case, as it is designated in the reports and usually cited, is well calculated to mislead, by conveying the impression that the United States was a party to the action in that case. The fact, however, is otherwise. The action was brought against Kaufman and others, as individuals, in the State court and removed to the Circuit Court of the United States. Thereupon the attorney general filed a suggestion, setting forth certain facts upon which he claimed that the court could not take jurisdiction of the case, and moved to set aside all the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, saying expressly that he appeared only for the purpose of such motion. The plaintiff having recovered judgment in the Circuit Court, two writs of error were sued out—one in the name of the United States, and the other in the name of Kaufman and others, *the defendants against whom judgment was rendered. That the United States was not a party, is apparent from the following language used in the opinion of the court: "As the United States was not a party to the suit below, and while defending the action by its proper law officers, expressly declined to submit itself as a defendant to the jurisdiction of the court, there may exist some doubt whether it has a right to prosecute the writ of error in its own name; but as the judgment against Kaufman and Strong is here on their writ of error, under which all the questions are raised which could be raised under the other, their writ being prosecuted in the interest of the United States, and argued here by the solicitor general, the point is immaterial, and the question has not been mooted." The whole decision shows clearly that the case turned entirely upon the question whether an individual who, when sued for a trespass, undertakes to justify under the title of the United States, can maintain such defence without establishing the validity of such title. It is clear, therefore, that this case was properly placed by Mr. Justice Miller in the second class, when, in Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., he was classifying the various cases in which the court could take jurisdiction.

Now let us examine the case presented for our determination in the light of these decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which we have resorted in the absence of any cases in our own state upon the point involved. It certainly cannot be pretended that the case falls within either the first or third of the classes in which Mr. Justice Miller arranged the cases in the case of Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., and we think it equally clear that it does not fall within the second class. The action is not brought against the defendants as individuals for a tort, from which they are seeking to defend themselves by some act or order of the State government; but the action is brought against them as commissioners of the sinking fund to recover property alleged to be in their possession officially. Indeed, the person or officer, the secretary of State, who, it is conceded, has the actual possession of the property, has not been made a party to the action, and the claim against the defendants as officers or agents of the State government is rested solely upon *the ground that the secretary of State, who has the actual possession of the property, holds it "subject to the directions and instructions of the commissioners of the sinking fund," who are therefore sued as the only parties having the right to control the disposition of the property in question.

Now, unless the property is held and claimed as the property of the State, it is very manifest that the defendants, as commissioners of the sinking fund, have nothing whatever to do with it, and never having had it in their actual possession, they would not, on that ground, be amenable to an action for its delivery. For the act (section 60 of the General Statutes) only requires the secretary of State to take charge of "the property of the State" and hold "the same subject to the directions and instructions of the commissioners of the sinking fund," and hence if the property in question is not held and claimed as the property of the State, then it is clear that the commissioners of the sinking fund have nothing more to do with it, and are under no more responsibility for it than for any other property of a third person which may happen either wrongfully or accidentally to be in the actual possession of the person who holds the office of secretary of State. If, then, the property is to be regarded as in the official possession of the secretary of State, held and claimed as the property of the State, and as such subject to the control of the commissioners of the sinking fund, it would seem to be clear that the action is, in fact, though not in form, an action against the State itself; for in such case, as the State can only hold possession of personal property by or through an officer or agent, the possession of the officer or agent is the possession of the State, and the State is an indispensable party to any contest for the right of possession.

Even if the possession of the State was originally acquired by some wrongful act of some one of its officers or agents (though it is difficult to see how this could be judicially determined until the question of jurisdiction is first disposed of), still no action could be maintained by the rightful owner to recover possession against an officer of the State government holding and claiming the property as the property of the State when sued as such; because in such case, the State being the real party in interest, *would be an indispensable party to the action, and as she could not be made a party without her consent, the action could not be maintained in any court, and the claimant would be remitted to his remedy by petition to the legislature, just as in the case of all other claims against the State, where, if his claim be well founded, it is not permissible to doubt he would receive ample justice. If, however, the action should be brought against the person in possession as an individual, and he, in his defence, seeks to justify his possession by alleging title to, or right of possession in, the State, then, as in the case of United States v. Lee, supra, he must establish such title or right of possession, and if he fails to do so, judgment goes against him as an individual.

The reason for the distinction is obvious. In the former case the party in possession being sued as an officer, judgment can only go against him as such, and not against him as an individual, for he is not sued as such; and as the only property which he holds as an officer is the property of the State, it is clear that the State is the real party in interest, as it is out of her property alone that the judgment sought to be recovered can be satisfied. But in the latter case, where the party in possession is sued as an individual, the judgment can only be enforced against the individual property of the defendant, and the State is not necessarily interested and is not therefore the real party in interest. Take this very case as an illustration. Suppose it should become necessary to enforce the alternative money decree, against whose property could it be enforced? Certainly not against the individual property of the persons named as defendants, for no claim against them as individuals has been established. If it is proposed to enforce such judgment against the property held by them as commissioners of the sinking fund, the answer would be that all of the property so held is the property of the State, which, of course, even if the State enjoyed no more exemption from suit than a private citizen, could not be reached under such judgment, as she was not a party to the action in which the judgment was recovered, according to the only theory upon which the action could be maintained. True, it may be said that it is not likely that it will be necessary to enforce the alternative money decree; *but that cannot affect the legal question involved. If the judgment is a valid one at all, it is just as valid in the one alternative as in the other; for if the court had jurisdiction of the case, the judgment as rendered was not only authorized, but required by the conclusions as to the facts and the law reached by the Circuit Judge. It seems to us, therefore, that the fact that the judgment rendered in this case cannot, in one of its alternatives, be enforced, because it goes against the property of the State, shows conclusively that the action was in fact, though not in form, an action against the State, of which neither this court nor the court below has any jurisdiction.

The cases of The State v. The President and Directors of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, 1 S. C., 63; Dabney, Morgan & Co. v. The Bank of the State, 3 Id., 124; Bank of the United States v. The Planters Bank, 9 Wheat., 904 [6 L. Ed. 244]; Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Peters, 318 [7 L. Ed. 437]; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257 [9 L. Ed. 709]; Darrington v. State Bank of Alabama, 13 How., 12 [14 L. Ed. 30]; and Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 304 [14 L. Ed. 705], relied on by the counsel for the plaintiff, have all been carefully examined, and do not appear to us to be applicable to the present inquiry. These cases, so far as we are at present concerned with them, only decide that the fact that a State owns a part or the whole of the stock of a banking corporation, does not exempt such corporation from suit under the rule that a State cannot be sued without its consent. Aside from the fact, which of itself would be conclusive of the inapplicability of these cases, that in most, and probably all of them, the charters of the corporations contained express provisions that they could sue and be sued, it is well settled that, in the eye of the law, a corporation and the individuals who compose it are totally distinct and different persons. Hence an action against a corporation can never be regarded or treated as an action against the individuals who hold its stock. Without some special provision in the charter to that effect, or some general law of the State, the individuals who compose the corporation are not only not to be regarded as parties to an action brought against it, but their individual property could not be reached under a judgment against the corporation. From this it follows naturally and logically that when an artificial person *called a corporation is brought into existence, it, like all other persons, natural as well as artificial, may be subjected to the process of the courts, and the fact that its stock is owned in part or in whole by the State, confers upon it no exemption from suit, as the corporation and the persons who compose it are totally distinct and different persons.

It is argued, however, that when the State established the office of land commissioner, who was charged with certain specific duties, to wit: the buying of lands and selling them in small parcels to actual settlers, and set apart a fund, the proceeds of the sale of bonds issued for that purpose, to be used in paying for the lands so purchased, that fund was as much separated from the other funds of the State and placed under the control of the land commissioner, as the capital provided for the Bank of the State was separated from the other funds of the State and placed under the control of the president and directors of that institution, and that as the latter was subject to suit in the courts of the State upon any contract made by them, so could the former, as the State, in such case, could not be regarded as a necessary party to the action, and hence no exemption from suit on that account could be claimed. It will be observed, however, that the land commissioner, neither singly nor in conjunction with the advisory board, was ever constituted a corporation while the bank was, and therefore the analogy would not hold good.

But even assuming, for the purposes of this inquiry, that the land commissioner could, in his own name, sue or be sued upon any contract made by him in the performance of his official duties, it must be remembered that that office has long since been abolished, and all the funds and property pertaining thereto have been placed in the hands of the secretary of State, along with all the other property of the State, the custody of which is not otherwise provided for by law, and hence such funds and property are no longer separated from the other assets of the State, but along with such assets are directed to be applied to the payment of the debt of the State. There is, therefore, now no longer any separate agency entrusted with a specific fund, in regard to which such agency can contract and be contracted with, as was formerly the case in reference to the land commissioner and the Bank of the State. So that, besides the fact that the land commissioner was never made a corporation as the Bank of the State was, there is this additional objection to the view contended for by the plaintiff. The State has resumed the possession and control of all the assets heretofore entrusted to the land commissioner for a specific purpose, and has appropriated these assets, along with others, to the general purpose of the payment of the public debt.

If, however, in resuming the possession and control of the books and papers heretofore entrusted to the land commissioner the State has acquired the possession of any property belonging to the plaintiff, upon which the State has no rightful claim, this court cannot permit itself to doubt, that upon a showing to that effect made in the proper way for a claim against the State to be presented, that restitution will be made upon such terms as are just; but no action against the State or any officer thereof entrusted with the custody of such property, can be maintained in the courts of this State for want of jurisdiction.

Having reached the conclusion that neither this court nor the court below has any jurisdiction of this case, because it is in fact though not in form an action against the State, we have no authority to consider any other question arising in the case, and anything which we might say would be an extrajudicial utterance, in which this court has no disposition to indulge.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, without prejudice as to the merits of the claim.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. The action below was brought to recover certain personal property claimed by the plaintiff, and alleged by him to be in the wrongful possession of the defendants, as commissioners of the sinking fund, upon whom a demand had been made and refused. The defendants admitted in substance that they, as said commissioners, had control of the property sued for, and they claimed that the title to said property was in the State; that they held as trustees for the State, and were not authorized to deliver it to the plaintiff until the rights and equities of the State in the premises should be judicially determined, setting up a counter-claim against the plaintiff for some $3,000. Judgment below was for the plaintiff on the merits. On appeal to this court by the defendants, for the first time a question of jurisdiction was raised to determine which a re-argument was ordered on the single point, to wit: Whether or not the action below, though not in form, was yet in substance, and fact an action against the State. Upon this re-argument my brethren having determined that the action is against the State, have adjudged that the complaint be dismissed for the want of jurisdiction. In this opinion I have not been able to concur for the reasons following:

*429

I do not deny the legal proposition that the State cannot be sued in the courts of this State, except by its own consent. This doctrine is too well settled and too firmly established to intimate even a doubt in reference thereto. And I fully concur in its correctness. But I take issue with the majority on the proposition that the State has been sued, or is in any way a party to the action below, and I therefore fail to see the applicability to the case of the principle that the State cannot be sued, upon which the complaint has been ordered to be dismissed.

The question, then, is, was the action below against the State in such sense as on that account it should be dismissed, the State not having consented to be sued? It is nowhere contended that the State is named as a party on the record, nor has there been any attempt to summon her by the service of any process, nor has she voluntarily appeared as one of the defendants. It is said, however, that the State may still be regarded as a party to the issue involved, to wit: the title to the property in question is really between the plaintiff and her, notwithstanding she is not named in the record, and no effort has been made by the plaintiff to make her a party. The only cases where this question has been raised are certain cases heard and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, and I concur with the statement in the majority opinion that these cases are not entirely consistent with each other.

In Osborn v. The U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat., 739 [6 L. Ed. 204], the bank instituted proceedings against Osborn, auditor of the State of Ohio, to restrain him from enforcing an act of the State of Ohio against the *bank in reference to collecting certain taxes imposed by the act. One of the positions taken in the case was: "That in fact the bill was against the State, and as such the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction." This point (which is the exact point here) seems to have been fully considered by the Supreme Court on appeal. It was conceded on all sides that the defendants on the record had no personal interest whatever in the suit, and that their connection therewith was simply official as agents of the State of Ohio, and that the State alone was really interested in the result. With this fact admitted, Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, after fully discussing the question whether the jurisdiction of the court as to the parties depended upon the character of those whose interest is litigated, or of those who are parties to the record, concludes the discussion of that branch of the case, with the following emphatic declaration: "But the principle seems too well established to require that more time should be devoted to it. It may, we think, be laid down as a rule which admits of no exception, that, in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named on the record." And further: "The State not being a party on the record, and the court having jurisdiction over those who are parties on the record, the true question is, not one of jurisdiction, but whether, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court ought to make a decree against the defendants, whether they are to be considered as having a real interest, or as being only nominal parties." This case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1824, the precise question involved here being involved there. The court held that the State of Ohio not being named as a party on the record was no party to the suit, although her rights and interests were alone involved, and being no such party, the jurisdiction of the court was not ousted. Therefore the case proceeded to judgment against Osborn, the auditor.

In Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203 [21 L. Ed. 447], decided in 1872, the doctrine of Osborn v. The Bank of the United States was distinctly affirmed and the principles redeclared in terms as follows, to wit: "That where the State is concerned the State should be made a party if it can be done. That it cannot be done is a sufficient reason *for the omission to do it, and the case may proceed to decree against her officers in all respects as if she were a party to the record;" that in deciding who are parties to the suit, the court will not look beyond the record: that making a State officer a party does not make the State a party, although her law prompt his action, and she may stand behind him as the real party in interest; that a State can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case." And Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion, refers to Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How., 331 [15 L. Ed. 401]; The State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 16 How., 369 [14 L. Ed. 977]; The Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436 [17 L. Ed. 173]; Ohio Life & Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How., 432 [14 L. Ed. 997]; and The Mechanics & Traders Bank v. Debolt, 18 How., 380 [15 L. Ed. 458], as proceeding upon the same principles and controlled by the authority of Osborn v. U. S. Bank, supra, with respect to the jurisdictional question arising in each of those cases as to the defendants.

It is said, however, in the majority opinion, that these cases are inconsistent with the recent cases from the Supreme Court of the United States, and especially with the cases of Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S., 711 [2 Sup. Ct. 128, 27 L. Ed. 448]; Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., 109 U. S., 446 [3 Sup. Ct. 292, 609, 27 L. Ed. 992]; and Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S., 52 [6 Sup. Ct. 608, 29 L. Ed. 805]. It may be that these latter cases, especially Louisiana v. Jumel, and Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., cannot be fully harmonized with the cases referred to above, but those older cases were not overruled by these latter ones. On the contrary, in the opinion of the court in each of these latter cases the former ones, especially Osborn v. Bank and Davis v. Gray, the two leading cases on that line, were recognized and the principle which governed therein distinguished from said latter cases, leaving both classes standing and of force. In Hagood v. Southern, supra, Mr. Justice Matthews, after discussing the principle applied in a class of cases to which Osborn v. The Bank belonged, as compared with the case then before the court, said: "A broad line of demarcation separates from such cases as the present (Hagood v. Southern) in which the decrees require, by affirmative official action on the part of the defendants, the performance of an obligation which belongs to the State in its political capacity—those in which actions at law or suits in equity are maintained against defendants who, while claiming to act as officers of the State, violate and invade the personal and property rights of the plaintiff under color of authority, unconstitutional and void," &c.

With the cases from the Supreme Court of the United States then standing in this way, I do not think it can be successfully claimed that that court has established the principle even for its own government, that where the issue involved is one between a State alone and the plaintiff, the defendants being only agents and officers of the State and asserting the rights of the State, that the State in every such case must be regarded as a party, thereby ousting the jurisdiction of the court, although she is not named on the record as a party. On the contrary, I think that each case as to this question must depend upon its own facts, the fact of the State being held a party or not, depending upon the further fact, whether the suit is intended, on the one hand, to enforce by affirmative official action on the part of the defendants the performance of an obligation which belongs to the State in its political capacity, or, on the other, is to redress or restrain the violation of some personal or property right, inflicted or threatened under the color of official authority. If the case belongs to the first class, then under the principle of Louisiana v. Jumel, Cunningham v. Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., and Hagood v. Southern, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States no doubt would hold, that the State, though not named as a party, would still be held to be a party sufficiently so to oust the jurisdiction. But if it belonged to the second class, under the authority of Osborn v. The United States Bank, and Davis v. Gray, supra, it would allow the action to proceed, at least to the point of determining whether the defendants were rightfully acting under and by the authority of the State; or, rather, whether the right asserted by them for the State rested upon a sound foundation.

In my opinion, the case below belonged to this latter class. It was an action to redress an alleged wrong inflicted upon the property rights of the plaintiff under the color of official authority, and the State not being named as a party, nor any process *prayed, or attempted against her, she is no party—certainly not in such sense as to demand a dismissal of the complaint for the want of jurisdiction.

The majority opinion, however, is based more especially upon the case of Cunningham v. The Macon & Brunswick R. R. Co., supra, in which Mr. Justice Miller in delivering the opinion of the court, after laying down the doctrine: "That wherever it can be clearly seen that the State is an indispensable party to enable the court, according to the rules which govern its procedure, to grant the relief sought, it will refuse the jurisdiction," which he says is a conceded principle in all the cases; and after adding, "that the courts have gone a long way in some instances, in holding the State not to be a necessary party, though her interest may be more or less affected," proceeds to classify the cases in which this has been done, dividing the cases into the three classes mentioned in the majority opinion. My brethren adopt this classification, and they undertake to show that the case at bar does not belong to either of these classes. This, it appears to me, is changing the question before the court. The question before us is not whether the court can proceed to judgment without the State being a party, but it is whether the State is a party. The question whether we can pronounce judgment against the defendants in the absence of the State, appears to me to be a very different question from whether the State is a party. In the latter case, which is the question that has been discussed before us, if the State is held a party, then the jurisdiction is gone at once without further argument or investigation; but in the former case, the merits are somewhat involved, and must be examined before a judgment can be reached.

In this view of the matter it does not seem to me, so far as the question before us is concerned, to be very material, whether or not the case at bar belongs to either of the classes mentioned by Mr. Justice Miller. But suppose that it does not belong to either one of these classes. Does it follow necessarily, that the court could not proceed to judgment, the State being absent? I do not understand that Mr. Justice Miller excludes every other case except those belonging to one or other of the classes mentioned by him. He simply classifies the cases in which the court has *heretofore acted, and declares that in those cases the jurisdiction of the court has been maintained; but he does not hold, that these are the only cases in which that jurisdiction could attach.

But is it clear that the case at bar is outside of the classification as it stands? Is it not embraced in the principle of the second class? To the second class belongs United States v. Lee (106 U. S., 196 [1 Sup. Ct. 240, 27 L. Ed. 171]), and cases of that character, where officers and agents of the government are sued for property which they hold not in their own individual right, but as officers and agents, and their defence is title and possession in the government, and not in themselves personally. That was the case of the United States v. Lee, where the defendants were holding "Arlington" as the agents and officers of the United States, and had been thus holding for ten years or more, as public property—a national cemetery. They were sued for possession by Lee. The United States interposed by its attorney, claiming that the United States was a party, or rather was an indispensable party, and the United States could not be sued; that the court therefore had no jurisdiction and could not proceed. The court held otherwise, and the case went to judgment, in favor of Lee.

Now, the facts in that case are almost identical in their character with the facts here. Here the plaintiff sues for personal property, the title of which is evidently in him. The defendants admit possession, they do not deny that that possession reached them through an illegal act of the former land commissioner, as charged in the complaint, but they claim that they are holding not in their own right, but for the State, who has a claim against the plaintiff, which they demand should be settled before they are required to deliver to him his property. These are the facts. How do they differ in character from those in United States v. Lee? I can see no difference.

But it is said there is a difference in the character of the actions in the two cases; that in Lee and United States, the action was against the defendants as individuals, and not as officers and agents, and that in the case below the action was against the defendants as officers and agents, and not as individuals. That is true. There is that difference between the cases, but does that demand the application of different principles to facts which are nearly the same? In Lee and United States, the court held, that the defendants could not oust the jurisdiction of the court by interposing the defense that they were officers, and holding entirely for the government, which was a known and admitted fact. This being so, how can that jurisdiction be affected, when they are sued as such officers? What difference can it make, whether the character of the holding appears from the plaintiff in his complaint, or from the defence set up in the answer of the defendants? The principle set up in Lee and United States was, that holding for the State did not in itself, and proprio vigore, oust the jurisdiction of the court, preventing all further investigations; but that, in such case, the action should proceed until it was determined that the holding was rightful and legal.

I cannot see why that principle should not still apply in a case like that before the court, where the plaintiff alleges that the defendants are in possession of his property, as State officials, claiming for the State, but that they are wrongfully so, because his title is better than that of the State, and where the defendants admit that they are holding for the State, claiming title in the State. There can be no doubt that the same principle is involved in each of the cases, to wit: whether the defendants' claim is founded on legal grounds, which can only be determined by assuming jurisdiction and by investigating the question. It is admitted that this can be done where the matter of the right of the State is set up as a defence by the defendants, when sued as individuals, but it is denied, where the character of the holding is alleged in the complaint (because such are the facts of the case), and the defendants are sued as officials. It appears to me that this would be technical to an extreme degree, and subversive of right and justice.

I do not think that the State is a party to the action. Nor do I think that it is indispensable that she should be a party, so as to enable the court to render a judgment—the court having jurisdiction of the defendants, against whom a judgment may be made, the State still having the right to assert her claim, if any. I therefore cannot concur in the majority opinion.

Judgment reversed.

25 S. C. *436

*BAILEY v. COLTON.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Trusts ⚭357.]

Where a creditor receives trust funds from his debtor, in payment on the debt, not knowing of the trust, he is not implicated in his debtor's breach of trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 539; Dec. Dig. ⚭357.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⚭994.]

This court will rarely, if ever, disturb the findings of fact of the Circuit Judge, where they depend upon the credibility of witnesses examined openly before him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3901–3906; Dec. Dig. ⚭994.]

[3. Trusts ⇐357.]

Mrs. C. borrowed money from N. on a bond and mortgage, and then lent it to her husband on his note. Afterwards C. made a payment to N. on this bond and credited the amount on the note. This payment was made by C. with trust funds, but neither N. nor Mrs. C. knew this. A year later, after threat of suit by the cestui que trust, Mrs. C. gave a second mortgage to N. in part, to indemnify him, if required to refund this payment. Held, that Mrs. C. could not be required to refund this money, and that the indemnity given by her to N. did not ratify her husband's misconduct nor enure to the benefit of the cestui que trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 539; Dec. Dig. ⇐357.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐169.]

Points not raised nor considered on Circuit are not properly before this court for review.

Before Wallace, J., Union, June, 1885.

The appeal in this case was from the following Circuit decree:

It is not necessary that authorities should be cited in support of the proposition that the payment of trust funds upon the debt of the trustee or of his wife is a breach of trust. Upon the consummation of such an act the sureties upon the bond of the trustee become immediately liable. The person to whom the payment is made is also immediately liable for the amount so received, if he was aware that the sum so paid him was paid in trust funds. If, however, the payee received in good faith, without notice, and the money itself cannot be identified, no right of action exists against him. 1 Perry Trusts, § 346; Hudnal v. Wilder, 4 McCord, 300 [17 Am. Dec. 744]. Now, as matter of fact, did Nicholson know or have reasonable grounds of belief that the money paid him by Colton was trust funds? It will be remembered that it was in January, 1884, that Nicholson went with Thomas Bailey to Colton. There is nothing to show that any of the subsequent steps in the matter of the appointment of the guardian was known to Nicholson, or *that he knew when Colton received his ward's money. Colton was in active business as a merchant, supposed to be handling more or less money every day, and it was past the middle of April, three months after the interview between Bailey, Colton, and Nicholson, before Colton paid Nicholson the eight hundred dollars. Although Colton was all the time insolvent, there is no sufficient proof to show in opposition to Nicholson's testimony that Nicholson knew of his, Colton's, insolvency. Colton testifies that he did not tell Nicholson that the money he paid him was trust funds, and Nicholson testifies that Colton did not tell him, and he did not know it. I therefore find that Nicholson did not know that seven hundred dollars of the sum paid by Colton was trust funds, and that he, therefore, is not a party to the breach of trust and not liable in this action.

There can be no doubt that seven hundred dollars of the money paid to Nicholson was funds of Mary R. Bailey. The facts show it and Colton admits it. Mrs. Colton was also made aware of it, and agrees to save Nicholson harmless from any liability in consequence of it. She thus, after being aware of the facts, accepts the benefit of the payment of trust funds by her husband upon her debt, and by indemnifying Nicholson assumes the burden of defending the transaction. John E. Colton paid the money on his wife's debt. The payment of the debt was an obligation upon her. To the extent of the payment he discharged her obligation; he, therefore, did act and assumed to act for her. When the matter is afterwards brought to her attention by Nicholson, she accepts the advantage of the payment and claims to hold it. A manifested intention, with knowledge of the circumstances to accept and retain the benefits of an act by any one for whom the act was done, is a ratification of the act, whether previously authorized or not, and makes the actor agent of the person who ratifies. Story Agency, §§ 252, 253, et seq.

It is obvious, therefore, that the execution of the second mortgage to Nicholson by Mrs. Colton and the stipulation entered upon it in regard to the repayment by Mrs. Colton of the money paid to Nicholson by John E. Colton was a ratification of the payment, which had the effect to make John E. Colton the agent of Mrs. Colton in the transaction.

Such a ratification not only *created the agency, but had the same effect as an original authority to bind the principal in regard to third persons. "An act done by an agent which would, if authorized, give an action for damages to a third person against the principal, will, if subsequently ratified by the principal, give the same right to damages against him, as much so as if the action was founded on a ratified contract of the agent.

In short, it is treated throughout as if the act was originally authorized; for the ratification relates back to the time of the inception of the transaction and has a complete retroactive efficacy. * * * Hence it is that if the agent has made a contract without authority from his principal or beyond his authority, and it is afterwards ratified, the principal may generally sue and be sued thereon, in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had originally given the authority." Story Agency, § 244, et seq.

It thus appears from the law and the facts that John E. Colton was in effect acting by the direction and authority of his wife, Mrs. R. W. Colton, when he paid the money to Nicholson for her. The legal effect of the transactions taken together is, that John E. Colton committed a breach of trust by the direction of his principal, Mrs. R. W. Colton, of which Mrs. Colton received the benefit. This state of facts makes Mrs. Colton liable for the repayment of the money. At page 472 of Story's Agency, the following language occurs: "If the principal should direct his agent to commit a trespass, or to make a conversion of the property of a third person, or he should subsequently ratify or adopt the act, when done for his own use or benefit, he would be liable as an original trespasser or wrongdoer."

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that John E. Colton do account for his actings and doings as guardian of Mary R. Bailey, and for any sums received by him and not properly paid out as such guardian, and for all sums properly chargeable against him as such guardian, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against John E. Colton and his sureties, A. D. Spears and Joshua C. Spears.

It is further ordered and adjudged, that for the sums for which the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, as above adjudged, John E. Colton is primarily liable as between him and his sureties, and *that the plaintiff do have judgment against Rosalie W. Colton for the sum of seven hundred dollars and interest thereon from April 18, 1885, and that for this sum Mrs. Colton is primarily liable, as between her and the sureties upon the guardianship bond of John E. Colton, and for the payment of this sum so much of the bond and mortgage executed by Mrs. Colton to W. A. Nicholson on 5th February, 1885, shall stand as security, and the plaintiff here shall have all such rights in regard to said security necessary to enforce her right under it.

It is further ordered and adjudged, that as to W. A. Nicholson the complaint be dismissed.

Mr. William Munro, for plaintiff.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for Mrs. Colton and Nicholson.

July 19, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant, Mrs. Rosalie W. Colton, being indebted to her co-defendant, Nicholson, for money borrowed by her and loaned to her husband, John E. Colton, another defendant, on his own note, to assist him in carrying on his mercantile business, on May 1, 1883, executed her bond to Nicholson in the sum of nineteen hundred and thirty-five dollars, and to secure the payment thereof gave him a mortgage on her house and lot, which was her separate property. On January 15, 1884, John E. Colton was appointed guardian of the plaintiff, and on that day executed his bond, with the other two defendants, A. D. Spears and J. C. Spears, as his sureties, for the faithful performance of his duties as such guardian. On April 15, 1884, John E.

Colton received about two thousand dollars, proceeds of a policy of insurance on the life of plaintiff's deceased father, to which the plaintiff and her mother were entitled in equal portions, and on the same day deposited the whole amount received in the bank at Union to his individual credit, which after the application by the bank of about three hundred dollars to previous overdrafts of John E. Colton, left about seventeen hundred dollars to his credit. On April 18, 1884, John E. Colton drew from the bank on a check payable to himself or bearer, seven hundred dollars in *currency, which, after adding thereto one hundred dollars taken out of his store, he paid to Nicholson on the bond of his wife hereinbefore referred to, and at the same time took credit on his note to his wife for the amount, to wit: the sum of eight hundred dollars.

On February 5, 1885, Nicholson having heard a rumor that an effort would be made to require him to refund the amount thus paid to him on the bond of Mrs. Colton by her husband, upon the ground that he had used his ward's funds in making such payment, and John E. Colton in the meantime, to wit: on January 29, 1885, having failed and made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, he (Nicholson) obtained from Mrs. Colton a new bond for the balance due upon the old bond, and also covering three hundred dollars which Nicholson had loaned to Colton in December, 1884, with the additional sum of eight hundred and ninety-five dollars, being the sum, with interest, paid by Colton to Nicholson on the original bond of his wife, which last mentioned bond was secured by a mortgage of the same property. Thereupon the first bond and mortgage seem to have been marked satisfied. At the time the last bond was given it was understood between Mrs. Colton and Nicholson that this sum of eight hundred and ninety-five dollars was to be paid by Mrs. Colton only upon the contingency that Nicholson should be required to refund the money paid him by Colton with his ward's funds, and this understanding was evidenced by an endorsement on said bond to that effect.

On April 15, 1885, this action was commenced, wherein judgment was demanded that an account be taken of Colton's guardianship; that plaintiff have judgment against defendants for the balance found due her upon such accounting; and that the mortgages hereinbefore mentioned be set up and declared securities for plaintiff's benefit.

The case was heard by Judge Wallace, who found that there was a breach of trust upon the part of the guardian in applying seven hundred dollars of his ward's funds in the payment made by him on the bond; that Nicholson, however, was not privy to such breach of trust, as there was no sufficient proof that he knew of Colton's insolvency at the time, or that he knew the money *paid him constituted any part of the ward's estate: that Colton in making the payment was acting as the agent of his wife, and although she may not have known at the time of the payment that the ward's funds were used for the purpose, yet this fact being known to her agent, whose act she subsequently ratified and accepted the benefit of, made her a participant in the original breach of trust by her husband and agent. He therefore rendered judgment that John E. Colton do account as guardian, and that the plaintiff have judgment against him and the defendants who are his sureties for the balance found due to the plaintiff upon such accounting: that as between him and his sureties, John E. Colton is primarily liable; "and that the plaintiff do have judgment against Rosalie W. Colton for the sum of seven hundred dollars and interest thereon from April 18, 1884, and that for this sum Mrs. Colton is primarily liable, as between her and the sureties upon the guardianship bond of John E. Colton, and for the payment of this sum so much of the bond and mortgage executed by Mrs. Colton to W. A. Nicholson on February 5, 1885, shall stand as security, and the plaintiff here shall have all such rights in regard to said security necessary to enforce her rights under it." He further adjudged that as to W. A. Nicholson the complaint be dismissed.

From this judgment the plaintiff and the defendant, J. C. Spears, who makes common cause with her (the defendant, A. D. Spears, who seems to have been insolvent, having died pending the trial), appeal upon the ground of error in dismissing the complaint as against the defendant, Nicholson; and Mrs. Rosalie W. Colton appeals upon the ground of error in fixing any liability upon her. The several grounds of appeal are set out in the record, but need not be repeated here, as we do not propose to consider them seriatim, but rather to determine the several questions which we understand these several grounds to raise.

The appeal on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant, Spears, raises a question of fact only: for unless some notice is brought home to Nicholson that Colton was using trust funds in making the payment to him, it is quite clear that Nicholson cannot be implicated in Colton's breach of trust. According to the well settled rule the finding of the Circuit Judge cannot be disturbed, *unless it is without any evidence to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. So far from this being the case, we think the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge may well be supported by the testimony. It is true that there is some testimony tending to show that Nicholson knew that Colton was using the funds of his ward in making the payment, but it seems to us that the preponderance of the evidence is the other way. The testimony tending to show knowledge on the part of Nicholson is not very clear and distinct, while, on the other hand, the testimony of Nicholson and John E. Colton, if credited, conclusively shows a want of knowledge on the part of Nicholson, and, as we have said in several cases, where there is a conflict of testimony, and the result depends upon the credibility of the witnesses, this court will very rarely, if ever, disturb the conclusion reached by a Circuit Judge.

The appeal on the part of Mrs. Colton raises the following questions: 1st. Did the Circuit Judge err in holding that the facts in evidence showed that John E. Colton, when he made the payment to Nicholson, was acting as the agent of his wife, and that her subsequent ratification of this act of her agent, and adoption of the benefit of it, constitute her a participant in the breach of trust which he then committed, and as such responsible for it? 2nd. Can a married woman be made responsible out of her separate estate for a breach of trust committed by her husband? 3rd. Can a married woman, since the amendment to the married women's act, adopted in 1882, execute a valid mortgage to secure the repayment of money borrowed for her husband's use?

It seems to us that the Circuit Judge, in reaching his conclusion as to the liability of Mrs. Colton, overlooked the important fact that these parties stood towards each other not only in the relation of husband and wife, but also in that of debtor and creditor. The fact that she was the wife of John E. Colton does not by any means authorize the inference that she was acquainted with his financial affairs; for all experience shows that the wife is oftentimes woefully ignorant of her husband's pecuniary condition, and knows nothing of his business affairs. And as there is not a particle of evidence in this case that

Mrs. Colton knew that her *husband had received any money for his ward, or even knew that he had been appointed guardian, or had any knowledge whatever of the payment to Nicholson until long after it had been made, we think, in considering this question, she should be looked at, not as the wife of Colton, but as his creditor.

Looking at her then in this light solely, what was, practically, the transaction here brought in question? Was it, in effect, anything, more or less, than the payment on a debt due by Colton to his wife through Nicholson? And if, as was properly held by the Circuit Judge, the payment made by Colton to Nicholson, even though made with trust funds, would not implicate Nicholson in the breach of trust, without proof that Nicholson knew at the time that the money used in making the payment to him constituted a part of the trust funds, we are unable to see why, upon the same principle, Mrs. Colton should not be relieved from any imputation of participating in the breach of trust, when, as we have seen, she was entirely innocent of any knowledge, at the time of the payment, of the character of the funds used in making the payment, or of the source from whence they were derived by Colton.

True, she knew it afterwards, and so did Nicholson; but this knowledge, acquired nearly a year after Colton had committed the breach of trust, by using his ward's funds in making the payment, certainly cannot have the effect of implicating either Nicholson or Mrs. Colton in such breach of trust. Suppose that John E. Colton, instead of making the payment directly to Nicholson on his wife's bond, had first paid the money to her on the note which he had previously given to her for borrowed money, and she had then sent the money to Nicholson by her husband, or by any third person, to be applied to her bond to Nicholson, could it be pretended, in such a case, that Mrs. Colton could be implicated in the breach of trust committed by her husband, in the absence of any evidence that she knew, at the time, the trust character of the funds she was receiving? Surely not. As soon as the money was thus paid to her it became absolutely hers, to do with as she pleased; and money having no earmarks by which it could be followed, the cestui que trust would lose all right to it, and must look for reimbursement to the person alone *to whose guardianship it was committed, and the sureties on his bond. This, it seems to us, was, practically, the real character of the transaction; and the fact that the husband, instead of some indifferent third person, was used as the means of conveying the money to Nicholson, cannot alter the true character of the transaction.

Nor do we see how the subsequent conduct of Mrs. Colton can be regarded as either an adoption or ratification of the previous breach of trust committed by her husband. When, in February, 1885, nearly a year after Colton had committed the breach of trust, his wife for the first time heard, or, so far as the evidence shows, even had reason to suspect, that her husband had thus misapplied the trust funds, what does she do? She does not enter into any agreement or contract to indemnify and save harmless her husband's ward against any loss by reason of the misconduct of her husband, but she simply agrees to indemnify a third person, Nicholson, against any loss which he might sustain by reason of her husband's misconduct. Under the circumstances, this was quite natural, and perhaps commendable, on the part of Mrs. Colton, for it seems that Nicholson had been in the habit of befriending her husband, and that she had previously undertaken to guarantee him against any loss which he might sustain by reason of such friendly acts, by mortgaging her separate property to Nicholson. When, therefore, it was apprehended that Nicholson might become a loser by the improper act of Colton, what more natural than that Mrs. Colton should do as she had done before, step forward and shield the friend of her husband from such apprehended loss? But how this can be regarded as an adoption or ratification of her husband's previous breach of trust, we are unable to perceive. It was simply a contract on the part of Mrs. Colton to indemnify her friend, Nicholson, and how it can be converted into an agreement to indemnify a wholly different person, the plaintiff in this case, with whom there was no privity, we are unable to understand.

The Circuit Judge, in speaking of this branch of the case, and of the conduct of Mrs. Colton in giving the second bond and mortgage to Nicholson, falls into an error, which we regard as fundamental, in using this language: "She thus, after being *aware of the facts, accepts the benefit of the payment of trust funds by her husband upon her debt, and by indemnifying Nicholson assumes the burden of defending the transaction." It is a mistake to say that she accepted the benefit of the payment, "after being aware of the facts." On the contrary, she had not only accepted, but had enjoyed, the benefit of the payment for nearly a year before she had the slightest knowledge of the facts. If she had so chosen, she could, when informed of her husband's breach of trust, have stood out and declined to come to the aid of any of the parties, and in the absence of any evidence whatever of notice to her of the trust character of the funds, she would have been entitled to the full benefit of the payment, as an executed transaction—not executory—which required some act or acquiescence on her part to complete it, and which could not be undone as to her without proof of such notice. On the other hand, if she had so desired, she might have agreed to indemnify the plaintiff against any loss which she might sustain by reason of the misapplication of her funds; or she might have undertaken to indemnify Nicholson against any loss which he might sustain by reason of the improper receipt by him from her husband of trust funds (if such should prove to be the case). She chose to do the latter and did not choose to do the former; and we do not see how she can be held liable to the plaintiff, whom she did not agree to indemnify, because she saw fit to indemnify another person, who owes no duty to, and stands in no privity with, the plaintiff.

Under this view of the case, the other questions raised by Mrs. Colton cannot properly arise, and need not, therefore, be considered. Indeed, so far as appears from the "Case," the points raised by those questions do not seem to have been presented to or passed upon by the Circuit Judge, and are, therefore, not properly before us.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it adjudges any liability against Mrs. Rosalie W. Colton, be reversed, and that in all other respects it be affirmed.

*COLEMAN v. WILMINGTON, COLUMBIA & AUGUSTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Master and Servant ⚭190.]

The conductor of a material train, even in the matter of readjusting a switch, is not a fellow-servant with a laborer on his train, but is a representative of the master.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rhodes v. Southern Ry., 68 S. C. 506, 47 S. E. 689; Richey v. Southern Ry., 69 S. C. 387, 391, 393, 394, 48 S. E. 285.

[2. Master and Servant ⚭286.]

A railroad company is not liable to one of its servants for the consequences of an isolated act of a third person over whom the company has no control; but where the company had ground for believing that a switch had been previously opened with a false key, and a train thrown off its proper track, the Circuit Judge properly submitted to the jury whether the company had been guilty of negligence in failing to take proper precautions to prevent a repetition of this act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1021; Dec. Dig. ⚭286.]

[3. Master and Servant ⚭293.]

In action for injury to an employee resulting from a misplaced switch, the judge did not err in charging the jury that the railroad company was guilty of negligence if it failed to supply and maintain safe and suitable machinery and appliances, for keeping a switch properly connected is maintaining the track as a proper appliance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1151; Dec. Dig. ⚭293.]

Before Aldrich, J., Sumter, October, 1885. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Messrs. Bowman & Harby, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Paul Coleman, a laborer in the service of the defendant company, brought this action against said company for damages on account of personal injuries received by him in the discharge of his duty, on April 23, 1885, at Eastover, in Richland County. It appeared that Coleman was a laborer on a material train, of which J. W. Griffin was the conductor; that after their day's work on the day stated, the train was run to the station at Eastover, and arriving there a little after sundown, the conductor, Griffin, had the switch turned so as to connect with a side track at that place, and ran the train on said track in order to spend the night. The laborers remained in the shanty of the material train, and about two hours after the *regular passenger train, in passing, ran on the side track and into collision with the material train, by which one man was killed, and Coleman, the plaintiff, had his left foot and leg crushed. The negligence alleged was in allowing the switch to remain in connection with the turn-out instead of the main line.

The defendant company denied negligence, and for a second defence, stated specifically, that at Eastover they had a side track connected with the main line by a railroad switch, and that said switch was in good order and condition; that on the day mentioned they moved a train of cars upon the side track and caused it to stop thereon; that they disconnected the said side track from the main line and carefully locked the switch, and that thereafter said switch was unfastened by some evil disposed person to them unknown, and the main line was thereby broken, and a train running on the main line was turned into the side track and unavoidably collided with the material train standing thereon, without any fault or negligence on their part, &c.

The conductor, Griffin, testified positively that after going in upon the side track he turned the switch and restored the connection with main line and locked it. There was proof, however, tending to show that a collision on the same side track, very much in the same way, had occurred in August of the preceding year; and that the result of an investigation, ordered on that occasion, was to acquit the officials and to restore them to their places, there being grounds to believe that the lock of the switch, found unbroken, must have been tampered with, picked, or unlocked with a false key, in the possession of some malicious person, unknown to and beyond the control of the officers of the company; that notwithstanding this incident, the company had never changed the lock, but continued to use the same until after the last collision, in which the plaintiff was injured. The change of one lock would have made it necessary to change all on the road of the same pattern.

Upon the close of the plaintiff's testimony the counsel of the defendant company moved for a non-suit on two grounds: first, that the testimony for the plaintiff disclosed the fact that the injury to him resulted from an accident, caused either by the malicious act of some third person, over whom the defendant had *no control; or second, from the negligence of a fellow-servant of the plaintiff.

The motion was refused and the trial proceeded. Both parties made requests to charge. Some were charged as presented and others modified and some refused. The matters complained of appear in the exceptions. Upon the charge of the judge the jury found a verdict of $1,500 for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals upon the following exceptions:

1. "For that his honor allowed the plaintiff's first request to charge: 'If from the evidence the jury believe that the defendant failed to supply the plaintiff with safe and suitable machinery and appliances with which to discharge his duties, or that, having originally supplied the same, afterwards failed to maintain and keep in good repair such machinery and appliances, and that, by reason of its failure so to do, the plaintiff was injured as alleged, then the defendant is guilty of negligence, and the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.' Such request, even if sound as an abstract proposition of law, not being pertinent to the facts proved in this case.

2. "For that his honor refused the defendant's second request to charge: 'If the jury believe that the defendant's side tracks and machinery were properly constructed and in good repair, and that the defendants exercised due care in the employment of competent, skilled, and prudent servants in the conduct of their business, and that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, in neglecting to disconnect the side track from the main line of the railroad, then the defendants are not liable in this action,' on the ground that it was not involved in the decision in this case.

3. "For that his honor refused the defendant's third request to charge: 'That under the facts as proved in this case, the servant who was charged with the duty of attending to the switch, in disconnecting said side track from the main line, was a fellow-servant of the plaintiff,' on the ground that it is a question of fact for the jury.

4. "For that his honor refused the defendant's fourth request to charge: 'That the plaintiff cannot recover damages in this case for any injury that may have resulted to him from the negligence of a fellow-servant,' on the ground that such request cannot be allowed if negligence be proved.

5. "For that his honor refused the defendant's fifth request to charge: 'That the omission of the defendants to change the locks and keys on all the switches on their line of railroad, because there had been a suspicion that some one possessed a key to one of the switches, does not amount in law to negligence,' on the ground that that is a question for the jury to pass upon.

6. "For that his honor modified the defendant's sixth request to charge: 'If the jury believe that the switch at Eastover was in good condition at the time of the accident, and that the accident did not result from the negligence of the defendants, they cannot be held liable for the acts of third persons over whom they had no control,' saying, 'allowed, unless you believe there was negligence in not changing the key.'

7. "For that his honor charged the jury as follows: 'The simple question for you is, was the defendant railroad guilty of negligence in not supplying new locks on the switches of the line, or placing guard at that particular switch, because the accident had happened there before?'

8. "For that his honor instructed the jury as follows: 'As to damages I have already instructed you. You have no proof of the extent of the injury except the personal inspection you have made from your box. Is it a permanent injury, or are you satisfied that the leg was not broken?'

9. "For that his honor refused the defendant's motion for a non-suit, made on the ground that the testimony for the plaintiff disclosed the fact that the injury to him resulted from an accident caused either by the malicious act of some third person over whom the defendant had no control, or from the negligence of a fellow-servant of the plaintiff."

As to the last exception (9), complaining of error in refusing the nonsuit. It is very clear that at 8 o'clock, two hours after the material train had passed out upon the side track, the switch connected with the side track and caused the collision. That connection was established to let in the material train, and must either have remained open or, if then closed, must in some way have been changed in the meantime. In the view that Griffin, *the conductor, may have left the switch open after using it, the argument was made that, although clear negligence on his part, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant, for which the company is not responsible to the plaintiff; that in reference to the special duty of the conductor to restore the switch to its place in connection with the main line, he was not a "middleman," representing the company, but a mere "switchman," doing the duty of "a mere operative."

We do not clearly see the distinction suggested. Taking the rule to be as stated by Mr. Wood, in his work on Master and Servant, section 438, it seems to us that the adjustment of the switches was an important duty resting on the company, no matter to whom the performance of that duty was delegated. Mr. Wood says: "To formulate a rule from these cases, it would be as follows: whenever the master delegates to another the performance of a duty to his servants, which the master has impliedly contracted to perform in person, or which rests upon him as an absolute duty, he is liable for the manner in which that duty is performed by the middleman whom he has selected as his agent, and to the extent of the discharge of those duties by the middleman, he stands in the place of the master, but as to all other matters he is a mere co-servant."

In the late case of Calvo v. Railroad Company (23 S. C., 528 [55 Am. Rep. 28]), this court held that a locomotive engineer and a section master of track-workers are not fellow-servants in the sense that the railroad company employing them would not be liable to one for damages resulting to him from the negligence of the other. In delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice McIver said: "Now, it is well settled that it is the duty of the master, not only to provide his servants in the first instance with suitable and safe machinery and other appliances to do the work for which they are employed, but also to keep the same in proper repair; and any negligence in the performance of such duty, whether done by the master in person or by subordinate agents selected by him for the purpose, would render the master liable for any injury sustained by one of his servants by reason of such negligence. * * * The question is as to the nature of the duty, not as to the rank or grade of the person employed to perform it. Is it a duty which the master owes to his servants? Under the well settled rule above mentioned, we think that nothing can be clearer than that it is the duty of a railroad company to provide a suitable and safe track over which its locomotives engineers and other servants of that class are required to run its trains, and that negligence on the part of those to whom it commits such duty is the negligence of the company." &c.

If it is the duty of the company to provide a suitable and safe track, of which there is no doubt whatever, it is most assuredly no less its duty to keep in order and rightly placed the switches, which are certainly important parts of the track, and, probably needing more strict attention than any other. We do not think that the conductor, Griffin, in respect to the special duty of readjusting the switch, was a fellow-servant of the plaintiff in the sense of the rule relied on. See Couch v. C. C. & A. R. R. Company, 22 S. C., 557.¹

But as the conductor, Griffin, testified positively that after passing out upon the side track, he readjusted and locked the switch, it seems to us that the main question in the case, was whether the company was or was not negligent in failing to change the lock at the Eastover switch, after it had been developed that there was at least good grounds for believing that it had been tampered with—picked or opened with a false key. We have no doubt that, as an abstract proposition, a railroad company is not liable to one of its servants for the consequences of a single isolated act of a third person, over whom the company has no control. But, as we understand, there may be circumstances connected with it which would make a difference. If, for instance, the same act at the same place had occurred before, and it was of such a character as could be prevented by timely precautions, it is easy to see that, upon a repetition of the act, a new question might arise, involving the inquiry whether the failure to take these precautions was or was not negligence to charge the company.

As we understand it, the proper control over these railroad switches is a very important matter for the safety of passengers as *well as servants. We cannot doubt that it would be negligence in a railroad company to leave its switches entirely without locks to secure them, thereby putting it in the power of any reckless or malicious stranger to change them at will. And in respect to certainty and security there may not be any great difference between a lock capable of being opened and no lock at all. The question was one of fact, and the Circuit Judge, ruling in effect that there was a prima facie case—that negligence on the part of the company might be "reasonably and legitimately inferred" from the circumstances of the case—refused to grant the non-suit and referred the question to the jury; and in this we cannot say that he committed error of law. "The defendant is entitled to a non-suit when there is a total failure of evidence to maintain the plaintiff's case—that is, to show a prima facie case; but if there is any competent and pertinent proof, the force and effect of which must be determined, the case must go to the jury." Carter v. C. & G. R. R. Company, 19 S. C., 20 [45 Am. Rep. 751]; Couch v. C. C. & A. R. R. Company, 22 S. C., 558.

As to the first exception. The law announced is undoubtedly sound, but it is said that it was not applicable to the case proved. In the sense that keeping the switch properly connected was "maintaining the track as a proper appliance," we do not see that the charge was so general or impertinent to the facts as to furnish a good ground for reversing the judgment.

Exceptions 2, 3, and 4 relate to the view of the appellant that the conductor, Griffin, as to the special duty of replacing the switch after his train had passed on to the side track, was a fellow-servant of the plaintiff, Coleman, and therefore that the company was not responsible to him for an injury inflicted by the negligence of said Griffin. We disposed of this subject in considering the refusal of the motion for a non-suit, and we need not repeat what was there said.

Exceptions 5, 6, and 7 insist, in different forms, that the failure of the company to change the key of the switch at Eastover, after the first collision at that place, was not negligence, and that the judge should so have instructed the jury. In considering the question as to non-suit, we also determined this point, holding that it was not error of law to refer that question to the jury.

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

RHETT v. JENKINS,

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Ejectment ¶110.]

II, a slave was in possession of a lot from 1840 to 1870, when he died, devising this property by metes and bounds to his widow and son, who remained in possession of the portions devised. Under a judgment obtained against II in 1868, and another against his executor after his death, this lot was sold by the sheriff and purchased by the plaintiffs, who brought this action against the said devisees for its recovery. Held, that the judge erred in refusing to charge the jury that, "If they believe from the evidence that the defendants are in possession under II, either as devisees or heirs at law, then they must find for the plaintiffs, unless the defendants have shown an independent title in themselves by connecting themselves with a grant, or proving that which presumes a grant."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 319-326; Dec. Dig. ¶110.]

[2. Execution ¶280.]

Proof of the judgment, execution, and sheriff's deed is conclusive evidence of title in the purchaser as against the judgment debtor until the defendant shows a better title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 813; Dec. Dig. ¶280.]

[3. Ejectment ¶15.]

And this rule also applies to parties claiming as devisees under the judgment debtor, upon the principle that in actions for the recovery of real property it is not necessary to prove title beyond a common source—particularly so, where the sale is under a judgment having lien before the devise took effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ¶15.]

[4. Adverse Possession ¶62.]

Having entered under the will of II the defendants could not afterwards disclaim title by devise and assert an independent title in themselves by adverse possession against the creditors of II.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brock v. Kirkpatrick, 69 S. C. 237, 48 S. E. 72.

For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 325; Dec. Dig. ¶62.]

Before Hudson, J., Richland, October, 1885.

This was an action by J. T. Rhett and W. A. Clark against Bella Jenkins et al., and is a sequel to Lyons v. Holmes, 19 S. C. 406. The opinion fully states the case. After passing upon the requests to charge stated in the exceptions considered and others, the judge thus charged the jury as reported by himself:

I instructed them that the plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their title, and not upon the weakness of the title of their adversaries. To make out a prima facie title in themselves, *the plaintiffs must, first, connect their title with a grant from the State by successive deeds of conveyance; or, second, if no grant can be produced, they must show that from which a grant will be presumed, viz., that at some time in the past the citizens of this State held actual possession of this land adversely in an open and notorious manner for the period of twenty years or more consecutively, and connect themselves with a title thus matured; or, third, they must trace their title to a source common to the defendants and thus relieve themselves of the necessity of tracing title beyond a common source. The plaintiffs gave in evidence no grant from the State, and hence failed to establish the first and most satisfactory kind of title.

To raise the presumption of a grant, it was in evidence that one Richard Holmes, a slave, was in possession from about A. D. 1840 until he was emancipated in 1865, and thence onward until his death in 1870, leaving his widow Bella—since intermarried with Jenkins—and his son William surviving him; and to them he conveyed this lot of land by will: one part to his widow, Bella, and the other to his trustee and executor, James D. Tradewell, in trust for William. I instructed the jury that the possession of Richard Holmes for twenty-five years, whilst he was a slave, gave him no title; since, under the law of the land, he could acquire no title to land. His continued possession for five years as a freeman gave him no title. The plaintiffs by purchase at sheriff's sale, under judgment and execution against Richard Holmes, acquired no more than his title, viz., a naked possession of five years, which gave no estate in law.

But the plaintiffs contend that the defendants claim to hold and can only hold under Richard Holmes, and therefore cannot dispute his title. But I told the jury that the defendants claim by possession, and that if they saw fit to repudiate the will of Richard, they could do so, and rest upon this naked possession; most especially could they set up the defence that Richard had no title or estate which could be cast upon them by descent or which he could convey by will. It was competent for the defendants to show that neither the plaintiffs nor themselves did or could acquire title from Richard.

I charged the jury that if they found the fact to be that *Richard Holmes had no title to this land except the five years possession, from 1865 to 1870, then the plaintiffs acquired nothing by the sheriff's deed, and had no right to recover against the defendants. A naked trespass can neither be cast by descent nor derived by will, nor acquired by levy and sale under judgment against the trespassers. Ex nihilo nihil fit. As this was really the point upon which the case hinged, and my rulings upon the points raised touching the two judgments can scarcely be misunderstood, I have not deemed it necessary to refer to them. The finding of every fact in the case was left to the jury.

I have given the substance of my charge without attempting to repeat the language.

Messrs. John T. Rhett and W. A. Clark, for appellants.

Messrs. Allen J. Green and Mark Reynolds, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action for the recovery of a lot in the city of Columbia, described in the complaint. As well as can be collected from the brief the following outline of facts appeared: That Richard Holmes, a man of color, died in March, 1870, in possession of the said lot, where he had lived for many years. He left of force his last will and testament, by which he devised one moiety of said premises to his wife, Bella, and the other moiety in trust for his son William and his children. After his death, Bella and William remained in possession of their respective portions under the will. William died in 1878, and his wife, Amanda, and her children continued to occupy their moiety. In 1868 James D. Tradewell recovered a judgment against Richard Holmes. In 1878 one Thoroughgood Thornton recovered a judgment against James D. Tradewell, as executor of the will of Richard Holmes, and under executions issued upon these judgments the premises in question were sold by the sheriff in 1885, and bid off by the plaintiffs, who received sheriff's titles and brought this action to recover the lot. The defendants answered denying that Richard Holmes was ever *seized and possessed of the premises, as he was a slave until emancipation in 1865; also denying that the will was of any force and effect as far as the devise to them of the premises was concerned, or that they possessed themselves of the premises under the aforesaid will of Holmes. And in addition, Bella Holmes interposed the statute of limitations. The plaintiffs did not undertake to prove title in Richard Holmes, but showed his continuous adverse possession of the premises for upwards of forty years, of which time the last five years prior to his death he was a freeman.

The cause came on for trial before Judge Hudson and a jury. Under the charge the jury found for the defendants. There were requests to charge on both sides, some of which were charged as presented, some in modified form, and some refused, as fully appears in the exceptions printed in the brief; but it will not be necessary to consider more than the 1st, 5th, 7th, and 8th, which are as follows:

1. "Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the jury: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that Richard Holmes is the common source, and that the said Richard Holmes was a slave, and that he died on March 11, 1870, plaintiffs cannot recover unless they (the plaintiffs) have shown that the said Holmes acquired title since 1865.'"

5. "Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the plaintiffs, 'that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants are in possession under Richard Holmes, either as devisees or heirs at law, then the jury must find for the plaintiffs, unless the defendants have shown an independent title in themselves by connecting themselves with a grant or proving that which presumes a grant.'"

7. "That 'if the jury find the fact to be that Richard Holmes had no title to this land except the five years' possession from 1865 to 1870, then the plaintiffs acquired nothing by the sheriff's deed, and had no right to recover against the defendants.'"

8. "That 'a naked trespass can neither be cast by descent, nor devised by will, nor acquired by levy and sale under judgment against the trespassers.'"

It will be seen that the leading idea of the charge was, that *the plaintiffs could not recover unless they proved that Richard Holmes, the defendant in execution, had good legal title. This may be necessary in actions brought by purchasers at sheriff's sale against perfect strangers to the judgment debtor, and who do not claim in any way through or under him. But the rule is certainly different where the action is brought against the judgment debtor or himself. In such case it is well settled that "proof of the judgment, execution, and sheriff's deed shall be received as conclusive evidence of title until the defendant shows a better." The question here is what is the rule when the action is brought against the devisees of the judgment debtor in possession in accordance with and under his will. The subject as applied to this case is not entirely free from obscurity, but it strikes us that the view of the judge overlooked the consequences of both parties claiming from the same source, and also the force and effect of a sale under judgment as to the parties to that judgment and their privies.

There is no doubt as to the general rule that in an action for land the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title and not the weakness of his adversary's. But there are exceptions, cases in which the plaintiff is not required to trace his title back to a grant. One class of these is where both parties claim from the same source of title; in which, as we understand it, the fact that the plaintiff has traced his title back to a source from which the defendant also claims stands in the place of further proof or title, at least prima facie. We do not know that the rule is anywhere better stated than by Judge Withers in the case of Pyles v. Reese, 4 Rich., 558: "But the obligation is not without exception. Where the parties litigant derive title from the same source, no end of justice is to be attained by tracing beyond. Hence as between lessor and lessee the rule is universal; the latter having gained possession by his acknowledgment is estopped from his denial of the title under which he entered. How stands the case when one enters as a purchaser under the title of another, and a contest subsequently arises between the vendor and vendee? * * *

Under the authority of adjudged cases we are of opinion a plaintiff is never compelled to go further back than the source whence the parties before the court derive title, if the source is the same. * * * That 'moral policy of the law,' of which Chief Justice Marshall spoke, is well vindicated in such a case by holding that prima facie he who enters upon land as a purchaser, thereby admits the title under which he enters to be good. I would refer to the cases of Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat., 535 [5 L. Ed. 516]; Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter and Abney, 1 Hill, 380; and Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strobl., 1. The opinion now pronounced is but the reiteration of principles held and affirmed in these cases," &c. And we might add several other cases in our own reports. Martin v. Randlett, 5 Rich., 541 [57 Am. Dec. 770]; Geiger v. Kaigler, 15 S. C., 269, &c.

According to this clear judgment, if we consider the defendants as purchasers for value from Richard Holmes, they could not put the plaintiffs to proof of the title of the said Richard; and, surely, they have no higher rights, as mere volunteers, devisees, who have no estate until the debts of the ancestor are paid, and as privies are bound by his sale either made by himself or through the sheriff. We do not understand that this conclusion rests upon the technical doctrine of estoppel, for the defendants are allowed, if they can, to prove an independent title in themselves; but it is simply the logical result of the defendants' claiming under the same title with that of the plaintiffs, considered in the light of the principle that one is held to admit the title under which he enters. If in such case the plaintiffs were still required to prove title in the common source, we are unable to see why the rule was ever adopted. It would certainly be without force or purpose. As it strikes us, the very object of the rule was to dispense with proof of title in the common source, or further proof, substituting therefor the admission of the defendant involved in his entering under that title. As was said by the chief justice in the late case of Smythe v. Tolbert, 22 S. C., 137:

"If the parties do not claim through a common source, then the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, &c. If they do, then plaintiff may stop in the first instance at the title of the common grantor," &c.

Besides it happens that in this case there is another principle, growing out of the force and effect of a sale under execution, which fortifies this view. These plaintiffs purchased the lot in question under a judgment against Richard Holmes obtained in his life time, and received therefor a conveyance of the sheriff. In Thomas & Ashby v. Jeter & Abney, supra, Chancellor Harper states the principle thus: "The rule is, that when a purchaser of lands at sheriff sale brings suit against the defendant to recover possession, he need show nothing but the judgment and the sheriff's conveyance. The same rule applies when the suit is against one in possession, claiming under the defendant, whether as tenant or under a conveyance (or devise), otherwise the rule would be nugatory. Here the conveyance was not subsequent to the judgment, but it is established to have been void from fraud. The defendant then stands in the situation of one put into possession by the original defendant, Thomas (Holmes), without any title at all. * * * If the defendants claim by any other title, they might have shown it in their defence," &c. It seems to us that this is conclusive of the case. The sale and conveyance of the sheriff transferred to the plaintiffs as purchasers all the interest of Holmes, of whatsoever nature and kind it might be. There was nothing left in him which could pass by devise or descent, and these defendants holding as devisees under him could not raise their voice to impeach that title which had passed to the plaintiffs. Like Thomas, in the case of Thomas v. Jeter, they were "without any title at all"—as Chancellor Harper expressed it.

But it is insisted that the defendants had the right to show that Holmes had no title—that being nominally a slave down to emancipation in 1865, he could not by possession or otherwise acquire legal title to the lot, although he had lived upon it, using it as his own for over forty years, and that his possession after he became a freeman, five years before his death, could not alone give title by adverse possession; and therefore being a mere trespasser he had no interest that could be levied and sold under judgment against him, and that it is absurd to say that something could come out of nothing—ex nihilo nihil fit. This at first view seems plausible, but we have already endeavored to show that as against the defendants the plaintiffs' case as to title in the common source must be assumed, at least prima facie; that is to say, as to Holmes' title it was not incumbent on the plaintiffs to show it; and that the only way in which the defendants could defeat this prima facie case was either to show better title from Holmes or an independent title in themselves, which right was accorded to them, although mere volunteers, precisely as if they had been purchasers for value.

But even if the title of Holmes were a matter open for opposition on the part of the defendants, we cannot agree that it was shown that he was a mere trespasser and that nothing passed under the execution sale to the plaintiffs. Holmes, the defendant in execution, had all the presumptions arising out of an undisturbed possession for more than forty years. If a trespasser, it did not appear upon whom he trespassed. During five years of the time of his possession he was a free man and capable of acquiring property in any of the ways allowed by law; and of the parties before the court, who had the right to say that during that time he did not acquire title to the lot? As we have seen, the defendants, having entered under his title, had not such right.

It is, however, finally contended that the defendants had the right to repudiate the devise and hold on their own independent possession—relying upon the maxim melior est conditio possidentis—until perfect legal title was shown. Richard Holmes was a freeman when he made his will, which was legal and binding. The mother and son, named as devisees, manifestly accepted it, for they divided and occupied the different portions of the lot precisely as the will directed. It seems to us that having accepted the will and entered into possession under it, they cannot now, in order to evade paying the debts of the testator, disconnect themselves entirely from him, and, while enjoying his patrimony, disclaim that they received and held it under his will. Such a license would certainly unsettle the rights of parties and tend to defeat the object of the rule as to tracing title to a common source. We think it was error in the judge below to refuse to charge as requested: "That if the jury believe from the evidence that defendants are in possession under Richard Holmes, either as devisees or heirs at law, then the jury must find for the plaintiffs, unless the defendants have shown an independent title in themselves by connecting themselves with a grant or proving that which presumes a grant."

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

KERCHNER & CALDER BROS. v. McCORMAC.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Attachment ⚭227.]

An attachment may be set aside upon two grounds: 1. Where it has been irregularly issued, the facts alleged being insufficient; 2. Where it has been improvidently issued, the facts alleged being untrue.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lipscomb v. Rice, 47 S. C. 16, 24 S. E. 925.]

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 782, 802; Dec. Dig. ⚭227.]

[2. Attachment ⚭45, 97, 111.]

To entitle plaintiff to the severe remedy of attachment upon the ground of fraud, the charge must be made directly and fully in the terms of the statute, and the facts must be supported by such testimony as would prima facie sustain the charge in an action at law. The affidavit is not sufficient if rested merely upon hearsay, information, and belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 115, 249, 302; Dec. Dig. ⚭45, 97, 111.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⚭1010.]

The order of the Circuit Judge dismissing the attachment because improvidently issued, sustained—this finding of fact not being without testimony to support it, nor opposed to the overwhelming weight of testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3979-3982; Dec. Dig. ⚭1010.]

Before Kershaw, J., Marion, March, 1885.

This was a motion to dissolve an attachment, which was issued upon the following affidavit:

Personally appears Francis W. Kerchner, one of the plaintiffs above named, who, on oath, says:

1. That a cause of action exists in favor of the above named plaintiffs against the above named defendants on the joint and several note of E. C. McCormac and E. A. McCormac for sixteen hundred and thirty-four 23-100 dollars to the order of E. L. McCormac, dated 25th January, 1883, due 1st January, 1884, which was endorsed over to said plaintiffs prior to its maturity by E. L. McCormac; which note bears interest after its maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and that no part of said note has been paid, and the plaintiffs are instituting an action of even date herewith against all of said defendants for the whole of said note and interest.

2. That the said E. L. McCormac is not a resident of this State, but a resident of the State of North Carolina; that the said E. L. McCormac has, as deponent is informed and believes, conveyed his interest in val-able real estate in this county to his *wife; that such conveyance was evidently for the purpose and with the intent to prevent the creditors of the said E. L. McCormac from reaching said property.

3. That said E. A. McCormac, being approached by plaintiffs recently as to his paying said note, coolly informed one of the plaintiffs that if plaintiffs would not sue said note, he, E. A. McCormac, would pay it; but that if they, plaintiffs, would sue it, that he, E. A. McCormac, would throw them into the costs, i. e., throw the costs upon them, and that he would defeat them in getting anything on said note; that said threat could have but one interpretation, and that is, that said E. A. McCormac, who has a store and stock, or is a merchant, and who has other valuable property, and is unmarried, is about to dispose of his property with the intent of preventing plaintiffs and other creditors from collecting their claims.

4. That this deponent is informed by the agent of Messrs. Aaron & Rheinsein, of Wilmington, N. C., that E. A. McCormac has assigned to them a mortgage against E. C. McCormac for about eight thousand dollars, as a collateral to secure a debt for less than one-fourth that sum, which E. A. McCormac owes that firm, and that said E. A. McCormac has requested said firm not to let it be known that they hold such large collateral for their claim against him.

5. That deponent is further informed and believes that said E. A. McCormac is about to convey his stock of goods to a younger brother for the purpose of avoiding the payment of said note and perhaps other debts.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

A motion is made before me to set aside an attachment levied on the property of the defendant, E. A. McCormac. The motion is made, first, on the insufficiency of the affidavit upon which the warrant was obtained; and failing in that, upon affidavits controverting the facts charged in the original affidavit. The sufficiency of the affidavit must be determined in the first instance by inspection. If considered sufficient to sustain the attachment prima facie, the affidavits read at the hearing for the motion and those in behalf of the plaintiffs in reply must be considered, and if the allegations as stated in the original affidavit be not sustained, the motion must be granted; otherwise it must be refused.

The first paragraph of the original affidavit is a sufficient statement of the cause of action. The allegation contained in the second paragraph that E. L. McCormac, one of the defendants, is a non-resident of this State, is sufficient to sustain the attachment as to him, and this is not controverted. The other allegations contained in that paragraph are made on information and belief alone, without stating the source of the information or the grounds of belief. This is not sufficient. Ivy v. Caston, 21 S. C., 583. The allegations of the third paragraph of the affidavit are sufficient. They contain a statement of facts which, unexplained, would amount to fraud. The allegations of the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the affidavit are insufficient in that the former charges no fraudulent intent, and the facts stated do not make a case of fraud per se, and the latter sets forth allegations upon information and belief merely, which, as already said, is not sufficient.

The sufficiency of the affidavit being sustained in part, the case presented by the affidavits read at the hearing of the motion must be considered. The affidavit of E. A. McCormac denies the facts stated in the third paragraph of the original affidavit. The burden of proof of the fraud therein alleged is on the plaintiffs, and in a conflict of testimony the preponderance must be on their side. Nothing appears here but an affirmation on one side and a denial on the other, and no reason is furnished me for deciding the facts controverted in favor of one party rather than the other. Under these circumstances the facts alleged by the plaintiffs in this paragraph fail to be sustained by the preponderance of the testimony and must be decided against them. This leaves the attachment no ground to stand upon except as to E. L. McCormac, the non-resident, and that is not controverted.

The motion must prevail on another ground. The proof is abundant that the defendant, E. A. McCormac, was, at the time the warrant issued, making efforts to secure the means of paying the debt due to the plaintiffs. This negatives the inference of fraud sought to be drawn from the facts alleged. Upon this ground also the motion must prevail.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the warrant of attachment herein, and all proceedings thereunder, in so far as they affect all the defendants except E. L. McCormac, who appears to be a non-resident of this State, be and are hereby vacated and dissolved. That the moving papers and all affidavits herein be filed, and that the plaintiffs pay the defendants the costs of this motion, ten dollars.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, for appellants,
Mr. C. A. Woods, contra.

August 3, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case, a warrant of attachment issued by the clerk for Marion County and levied upon the property of E. A. McCormac, was set aside by his honor, J. B. Kershaw. The appeal involves the correctness of this action on the part of the Circuit Judge.

An attachment may be vacated or set aside upon one of two grounds, dependent upon the facts: 1st. Where it has been irregularly issued; and 2d. Where it has been improvidently issued. An attachment is irregularly issued where the facts or allegations contained in the affidavit upon which it is founded, are insufficient; in other words, where, even admitting them to be true, they do not constitute a legal ground for the warrant. It is improvidently issued where the allegations, if true, would be sufficient, yet it satisfactorily appears that they are not true. The first ground may be de-terminated upon an inspection of the affidavit; the second upon motion, ordinarily, supported and resisted by affidavits pro and con. The attachment here was assailed upon both of these grounds.

His honor, the Circuit Judge, upon inspection of the affidavit of the plaintiff, Kerchner, upon which the clerk had issued the warrant, held that it was sufficient to sustain the attachment prima facie, at least to such extent as to authorize and require him to consider the affidavits submitted by the defendant against the truth of the allegations in the original affidavit, and those of the plaintiff in reply. Upon this hearing he determined that the allegations of the original affidavit had not been sustained by the preponderance of the evidence. He therefore ordered and adjudged that the attachment and all proceedings thereunder, in so far as they affected all the defendants except E. L. McCormac, who appeared to be a non-resident, be vacated, &c.

*In our recent reports we have several cases which not only bear upon the question raised here, but we think are conclusive of this appeal, and against the appellant. These cases are, Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C., 169; Brown v. Morris, 10 Id., 469; Clausen v. Fultz, 13 Id., 478; and Ivy v. Caston, 21 Id., 583; In Smith & Melton v. Walker, it was held, "that where the application for an attachment is based on the ground that the debtor has absconded, or concealed himself, or has assigned, disposed of, or secreted his property, or is about to do so with intent to defraud his creditors, the affidavit must state the facts upon which the application is founded." In Brown v. Morris, supra, it was held, "that it was not sufficient to allege simply upon information and belief the allegations relied on for the attachment, but that the affidavits in such cases must contain a statement of the particular facts upon which the allegations rest, and the source from which the information is derived, and that the evidence thus presented must be of a character as would in an action at law prima facie establish the facts alleged. In no other than in such sense and by such means can the requisite facts be made to appear to the judge or other officer before whom the motion is made," says the court.

In Clausen v. Fultz, supra, the affidavit contained a general charge of fraud, stated upon information and belief, that the defendant was disposing of his property and effects with intent to defraud his creditors. Yet the court said this general charge, even if made upon positive knowledge, would not have been sufficient ground for issuing the attachment, unless supported by the statement of the facts and circumstances warranting such allegation. In Ivy v. Caston, supra, the court held, that where the affidavit upon which the clerk issued the attachment contained a statement of belief, resting "upon hearsay, inferences, and conjecture," that there was intent to defraud, but made no positive averment founded on sufficient facts as to the intent, &c., the attachment should be dissolved on motion for irregularity.

Now, does the affidavit of Kerchner meet the requirements of these cases? We think not. Under the language of the attachment law, it is necessary that it should appear by affidavit that the defendant is disposing of his property, or intends to do so *(if that be the ground upon which the attachment is moved), with intent to defraud his creditors. Under the decisions above referred to, the fact of disposition of property, or purpose thereto, with intent to defraud creditors, must appear in such shape and upon such testimony as would at least raise a prima facie case in an action at law, and not upon the mere information and belief of the affiant. We think the affidavit of Kerchner fails in several respects to meet the requirements of the act and of the decisions construing it. In the first place, there is no direct charge that the defendant, E. A. McCormac, is attempting to defraud his creditors in the acts alleged. It is stated, it is true, that he is about to dispose of his property "with the intent of preventing plaintiffs and other creditors from collecting their claims." This may have been intended as a charge of fraud, but still it is not made in the direct and pointed way prescribed in the act, nor are the facts given upon which the court could determine whether or not this fraudulent intent was present. An attachment is a severe and harsh proceeding, it is summary and prompt, and parties desiring to avail themselves of it should conform to the requirements of the law, not inferentially and by indirection, but directly and fully.

By an examination of Kerchner's affidavit, it will be seen that the allegation that defendant, E. A. McCormac, is about to dispose of his stock of goods to his younger brother, is stated simply upon information and belief. That he had assigned a certain mortgage to Aaron & Rheinstein, of Wilmington, N. C., was made upon information from the agent of these parties—hearsay and incompetent in a trial at law. The allegation in the third paragraph, that the defendant was about to dispose of his property, is made as an inference from certain expressions used by the defendant, when called upon by the plaintiffs for payment of the note sued on, when defendant said if plaintiff "would not sue, he would pay the note. * * but if they did sue, he, McCormac, would throw them into the costs, and would defeat them in getting anything on the note." We hardly think that these expressions would be enough in themselves to sustain the allegation that McCormac intended to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that *the order of the Circuit Judge setting aside the attachment could be sustained upon the ground that said attachment was irregularly issued, the affidavit upon which it was founded being insufficient, as appears from an inspection thereof.

As to the other ground, to wit: that the attachment was improvidently issued. The Circuit Judge, after a careful consideration of the affidavits submitted by the defendant contesting the truth of the allegations in the original affidavit, and the reply of the plaintiffs, came to the conclusion that said allegations were not sustained by the preponderance of the evidence, and therefore that there was no ground upon which the attachment could stand. This is a finding of fact by the Circuit Judge, which we are not authorized to disturb, unless under the well established rule (which rule applies here, see Claussen & Co. v. Easterling, 19 S. C., 515), it is without testimony, or the overwhelming weight thereof is the other way. We do not think that either of these conditions is present.

We do not understand that the judgment appealed from affects in any way the attachment as to E. L. McCormac, either as to any property of his levied upon or garnished in the hands of others, and so understanding and construing it.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

5. Petition for rehearing refused—no material fact or principle involved having been overlooked.

Before Wallace, J. Newberry, July, 1885. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, Suber & Caldwell, Geo. S. Mower, James Y. Culbreath, and J. N. Nathans, for appellants.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

September 15, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On February 19, 1885, Michael Foot, the defendant, executed an assignment of all his property, consisting of lands, goods and merchandise, fixtures, bills, bonds, notes, &c., for the benefit of his creditors. He named as his assignee his son, Mordecai Foot, who was directed to sell the property, and, after paying the proper fees, costs, and commissions, and all rents, taxes, and assessments due thereon, to apply the proceeds to the extinguishment of all his just debts, "and if such remainder shall be insufficient to pay said debts in full, then to apply the same so far as sufficient to the payment, first, to any debts that may be already secured by pledges, mortgages, judgments, or any other lien or encumbrance upon said property, or any part thereof, that the law shall require to be first paid, and then to the payment of all other debts pro rata, which the law does not require to be first paid," &c. The assignment was delivered and also the assignee put into possession of the property.

On the same day (February 19), but some hours after, the plaintiffs, William Bryce & Co., and three other creditors of Michael Foot, severally issued writs of attachment and levied the property assigned as still belonging to the debtor, Michael Foot; on February 20, two other creditors also issued attachments; February 21, seven others;

February 23, five others; February *24, one other; February 25, four others; February 27, two others; and on March 20, one other, making in all, twenty-six. The names of the different attaching creditors, and the amounts and nature of the claims, are all in the "Brief." The affidavits on which the attachments issued are very much the same, charging that the assignment was fraudulent and void, and stating, upon information and belief, certain grounds and sources of information, and especially that Michael Foot had some time previous to the execution of the assignment made fraudulent mortgages to Oberdorfer, Samuels, and Klettner, amounting in the aggregate to some $17,500; and that the said Foot was about to secrete a large sum of money from his creditors, &c. In a number of the cases the attachment bonds were payable to the clerk of the court, and in others to Michael Foot, the debtor.

The debtor, Michael Foot, his assignee, Mordecai Foot, and M. A. Carlisle, who had been elected agent of the creditors, made a motion before Judge Wallace to vacate and discharge the liens of all the attachments upon several grounds, which, for the purposes of this case, may be condensed into two: first, that when the attachments issued against Michael Foot, he had no interest in the property, the title to which had passed to the assignee, and he and the agent for creditors had the possession and rightful control of the same under the assignment, which conveyed all the interest of the debtor, much or little, and was regular and valid under the law; and second, that the said writs of attachment were issued upon insufficient affidavits, and were in other respects irregular; but if not, the facts stated were disproved and the writs were therefore improvidently issued, and were therefore void. Numerous affidavits upon these points, pro and con, were submitted, but the Circuit Judge did not consider it necessary to determine anything but the first point, as in his view that was conclusive. Upon that subject the judge held as follows: "There is no doubt in my mind that the assignment upon its face is a good and sufficient instrument as a deed of assignment, and that it operated to transfer the right of property to the assignee. It is in proof that the assignee was in possession when the liens were made. Upon this state of things it is clear that the assignee has the right to make the motion to vacate the liens. Section 263 of the Code is express upon the subject. The act of the general assembly (18 Stat., 491) amends section 255 and leaves section 263 unaffected, which, among other things, enacts that 'any person who establishes a right to the property attached, may move to discharge the attachment, as in case of other provisional remedies.' It is therefore adjudged, that the liens of attachments upon the property assigned by M. Foot be vacated and set aside," &c.

From this order the plaintiffs, the attaching creditors, appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because his honor erred in deciding and ordering that the liens of attachments upon the property assigned by M. Foot be vacated and set aside.

"2. Because his honor erred in deciding that the deed of assignment alleged to have been made by Michael Foot to Mordecai Foot was a good and sufficient instrument on its face as a deed of assignment.

"3. Because his honor erred in deciding that said alleged deed of assignment operated to transfer the right of property to the assignee.

"4. Because his honor erred in deciding that upon the execution of said alleged deed of assignment all leviable interest in the property immediately passed from M. Foot.

"5. Because his honor erred in deciding that the said alleged deed of assignment contained no preference whatsoever among the creditors of M. Foot, except as the law allows.

"6. Because his honor erred in holding that Mordecai Foot, as assignee under said alleged assignment, could make the motion to vacate the lien of the attachments.

"7. Because his honor erred in not deciding that Mordecai Foot, as assignee, and Milton A. Carlisle, as agent of creditors under the assignment, could not make the motion to vacate said attachments.

"8. Because his honor erred in not deciding that said alleged deed of assignment was void for fraud.

"9. Because his honor erred in not deciding that the liens of said attachments on the property embraced in said alleged deed of assignment should be sustained.

"*10. Because his honor erred in deciding that said alleged deed of assignment embraced all of Michael Foot's property of all kinds."

As we understand it, the writ of attachment is a proceeding at law, and goes to secure a lien, in advance of the judgment to be recovered, on the property of the debtor. It is its very object to secure a preference as it gives priority according to date. It is a great privilege and is allowed only when certain acts of the debtor are made to appear, one of which is that he "has assigned, disposed of, or secreted, or is about to assign, dispose of, or secrete, any of his property with intent to defraud creditors," &c. When this condition of things is shown by affidavit with that certainty and particularity required by the law, the process issues, which is not limited to the identical property, in reference to which the alleged offence has been or is about to be committed, viz., the property "assigned, disposed of, secreted," &c., but reaches to any and all of the property of the debtor. So that in every attachment two questions may arise, which must be kept separate and distinct: first, whether the property attached belongs to the debtor; and if so, second, whether the facts exist which authorize the writ to issue. If the debtor has no interest in the property, there is nothing to support the attachment. "If there is nothing on which it can operate, the attachment is at an end." Chambers & Sadler v. McKee, 1 Hill, 230. There is no doubt that a valid assignment for the benefit of creditors has precedence over an attachment subsequently issued. West v. Tipper & Kimball, 1 Bail., 198.

In this case the Circuit Judge considered only the effect of the assignment upon the title of the property, and connected therewith the right of the assignee to make that question by motion; and, of course, that is the only question which is before this court in such manner as to be decided here. In the view of the Circuit Judge that he had a right to hear the motion and decide it on affidavits, we cannot say that he committed error in holding that the assignment is regular on its face, and contains no provision which is inhibited by the act of the legislature (Gen. Stat., § 2014) or makes it void. The law allows, indeed, in cases of insolvency encourages, such assignments for the benefit *of all the creditors of the debtor. The terms of this assignment were sufficient to carry all the property of the debtor of every nature and kind whatever, and the proceeds (after deducting the expenses of administration) were to be equally distributed "among all his creditors, except debts already secured by mortgages, judgments, or other liens or encumbrances that the law shall require to be first paid." We do not think, prima facie, it can be truly affirmed of a voluntary assignment of all a debtor's property for the benefit of all his creditors (legal liens taking precedence), that it is one of those "assignments" contemplated by the law as good ground for a writ of attachment, viz., "has assigned, disposed of, &c., or intends to assign his property with intent to defraud his creditors," &c. The assignee undoubtedly had prima facie title to the property for the benefit of all the creditors.

But the attaching creditors assail the assignment as void for fraud not apparent on the face of it; that the debtor refuses to deliver all his property, and that some of the property is covered by mortgages executed previously, which are without consideration, fraudulent, and void, the effect being to make the assignment itself void. It may be a question whether a voluntary assignment, fair and regular upon its face and in terms disposing of all the debtor's property for all his creditors, is necessarily made void by the fact (assuming it proved) that some of the property assigned is found to be covered by fraudulent mortgages previously executed. The assignment in its terms covers and transfers all the interest of the debtor in his property. If the previous mortgages are good and valid, the assignee takes subject to them; if they are void, he takes the whole interest, and whether he takes one or the other, would not seem to affect the validity of the assignment itself, but rather to concern the administration of the assigned estate, and the manner of its distribution among the creditors. We could not say that a debtor, who had given a fraudulent mortgage on part of his property, should forever after be incapable of making a valid assignment for the benefit of all his creditors. We suppose that the locus penitentiae would still remain. It strikes us that it is possible for a voluntary assignment for the benefit of all creditors to be valid, and at the same *time mortgages covering parts of the property so assigned be set aside as fraudulent, and the debtor required to produce and deliver all his property covered by the assignment. It was stated at the bar that there is an action pending to set aside not only the assignment, but the mortgages as well. The attaching creditors have an interest to set aside both the assignment and the mortgages; there may be, however, other creditors who, concurring as to the mortgages, have an interest to sustain the assignment. But as the facts of the case are complicated and it will have to go back to the Circuit, we make no ruling as to whether the previous execution of the mortgages and the conduct of the debtor, Foot, in withholding the assigned property as alleged, should or should not make the assignment itself null and void.

The most difficult question still remains. The Circuit Judge held that the assignment, being good and sufficient on its face, was valid to transfer the title of the property to the assignee, and therefore, although he was not a party in the attachments, the assignee had the right to make the motion to vacate the liens under section 263 of the Code, which, among other things, provides that "any person who establishes a right to the property attached, may move to discharge the attachment as in case of other provisional remedy," &c. Was this error? Was the mere prima facie right to the property shown by the assignment, that "established right" referred to in the aforesaid section of the code, as giving to the assignee the right to move, upon affidavits merely, to discharge the attachments? The attaching creditors deny it, and say that was assuming the very point in contention, viz., the validity of the assignment, which they deny.

It was held by this court, in the cases of Copeland v. P. & A. Life Insurance Company, 17 S. C., 116, and Metts v. Saue, Ibid., 120, that "the assignee under a deed of assignment cannot by motion before judgment vacate an assignment levied upon the assigned property, he being no party to the action." This was not on the ground that the assignee may not show by proper proceedings that the title of the property is in him for the benefit of creditors, but because the judge, upon mere affidavits, could not determine such an issue, involving the title to land, &c. In the case of Metts, supra, the Chief Justice said: "The attachment can operate only on the interest of the debtor. It cannot divest any lien encumbrance or title of a third party or affect his interest in any way. If the debtor has no interest, the proceeding is futile and it will be fruitless. The creditor levies on the property of persons other than the debtor at his peril. * * * If the rights of Blakey (assignee) have been interfered with, he has his remedy, and the courts will afford him full protection through some proceeding more appropriate than the one he has adopted. His motion involves the title to real property, which ordinarily should be determined by a jury," &c. When these cases were decided (1881) section 263 of the Code, cited by the judge, was on the statute book, but it was not then considered to give to the judge the right to hear and determine the question of the validity of the assignment upon mere affidavits.

In order possibly to supply this seeming cassus omissus in the law, sections 255 and 256 of the Code were amended in 1883, so as to read as follows: "If the person in whose possession such property shall be attached shall appear at the return of the writ and file his answer thereto, and deny the possession or control of any property belonging to the defendant, or claim the money, lands, goods and chattels, &c., as creditor in possession, or in his own right, or in the right of some third person, or if any part of the said property be claimed by any other person than such defendant, then, if the plaintiff be satisfied therewith, the party in possession shall be dismissed and the plaintiff pay the cost of his action. But if the plaintiff shall contest the said return or the claim of said third person, an issue shall be made up under the direction of the judge to try the question, and the party that shall prevail in said issue shall recover the costs," &c. It seems to us, that under our decided cases, the assignee could only be heard to set up his title to the property assigned for the benefit of all the creditors, under and by virtue of this amendment to the code. If we construe it as directing the manner in which the title to the assigned property shall be determined, and section 263 of the Code as giving to one who has already "established" his right to the property, permission to "move to discharge the attachment," we will give effect to the manifest intention of the legislature, and at the same time reconcile both provisions, and *maintain the consistency of the decisions of this court. We think the Circuit Judge ought to have ordered an issue under the amendment of the code above cited, to try the question of the validity of the assignment.

The judgment of this court is, that the order of the Circuit Court be set aside without prejudice; that the case be remanded, with permission to the assignee to make "return" to the attachments, claiming the property as assignee for creditors, in order that "an issue" may be made up to try the question of the validity of the assignment of M. Foot, in accordance with the act of 1883.

In this case, the plaintiffs filed a petition for a rehearing, upon the ground that the alleged preference in the assignment for counsel fees and rents had been overlooked by this court.

December 10, 1886. The following order was passed

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition for a rehearing. We think there was no such omission as suggested. The Circuit Judge held "that the assignment upon its face was a good and sufficient instrument as a deed, and that it operated to transfer the right of property to the assignee." So far as the form of the assignment is concerned, this court concurred with the Circuit Court, holding as follows: "In the view of the Circuit Judge that he had a right to hear the motion and decide it on affidavits, we cannot say that he committed error in holding that the assignment is regular on its face and contains no provision which is inhibited by the act of the legislature (section 2014, General Statutes) or makes it void," &c.

The court did not consider that either the "proper fees for preparing the assignment" in favor of creditors, or "rents" enforceable by distress, are such debts as come within the purview of the statute against preferences. There is nothing in the assignment which necessarily indicates rents not enforceable by distress.

As it does not appear that any material fact or principle involved was overlooked in the decision, there is no ground for a re-argument. The petition is dismissed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Union, October, 1885.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. C. Wallace, for appellant.

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra.

August 10, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action commenced in September, 1884, by the plaintiff as administrator of W. J. Keenan, deceased, against John T. Hill as surviving administrator of Clough S. Meng, deceased, upon the following guaranty of the intestate Meng: "Union, S. C., February 4, 1861. On the first day of January next, we, or either of us, do promise to pay C. S. Meng or bearer, one hundred dollars, with interest from date, value received. Witness our hands and seals. (Signed) W. E. St. Clair, [L. S.], J. W. Hughes, [L. S.]" Endorsed: "I assign to William J. Keenan the within note and interest, and guarantee the payment of the same without demand or notice of non-payment by the makers. Given under my hand and seal the 28th July, 1866. (Signed) C. S. Meng, [L. S.]"

The execution of the note and guaranty were admitted, but the defendant administrator interposed two defences: first, that William J. Keenan, in his life-time, and his administrator after his death, were negligent in pursuing the remedies available and in not pushing a suit begun by William J. Keenan in his life-time against the original obligors on the note, St. Clair and Hughes; and, second, the statute of limitations.

Upon the trial the defendant offered a witness to show negligence on the part of plaintiff and his intestate in failing to demand payment of the makers, and in not notifying defendant or his intestate of non-payment. Judge Witherspoon ruled the testimony to be irrelevant, as the guaranty waived demand and notice of non-payment. The defendant's attorney then offered to put in evidence the record of a judgment obtained by William J. Keenan in his life-time against the makers of the note, refusing to include a bundle of papers filed therewith, consisting of proceedings by the plaintiff Keenan for renewal of the execution in the case, which after contest was renewed. Plaintiff's attorney objected unless the whole of it was admitted together. The judge ruled that if the defendant could show by the record any positive act by the plaintiff or his intestate, he would admit it in evidence; but if it was designed to prove mere "negligence of a passive nature" on the part of the plaintiff or his intestate, he would not admit the record, as for that purpose it was irrelevant and inadmissible. He also overruled the defence of the statute of limitations. The plaintiff had a verdict, and the plaintiff entered up judgment and execution in the form usual against administrators, viz., "de bonis testatoris, si vel non, de bonis propriis," as to costs.

The defendant appeals upon the following grounds of alleged error: "I. In holding that the statute of limitations was not a bar to the action. II. In holding that the defendant could not prove laches and negligence of plaintiff and his intestate in pursuing the remedy against the principals, resulting in irreparable injury to his intestate's estate, in discharge thereof under the guaranty and rejecting evidence offered for that purpose. And will move the court on the errors to set aside the judgment and dismiss the complaint under the first exception; and failing that, to set aside the judgment and order a new trial under the second exception."

First. As to the point that the guarantor was discharged from liability for want of due diligence on the part of the assignee in pursuing the original obligors on the note. The single bill was not negotiable—was assigned for value after due, and its payment guaranteed in absolute and unconditional terms "without demand or notice of non-payment by the makers." It is quite clear, therefore, that the guarantor had no right to demand notice of non-payment as is necessary in the case of an ordinary indorsement of a promissory note. Brandt, on Suretyship and Guaranty, section 172, says: "The rule that no notice of the principal's default need be given in order to charge the unconditional guarantor of an existing demand, is specially applicable to the guaranty of a debt made after the debt is due. In such case the principal is in default when the guaranty is made, and the reasons requiring notice do not apply." &c. Besides, in this case demand and notice were dispensed with in the guaranty itself.

But it is insisted that the contract of guaranty is in its nature collateral and secondary, and involves necessarily the condition of due diligence in the collection of the note against the original obligors. It is true that in this case the guaranty was not made to the original payee at the time the note was given, and in that sense may be regarded as secondary; but it was entered on a single bill overdue and in its terms was absolute and unconditional, and as to the assignee (who may have purchased the note alone upon the faith of the guaranty), it was really primary. There does seem to be some conflict in the authorities as to whether, under such a guaranty, it is necessary, in order to maintain his suit, for the obligee to show greater diligence than is required in the case of an ordinary surety who signed with the original debtor. But without going into the argument it is enough, as we conceive, to say that in this State the precise point was decided in the case of Foster & Judd v. Tolleson, 13 Rich., 32.

That was a case precisely like this. The action was on a guaranty in the following words: "I assign the within note to Foster & Judd, and guarantee the payment thereof for value received." This was written on a single bill or note under seal then past due. The recovery was resisted on the ground of want of due notice to defendant of non-payment, and of proper diligence on the part of plaintiffs; and it was held that "when the assignor of a sealed note past due absolutely and unconditionally guarantees its payment, he will not be discharged from liability by the failure of the assignee to give notice of non-payment or to sue the maker of the note," &c. In delivering the judgment of the court Judge O'Neill said: "The question presented in the first ground is, whether the defendant was entitled to notice of non-payment. It was clear he was not. The guarantee was absolute and unconditional, on a sealed note, which is negotiable and was after it was due. This very question was made and decided (The Bank v. Hammond, 1 Rich., 285), that the guarantor of a bond (which in all respects is like a single bill except that it has a penalty) was not entitled to notice of non-payment. So, too, that case decides the second ground against defendant: for it rules that the guarantor would not be discharged from his liability on the supposed laches of the obligee, if there was no extension of time to the obligor, which bound the obligee, as by a valid contract," &c.

In the case at bar it was not claimed that the obligee had extended the time to the obligors. On the contrary, it appeared that he had sued them to judgment, and the execution thereon had been renewed. There was no allegation as to the condition of the original obligors as to their ability to pay, or of any want of due diligence except of "a passive kind"—indulgence. See Carson v. Hill, 1 McMull., 76; Benton v. Gibson, 1 Hill, 56.

Second. As to the statute of limitations. Both the original note and guaranty were given before the adoption of the code (in 1870), which changed the law upon the subject of the statute of limitations, and therefore the question must be determined by the law as it stood before that time. The old statute of 21 James I., our statute of limitations down to the code, imposed limitations on the different actions by name—that "all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or without specialty, all actions of covenant," &c. The statute imposed no limitation on an action of debt upon a specialty, but it did limit an action of covenant, and the question is whether this is an action of debt on specialty or of "covenant." All the old forms of action are now abolished, but we suppose the question must be considered now according to the nature of the obligation. Under the old practice would this action have been "covenant" or "debt on a specialty" or bond? It is remarkable that there is so little in our reports upon the subject, as technical "covenants" and "bonds" are both under seal. But it seems to us that a contract under seal to guarantee the payment of a note under seal, must, as to the time it may run, be construed to be of the same character as the note which it guarantees; that is to say, the note under seal being a specialty and exempt from the operation of the statute of limitations, the guaranty of the payment of that note being under seal is also a specialty and exempt from the statute, just as if the guarantor were another signer and surety.

The exact point that a guaranty under seal, of a single bill under seal, is a bond and assignable as such under the act of 1798, was decided in the case of Folk v. Cruikshanks (and in a note that of Waring v. Cheeseborough), 4 Rich., 243. In the first case cited Judge O'Neill said: "This is beyond all doubt a debt by specialty, and that is a bond. That it is payable upon a contingency to arise out of the default of another, can be no objection, if, as the declaration avers, that contingency has happened; for then it becomes absolute, fixed, and certain. The case of Cay v. Galliot, 4 Strob., 282, is conclusive against defendant." And in the case in the note it is said: "The legal effect of the guaranty is to make the guarantors collateral obligors in the bond. They undertake, if the first obligors do not pay, that they will. This makes them, in the event of non-payment, the same as sureties. Their guaranty is part of the bond, and must pass under the subsequent assignment. The assignee may maintain an action in his own name against the obligors of the bond, and why not against the guarantors? It is their bond as well as that of the first obligors. It is true that if the contract of guaranty was independent of the bond, then the guarantors would not of necessity be liable to the same remedy; but when it refers to the bond, and adopts it as the contract, it is the same thing as if the defendants had executed a collateral bond to secure the payment. The guaranty here is, in legal effect, the bond of the defendants to secure the payment of the bond assigned to the assignee." &c.

We think it follows conclusively from the guaranty being a *specialty, a bond, that the action on it, according to the old forms, was debt on specialty and not an action of "covenant," and therefore the statute of limitations is not applicable.

The question as to the proper form of the judgment and execution has never been ruled upon by proper authority below, and therefore is not before this court in such manner that we can consider it.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[3. Homestead ⇨136.]

A person may defeat his own right to homestead and that of his family after him by an alienation during his life-time; but a bequest cannot defeat it, because the bequest does not take effect until the right to homestead has become vested in the widow who survives him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 249, 250; Dec. Dig. ⇨136.]

[4. Homestead ⇨141.]

It is the policy of the law to favor a homestead exemption, especially to a widow and children, against the creditors of the debtor.

Messrs. Murray & Shelor, contra.

*November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Elias Hendrix died in November, 1884, possessed of a small personal estate and owing comparatively a considerable amount of debts. He left a widow and child as his family, and a will by which he provided as follows, viz., that all his property should be sold and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of his debts; second, a bequest of $200.00 to Lula Owens, a young girl whom he had raised; and third, the residue, if any, to go to his widow, Matilda Hendrix. James Seaborn, the defendant, was named as executor, and he qualified as such.

The widow, Matilda, applied to the master, Richard Lewis, Esq., claiming the homestead exemption of $500, notwithstanding the will of her deceased husband, and the master, after taking testimony, made an order assigning her the constitutional exemption in the property of her deceased husband. The defendant, executor, excepted to the homestead set off by the commissioners under his order and appealed to the Circuit Court. The exceptions were heard by Judge Pressley, who reversed the order of the master allowing the plaintiff homestead in the personal property of her deceased husband, contrary to the provisions of his will, and set aside the same. From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"I. Because his honor erred in his conclusion of law that the testamentary disposition of property by a debtor would defeat his widow's right to homestead exemption in his property against his creditors.

"II. Because his honor erred in refusing to confirm the order of Richard Lewis, master, assigning exemption in the personality of Elias Hendrix, deceased, to his widow, Matilda.

"III. Because his honor erred in directing the executor to wind up the estate of his testator according to the provisions of his will, when the estate is insolvent and his widow entitled to homestead exemption against his debts.

"IV. Because the creditors of the testator do not become legatees under his will, and the estate being insolvent, the homestead exemption defeats the payment of the debts, and his honor should have so held.

"V. Because the husband, under the law, has no right to direct by a testamentary disposition after his death that his widow cannot claim homestead exemption against his debts, and it should have been so held by his honor.

"VI. Because the right of homestead secured by the constitution and the acts in pursuance thereof, is not an estate, but a mere exemption; hence the only effect of an assignment of homestead is to ascertain and designate what particular property is covered by such exemption, so that the same cannot be applied to the payment of debts, and thus the homestead laws do not affect the statute of distribution, nor the right of the owner to dispose of the same as he may see fit.

"VII. Because the title to property is not changed by its being designated as a homestead for the family of one deceased, but such property remains subject to the payment of debts, the application to their payment to be made at the time of the death of the person entitled to such exemption, and said property also remains subject to the provisions of a will after the constitutional exemption has been enjoyed.

"VIII. Because the assignment of homestead in this case could have no other effect than to designate and set apart certain property of testator as exempt from his debts during the life of the widow, leaving the title to such property just where it was before, and leaving the property so designated as exempt, subject to the payment of his debts and to distribution at the death of Matilda Hendrix, according to the provisions of the will of testator; and his honor should have so held," &c.

The legacy to Lula Owens being a voluntary gift, cannot stand in the way of creditors, and therefore the only question in the case is, whether the widow is entitled to the exemption of $500, as against the debts of the testator, to which he directed it to be paid by his will.

The constitution as amended in 1880 declares: "That the general assembly shall enact such laws as will exempt from attachment and sale, under any mesne or final process issued from any court, to the head of any family residing in this State, a homestead in lands, whether held in fee or any lesser estate; * * * and every head of a family residing in this State, whether enti*tled to a homestead exemption in lands or not, personal property not to exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars," &c. In order to carry this provision into effect, the general assembly has passed laws directing as to the manner in which the debtor may claim his homestead exemption, and have the same set off to him, and in addition has made the following provision: "If the husband be dead, the wife or children; if the father and mother be dead, the children living on the homestead, &c., shall be entitled to have the family homestead exempted in like manner as if the husband or parents were living," &c. "No waiver of the right of homestead, however solemn, made by the head of the family, at any time prior to the assignment of homestead, shall defeat the homestead provided for by this chapter: provided, however, that no right of homestead shall exist or be allowed in any property, real or personal, aliened or mortgaged, by any person or persons whomsoever, as against the title or claim of the alienee or mortgagee, or his, her, or their heirs or assigns." Gen. Stat., §§ 1997, 1998.

There is no doubt that the testator, Hendrix, in his life-time might have claimed the exemption; but not having done so, and had it actually assigned, he, as owner, had the right to alien or mortgage it so as to exclude his widow from claiming it after his death. See Homestead Association v. Enslow, 7 S. C., 19; Smith v. Mallone, 10 Id., 40, and subsequent cases. He did not, however, while living, execute a mortgage of his property to secure his creditors, but he left a will, by which he directed that his property should be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts; and the question is, whether that testamentary disposition was such an "alienation" of his property in the sense of the act as to exclude the widow's right to the exemption after his death. The question is one of construction as to the intent of the legislature.

It is true that, speaking in general terms, a disposition by will may be embraced in the word "alienation," used in a generic sense, as being one of the many ways in which it may be effected. But it seems to us that the accurate and specific meaning of the word is to pass an estate from one to another, involving the idea of a perfected conveyance of title inter vivos. Alienation has been defined to be "the act by which the title to an estate is voluntarily resigned by one person and accepted by another in the forms prescribed by law." 2 Bouv. L. Dict. In conformity with this definition, our court has held that a mortgage not passing the title, but being a mere security for the debt, is not an alienation under the statute, 3 and 4 W. & M., chap. 14, General Statutes, section 1952. See Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C., 354; Smith v. Grant, 15 Id., 150; Warren v. Raymond, 17 Id., 178.

The provisions of the homestead law, in the circumstances authorizing the exemption, are general in their character, specifying the cases in which the exemption is excluded, viz., alienation and mortgage by the debtor. These are clearly exceptions to a general rule, and therefore are not to be extended or enlarged by implication. It is to be assumed that, if other exceptions, such as a legacy or devise, had been intended, they would have been added to the list. The point raised here has never before arisen in this State, but the great industry and research of the appellant's counsel have enabled him to cite numerous cases from the reports of other States to the point that no instrument, conveyance, encumbrance, lien, or charge, can affect the right to claim homestead, except such as are expressly mentioned in the enactment, constitutional or statutory, creating the exemption. It seems that in homestead cases, especially as to the causes of exclusion, there is a strict application of the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius. See Pott, Dwarris, 321, where it is said: "An exception strengthens the force of law in cases not excepted; so, according to Lord Bacon, enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated."

But in addition to this, while the husband is undoubtedly the absolute owner of his property, so far as concerns the right of alienation, it is manifest that in regard to homestead the provisions of the law above cited, taken together, limit that right and create something like an interest for life in the husband, with limitation over to the wife and children; that is to say, the husband has the right to claim the exemption during his life; but if he does not avail himself of that right, it is at his death transmitted to his wife and children. Looking at it in this light, the difficulty does not lie in the fact that a testamentary provision cannot be *carried into effect until after the death of the testator; for as to mortgages, it often happens that they are not foreclosed, and may not even fall due until after the death of the mortgagor. But as to its being an alienation, the great trouble lies further back, and has reference to the time when the testamentary provision really comes into existence; whether a charge by will, which is ambulatory and does not take effect until after the death of the testator, can be said to be "an alienation" in the life-time of the testator. The will may have been prepared and executed long before, but it was inchoate, and gave no rights whatever, until the death of the testator, which was the precise moment at which the husband's right of homestead ceased to exist and was transmitted to his wife and children. Under these circumstances, can it be said that the charge in favor of the creditors came into existence in the life-time of the testator, or did it not in fact become effectual after the husband's right for life had terminated, being an attempt to reach beyond and control the matter after his death? And if so, which right should be preferred, that of creditors or the homestead right of the widow?

It seems to us, in respect to this right of homestead exemption, the husband debtor is in a condition somewhat analogous to that of the first taker in a fee conditional after issue born. He has the right in his life-time to alien by deed, but it is well settled that a devise by him is not an alienation within the meaning of the law. "If such an alienation do not take effect in the life-time of the testator, the estate must descend to the heirs of limitation per formam doni." Postell and Potter v. Jones, Harper, 92. In delivering the judgment of the court in this case, Chancellor Johnson said: "Alienation may be effected by devise; and when this question was first presented to my mind, its strong inclination was, that as one of the means it was embraced in the power given to the tenant of a conditional fee to alien on the birth of issue; but I am satisfied, on a more attentive consideration, that its meaning was intended to be restricted to alienation by deed. It will be recollected, that if the devisee had died without having been divested of the estate by some of the means authorized by law, it would have descended to the heirs of his body, and the devise would have taken effect per formam doni. *It is also clear that the devise could not take effect until after the death of the testator, so that the rights of the issue and the devisee devolved on them both at the same instant, and the question is, which of them is to be preferred? * * It is impossible to mistake the application of the principle, if we compare this estate with one held in joint tenancy, to which it has been made to apply. These estates, though different in the manner of their creation and duration and some of their properties, with respect to the powers which the tenants have over them, are strikingly analogous. A joint tenant, like a tenant of a conditional fee, may alien, forfeit, &c. (Co. Lit., 180 a), and by this means defeat the jus accrescendi; and yet Littleton says, that if one joint tenant, by testament, devise lands held in joint tenancy, the devise is void; and the reason given is, that 'no devise can take effect till after the death of the devisor, and all the lands presently cometh by the law to his companion who surviveth,' &c. See Barnett v. Barnett, 17 S. C., 552.

We see no reason why the same principle should not apply here. No bequest can take effect until after the death of the testator, and all the personal property to the extent of the homestead exemption "presently cometh by the law to the widow of testator who surviveth." Mr. Thompson, in his work on "Homesteads and Exemptions," section 544, says: "The right thus secured to the widow and orphan children of the owner of a homestead, would in some cases be rendered nugatory, if he could deprive them of it by testamentary provision. The existence of such a right in them is clearly incompatible with the existence of such a power over it by him. And in this respect it seems to make no difference whether the widow takes a plenary title by descent, as in Vermont, or by survivorship, as in California, or whether she takes a mere right of occupancy during the continuance of certain contingencies, as in most of the States," &c. See also Smythe Homest. Exemp., § 541; Brettun v. Fox, 100 Mass., 234; 10 Ill., 263.

We agree with the counsel for the respondent, that it is creditable in a debtor to make provision for the payment of his debts, and that no unnecessary impediments should be thrown in the way of such good purpose.

But it is the duty of the court simply to administer the law as they understand it. And, as it seems to us, the very existence of the homestead laws shows that in a proper case it is the policy of the law to favor the right of homestead exemption, especially that of the widow and children, against the creditors of the deceased husband.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the conclusions herein announced.

WIETERS v. TIMMONS.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Trusts ⇨131.]

Where a grantor conveyed land to C. in trust to hold the same during the life of the grantor, for the support and maintenance of his wife and her issue, he to be allowed by the trustee to receive and appropriate the income to that end, the trust was not executed during the life of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 175½; Dec. Dig. ⇨131.]

[2. Trusts ⇨131.]

Upon the death of the grantor the trustee was to hold as to the one moiety to the sole and separate use of the grantor's widow for life, with remainder to his issue, and as to the other moiety to the use of such issue and their heirs forever. Held, that upon the death of the grantor the trust was executed as to one moiety in the issue (his two sons) who survived him, but was not executed as to the other moiety in the widow.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 175½; Dec. Dig. ⇨131.]

[3. Trusts ⇨191.]

Power of sale given to the trustee upon the written request of the widow, if she survived the grantor, could not have been intended to apply to the moiety of the two sons after it vested absolutely in them, at the death of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. ⇨191.]

[4. Partition ⇨13.]

The interest of one of these sons having been sold under execution after the grantor's death, the purchaser was entitled to have a partition.

Before Hudson, J., Marion, July, 1885.

This was an action that involved the construction of the following deed:

Know all men by these presents that I, J. Morgan Timmons, of the District of Darlington, in the State aforesaid, for and in consideration of the love and affection I have toward my wife, Josephine B. Timmons, and with the view to secure to my said wife and her issue a comfortable maintenance and support, &c., and for the further consideration of ten dollars, to me paid by Theodore J. Cannon, at and before the sealing and delivery of this deed, have granted, bargained, sold, and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, and release, unto the said Theodore J. Cannon all that plantation and tract of land containing four hundred and twenty acres, more or less. * * * Also the following named slaves, to wit: * * * To have and to hold the said land and slaves, and the future issue and increase of the said slaves, to the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs forever.

In the trust and confidence, nevertheless, that the said Theodore J. Cannon, and his heirs, shall stand seized of the said lands, and hold the said slaves and their increase, subject to and for the following uses and purposes, trusts, and remainder; that is to say, after the full payment and satisfaction of all my just debts, the said trustee and his heirs shall suffer me to receive the income of said property, or to use and possess the said property during my natural life, the annual income of said property thus received to be appropriated by me to the support and maintenance of my said wife and her issue, either now living or which may hereafter be born, and to the education of said issue, free from the future debts, contracts, and liabilities of myself and said wife; if my said wife shall survive me, and at my death there shall be living issue of my said wife by me, then the said property shall be held as to one moiety to the sole and separate use of my wife for life, and as to the other moiety to the use of said issue and their heirs forever. * * *

The said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs shall hold said property in the further trust and confidence, that upon the joint request in writing of myself and wife, or upon the request of the survivor, the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs shall sell the whole or any part of the said property, and invest the proceeds in other property, either real or slaves; and the property so purchased shall be held subject to the same uses and trusts, limitations and restrictions, as are herein expressed of and concerning that which is hereby conveyed, and on such sale the purchaser shall not be responsible for the proper application or investment of the proceeds of sale; also that the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs, upon the joint request in writing of myself and wife, shall convey by deed, in proper form, the whole of the property hereby conveyed to such other person or persons as myself and said wife may nominate and appoint, as a trustee or trustees, in the stead of the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs, and such substituted trustee or trustees shall have the same rights, powers, duties, &c., as are hereby vested in the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this the 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, and in the 83d year of American Independence.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The defence is that John has no estate subject to levy and sale under the terms of the deed, the legal title being alone in the trustee. The deed provides, among other things, that "if my said wife shall survive me, and at my death there shall be living issue of my said wife by me, then the said property shall be held as to one moiety to the sole and separate use of my wife for life, and, as to the other moiety, to the use of such issue and their heirs forever." Now, the donor did die leaving him surviving his wife, Josephine, and their issue, two sons, John and James. In these two sons, upon the death of their father, one moiety of the land vested absolutely in fee—that is, to them and their heirs forever, according to my interpretation of the deed.

What duty has the trustee to perform in and about this moiety? If there was any contingency about these respective interests during the life-time of the father, there has been none since his death. At any time since their father's death in 1863, these sons could have demanded that their shares be set apart in severalty, free and discharged of the trusts of the deed. By silent operation of law, the fee, eo instanti the death of the father, passed from the trustee into them, severing their estate from that of the mother. The interest of John became subject to levy and sale. No duty of the trustee, no scheme of the trust, no right, title, or estate of the trustee, could be invaded by a transfer of his interest and a severance by partition. We hold that ever since 1863 he has had a right to enjoy his share in severalty and in fee, and that the plaintiff has become lawfully vested of this estate and is entitled to partition.

To Josephine B. Norwood, or to her trustee, must be allotted the one moiety to be held under the terms of the deed, and of the other moiety the one-half will be allotted in fee to the defendant, J. Maxey Timmons, and the other half to the plaintiff, as *the purchaser of John's interest. And it is so ordered, adjudged, and decreed. Whether the plaintiff upon the death of Mrs. Norwood will have a share in her moiety, cannot now be determined, but that question is for the future.

But I will not order the writ in partition to issue in the absence of a trustee to represent the legal title to the moiety of Mrs. Josephine Norwood. The defendants, in their answer, insist that the trustee is a necessary party to the action, and in this I concur. The legal title of the trustee, T. J. Cannon, who is now deceased, so far as the widow's share goes, is vested in his oldest male heir, who should be made a party defendant, in order that the partition shall be final and conclusive on all concerned. Let the living eldest male heir of T. J. Cannon be made a party defendant, and the final judgment be till then left open.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, for appellants.
Mr. C. A. Woods, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff demanded judgment below that a certain tract of land, situate in Marion County, and described in the complaint, be partitioned between himself and the defendant, James Maxey Timmons, the plaintiff claiming three-fourths during the life-time of the defendant, Josephine B. Norwood, and one-half in fee as purchaser of the interests of the said Josephine and of the interest of defendant, John M. Timmons, and alleging that James Maxey Timmons was entitled to the remaining fourth of life interest of Josephine, and to one-half in fee after the death of the said Josephine, and he prayed partition according to their said respective rights. The rights of the parties depended upon the construction of a certain deed set out in the "Case," executed by one J. Morgan Timmons, now deceased, in 1858, who was the husband of the defendant, Josephine, and the father of the two Timmons, defendants. This deed conveyed the land upon certain trusts to one Cannon, for the use of the said Josephine, and to the issue of the said J. Morgan Timmons and of his wife, the said Josephine.

*The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the defendant, J. M. Timmons, had become the purchaser of the interest of his mother, the said Josephine, and that afterwards the interest of the said J. M. Timmons had been sold at sheriff's sale, at which he, the plaintiff, was purchaser; and, as stated, the action below was instituted for partition, the plaintiff claiming, as above mentioned, the interest of the said Josephine and of the said John M. Timmons. Purvis, the other defendant, was tenant of the other parties, and was made a party on that account. It appeared in the progress of the case, that John M. Timmons had never purchased the interest of his mother: the claim of the plaintiff, therefore, to that extent had no foundation. It was not denied, however, that the individual interest of John M. Timmons had been levied upon and sold to the plaintiff, but whether this was such an interest as could be levied upon and sold, was one of the questions in the case. It further appeared that the trustee, Cannon, was dead and his heir at law was not made a party.

The Circuit Judge construed the deed, adjudging that Josephine was entitled to one moiety to be held under the terms of the deed for her use, and that the other moiety belonged in fee, one-half to James Maxey, and the other half to J. M. Timmons, which latter interest had passed to the plaintiff at the sheriff's sale, this interest being, in his opinion, a leviable interest and passing under said sale; but whether the plaintiff, upon the death of Josephine, would have a share in her moiety under his purchase, he held could not now be determined, as this depended upon future developments. The Circuit Judge, however, declined to order the partition, holding, as he did, that the legal title of Josephine in the land had vested in the trustee under the deed, who being dead, this title was now in his oldest male heir, who should be made a party defendant, in order that the partition should be final and conclusive. He therefore suspended final judgment until the eldest male heir of T. J. Cannon, the deceased trustee, be made a party, and left the case standing in that condition.

The defendants appealed upon two grounds: 1st. Because his honor erred in holding that the defendant, John M. Timmons, had an estate in the said tract of land subject to levy and sale *under the terms of the deed, and that the legal title was not in the trustee. 2d. Because his honor erred in hearing and deciding the case upon its merits before the trustee was made a party to the action. Since the hearing below, the eldest male heir of Cannon, the trustee deceased, has become a party, and has consented, upon the record, that the case may be heard here upon its merits, thereby waiving the second ground of appeal above. The only question, then, before us is the character of the estate of John M. Timmons in the land in question.

First, was the trust executed and has the legal title to one moiety of the land passed by operation of the statute to John M. and his brother? The Circuit Judge so held, and therefore adjudged that the plaintiff being the purchaser at sheriff's sale of the interest of John M. was entitled to partition. It has been frequently held that where the trustee has any duty to perform, to the complete performance of which it is necessary that the legal title shall remain in him, the statute does not apply. On the other hand, where the trustee is charged with no duty in reference to the property conveyed, there the statute does apply and silently passes the title through the trustee to the cetui que trust, or, to be more accurate, to the grantee. McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 74; Bristow v. McCall, 16 S. C. 546.

Now, was there anything here for the trustee to do in reference to the interests of John M. Timmons and James Maxey Timmons? We see nothing. Under the deed, the property conveyed was to be held in trust during the life of the grantor, for the support and maintenance of his wife and her issue, the grantor to be allowed by the trustee to receive and appropriate the income to that end. During this time, there being something for the trustee to do, the statute did not apply. But the deed further provided that, upon the death of the grantor, if his wife survived him and there should also be issue surviving at his death, then the said property should be held as to one moiety to the sole and separate use of his wife for life, and as to the other moiety to the use of such issue and their heirs forever. The grantor died leaving his wife surviving and also his two sons, the defendants, John M. and James Maxey. Now, if there was no other *provision in the deed except as stated above, it could not be doubted, but that upon the death of the grantor the two sons took a vested legal interest in one moiety of the property, the other moiety being still held by the trustee for the use of their mother during her life, and the interest of John M. in said first moiety having been levied upon and sold by the sheriff, and purchased by the plaintiff, the said plaintiff would be entitled to have that interest set apart to him.

There is, however, another provision in the deed. In a proviso thereto it is stated, "that the trustee, Theodore J. Cannon, and his heirs shall hold said property in the further trust and confidence that upon the joint request in writing of myself and wife, or upon the request of the survivor, the said Theodore J. Cannon and his heirs shall sell the whole or any part of said property." Under this proviso appellants claim that the legal title to the whole property has remained in the trustee so as to enable him to make sale thereof, in the event that a request in writing to that effect should be made by the grantor and his wife or the survivor of them—the appellants contending that in such an event there would be a duty devolving upon the trustee, in reference to the property, and consequently preventing the operation of the statute.

This would be conclusive in favor of the appellants, if the proviso above applied to the interests of John M. and James Maxey. But does it thus apply? Whether it does or not, is a matter of intention to be ascertained by a construction of the entire deed. The deed is somewhat peculiar in the fact that it conveys different interests to the same parties according to circumstances arising at different times. In the first place, and during the life of the grantor, the whole property was to be held in trust, the income thereof to be appropriated by the grantor himself for the support and maintenance of his wife and her then issue. Second, upon his death, his wife surviving, and issue surviving, one moiety was to be held in trust for the use of his wife and the other moiety for the issue; but in case there was no issue surviving, then the whole of the property to be held for the sole and separate use of the wife for life. And then after several other grants, conditioned upon the above failing, follows a general *proviso in which among others is included the one mentioned above, to wit: that the property might be sold by the trustee upon the joint request of the grantor and his wife or upon the request of the survivor.

During the life of the grantor he was to have control of the entire income of the property to be used by him in the support and maintenance of his wife and children, and the education of said children, and it was not unreasonable that he should attach thereto the proviso in question, permitting him and his wife to change the property if found necessary, subject to be reinvested for the same purposes as expressed in the original deed. Up to his death the interest of the issue, other than support and maintenance, was contingent, and the proviso could in no way therefore affect them. Upon the death, however, of the grantor, the interest of the wife and the issue was separated by the terms of the deed, the wife being entitled to the use and benefit of one moiety for life and the other moiety to go to the issue in fee. The grantor died without making any request jointly with his wife for the sale of the property or any portion thereof, and for the reinvestment of the proceeds, and therefore it is no longer possible for such joint request to be made; and although it is true, the proviso empowered the survivor to make such request, yet it would be utterly inconsistent with the vested interests of the issue in the moiety to which they became entitled at the death of their father (the grantor) to suppose that this power extended to said interest.

Doubtless the widow by request might have the moiety of which she is still the cestui que trust sold and the proceeds reinvested, but she has no power over the moiety of the issue. That moiety, by operation of the statute, passed at the death of the grantor to said issue, investing them with the fee discharged of all trust.

It is the judgment of this court, that so much of the judgment below as has adjudged that to Josephine B. Norwood, or her trustee, one moiety must be allotted to be held under the terms of the deed, and the other moiety the one-half in fee to the plaintiff as the purchaser of John M. Timmons's interest, and the other half in fee to the defendant,

James Maxey Timmons, be *affirmed, and that the case be remanded so that the partition sought may be had according to their rights herein above.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The Camperdown Mills, a corporation duly chartered under the laws of this State, was for several years successfully engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods, running two mills, in or near the city of Greenville, South Carolina, known as Mill No. 1 and Mill No. 2. The company having contracted debts to a large amount, which it was unable to provide for from the income, the stockholders, at a meeting held on April 28, 1883, adopted a resolution authorizing the issue of coupon bonds to an amount not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars. The bonds were accordingly prepared and made payable to the defendant, Hamlin Beattie, or bearer, and were secured by a mortgage on all the property of the company, executed to said Beattie as trustee for that purpose. This scheme not proving effectual for the relief of the company, only a few of the bonds having been sold and others pledged as collaterals, on January 21, 1885, a majority of the stockholders adopted a resolution for the sale of all the machinery in Mill No. 1, and the same was advertised for sale on March 11, 1885.

Thereupon this action was commenced, about March 1, 1885, by the plaintiffs, who are holders of a minority of the stock of the company, two of them being also creditors of the said company. The plaintiffs in their complaint, after stating the facts above mentioned, allege that the sale of the machinery out of one of the mills would be disastrous to the interests of the company, and *charge that the holders of a majority of the stock have wrongfully and fraudulently confederated together to get possession and control of the entire property of the company and buy it at a sacrifice, to the great prejudice of the other stockholders as well as the creditors of the company. They therefore demand judgment that the sale of the machinery in Mill No. 1 may be enjoined; that the trustee, Hamlin Beattie, be enjoined from further negotiating any of the said coupon bonds; that the creditors be enjoined from enforcing their claims against the company except under these proceedings, and that for this purpose they may be required to come in and establish their demands; that a receiver may be appointed, and that all the property of the company may be sold and applied to the debts of the company, and the remainder be distributed amongst the stockholders according to their respective rights.

On March 5, 1885, a temporary restraining order, with an order to show cause why it should not be made perpetual, was granted. On March 7, 1885, sundry creditors of the corporation, including the defendant, Hamlin Beattie, and the plaintiff, Wm. Wilkins, issued attachments against the company, aggregating a sum exceeding thirty-seven thousand dollars, and on the same day considerable of the property of the corporation was levied on under said attachments. On or about March 21, 1885, the defendant, Hamlin Beattie, as president of the corporation, filed his answer, in which, amongst other things, he states that a large majority of the stock of the company is held by parties resident in the States of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania; that it has not been practicable, since the service of the summons and complaint in this case, to have a legal meeting of the stockholders, and that he is not advised as to the position which they desire the company to take; that while the statements in the complaint as to the condition of the company and the official action of the stockholders are substantially true, he has no knowledge or information sufficient to enable him to form a belief as to the truth of those allegations in which the majority of the stockholders are charged with improper motives and wrongful conduct, but he does know that the sale of the machinery in Mill No. 1 was indefinitely postponed by the officers of the company before the service of the *summons and complaint herein, and that, so far as he is advised, there is no desire or intention on the part of said stockholders to sell said machinery separately; that he concurs in the opinion that the property can be sold to the best advantage by selling it as a whole, and submits the rights of the corporation to the judgment of the court. The answers of the other defendants are not set out in the record, but it is simply stated that George F. Hall, as treasurer of the company, who seems to have been the chief manager of the affairs of the company, put in an answer, and that his answer, with that of the president, concurred in the prayer of the complaint.

On April 6, 1885, an order was granted appointing Hamlin Beattie receiver, in which it was stated that all parties agreed that one should be appointed; enjoining the creditors from enforcing their claims otherwise than under this proceeding, and requiring them to come in by a given day and establish their claims before the master; and enjoining Hamlin Beattie as trustee, as well as the officers of the company, from negotiating or hypothecating any of the coupon bonds which had not then been sold or used as collaterals. On April 8, 1885, the receiver was ordered to sell all the property of the company and hold the proceeds of sale, after paying the costs and expenses thereof, subject to the further order of the court. From the report of the master as to claims proved and from the report of the receiver on sales, it appears that the debts of the company amount to something over one hundred and two thousand dollars, while the proceeds of sale are something over eighty-six thousand dollars. It is apparent, therefore, that the creditors cannot be paid in full, and the stockholders will get nothing. It is stated in the "Case," that on the application for the appointment of a receiver, the plaintiffs contended for the appointment of H. P. Hammett and the appellants for the appointment of Hamlin Beattie.

The funds in the hands of the receiver being ready for distribution, two orders were granted by Judge Wallace, referring it to the master to inquire and report what would be a suitable fee to be paid to Messrs. Wells and Orr, attorneys for the plaintiffs, for their services in this action, and also what would be a suitable fee for Messrs. T. Q. and A. H.

Donaldson, attorneys for *the Camperdown Mills and Hamlin Beattie, as receiver. Under each of these orders the master reported, "that he had held a reference, and from the evidence adduced and herewith, filed, he finds" that twenty-five hundred dollars would be a reasonable and proper fee for Messrs. Wells and Orr, as attorneys for the plaintiffs, and that two thousand dollars would be a reasonable and proper fee for Messrs. T. Q. and A. H. Donaldson, as attorneys for the Camperdown Mills and Hamlin Beattie, receiver. Upon hearing these reports Judge Wallace, on December 4, 1885, granted orders confirming said reports and directing the receiver to pay these gentlemen the amounts reported as proper fees for them from the funds in his hands as such receiver.

It does not appear that Judge Wallace heard any part of the case on its merits, all the previous orders having been granted by Judge Pressley, except one which was granted by Judge Cothran. Nor does the testimony filed with the master's reports, which is all set out in the record, throw any light upon the nature of the case, or the kind or amount of the professional services rendered by the gentlemen to whom these fees were awarded, but consists simply of expressions of opinion from various prominent members of the Greenville bar of the value of the services, formed from their own knowledge of the nature and amount of such services.

From these orders of December 4, 1885, George F. Hall, as treasurer of the Camperdown Mills, and in his own right, Freeman & Vinton, the Massachusetts Loan & Trust Company, and the Nonantum Worsted Company appeal upon the following grounds: "1st. Because the fees allowed in said orders were excessive in amount, and granted upon ex parte orders of reference obtained at chambers without the knowledge of defendants, appellants, or their counsel, and without an opportunity on their part to adduce evidence to show that fact. 2d. Because said fees were illegal, the court having no authority to direct the payment of said fees out of the funds in the possession of the receiver."

We will consider the second ground first, as that seems to be the most logical order—first to determine whether any fees could be legally allowed, before undertaking to inquire into the propriety of the mode adopted for the purpose of ascertaining the amount which should be allowed, or whether such amount has been correctly ascertained.

First, as to the fee allowed the plaintiffs' attorneys. This subject has been before the court in three recent cases—Hand v. Savannah & Charleston R. R. Co., 21 S. C. 162; Westmoreland v. Martin, 24 Id., 238; and Ex parte Lynch and others, In re Reeves v. Tappan, ante p. 193, and we think it is there settled that a claim for professional services against persons who are sui juris, or against the property of such persons, must, like a claim for any other services, rest upon contract either express or implied, made directly with the persons so sought to be charged, or with some agent or representative of such persons, and that the simple fact that such services have enured to the benefit of others, with whom there is no contract relation, either directly or through some agent or representative, affords no legal foundation for a charge against such other persons. So that the simple question here is, not whether the services of the attorneys of the plaintiffs have enured to the benefit of the appellants, but whether any contract relation has been established between them.

It is not pretended that there was any contract, either express or implied, between the plaintiffs' attorneys and the appellants directly, and the only ground, therefore, upon which the claim could rest would be that the plaintiffs in employing these gentlemen to commence this action, were acting as the representatives of a class to which the appellants belonged. But this is negatived by the express terms used in their complaint, where they say: "That these plaintiffs bring this action for their own protection, and for the benefit and protection of the general creditors and stockholders who have not confederated as aforesaid," thereby in terms excluding the defendants, who had previously been charged with confederating together to wrong and defraud the other stockholders and creditors from the benefit and protection of the action which these gentlemen had been employed to institute. Now, in the face of this, the plaintiffs can be regarded as acting as the representatives of a class to which the appellants belong, when they employed these attorneys to bring the action, we cannot conceive. On the contrary, it seems to us that the plaintiffs, constituting only a minority of the corporation, *becoming dissatisfied with the policy which the majority saw fit to adopt in the management of the affairs of the company, declared open war against them, and by charges of gross misconduct and fraud, of which, however, no evidence was offered, sought to wrest from the majority the control of the affairs of the corporation, the prime motive seeming to be to prevent what they regarded an unwise sale of a portion of the property of the corporation, which sale, however, the president of the company says in his answer, had been indefinitely postponed before this action was commenced, or at least before the service of the summons and complaint.

It seems to us clear, therefore, that the attorneys employed by the plaintiffs, in the outset, certainly could not be regarded, in any sense, as the attorneys of or acting for the appellants. If they were not so when the action was commenced, when did they become so? The nature of the allegations in the complaint rendered it necessary for the appellants to employ other counsel to defend themselves from charges which, if not unfounded, are certainly unsustained by any testimony whatever, and having thus been compelled to employ other counsel, whose fees they will, of course, have to pay, it would seem to be a hard measure of justice if they were also required to contribute to the payment of the counsel of their adversaries. The fact that they afterwards acquiesced in the appointment of a receiver and an order of sale, cannot affect the question. This might have been prompted by a desire to avoid tedious and expensive litigation, or the complications which might arise from the commencement of the attachment suits after this action was commenced. The fact still remains that by the course pursued by the plaintiffs they were compelled to employ other counsel, who represented their interests throughout these proceedings, and who seem to have succeeded in having the person of their choice appointed receiver in opposition to the person proposed by the plaintiffs.

It has been argued here that the plaintiffs "were in law and in fact trustees," and that having in that capacity brought this action, their expenses in so doing, including the fees of their counsel, are properly chargeable on the assets of the corporation, constituting the trust fund. We do not question the proposition *that a trustee is entitled to reimbursement out of the trust fund, for all expenses properly incurred in preserving or protecting that fund. But we are unable to understand how these plaintiffs can, in any sense, be regarded as trustees. They were simply stockholders in a corporation, holding only a minority of the stock, two of them being also creditors to a comparatively small amount. Being in the minority they could not control, and therefore would not be responsible for the management of the affairs of the corporation. They certainly cannot be regarded as trustees for the other stockholders, and as to the creditors, they simply stood in the relation of debtors to the extent of their interest in the corporation. We are unable to see how, in any view of the case, the fee of the attorneys for the plaintiffs can be charged on the general fund in the hands of the receiver, but think that these gentlemen must look to those who employed them or recognized them as their attorneys for their compensation.

This view renders it unnecessary, so far as this claim is concerned, to consider the questions presented by the first ground of appeal. We do not for a moment doubt that this claim has been urged in the best of faith, and under a full conviction of its rightfulness, and there is as little doubt that Messrs. Wells and Orr rendered valuable services in the case for which they should be amply compensated, and it would give us pleasure to be able to award it to them; but we have no power to subject the fund in the hands of the receiver to such payment, unless we could find some legal ground upon which to base the charge, and this we have been unable to do.

As to the fee of Messrs. T. Q. and A. H. Donaldson, as attorneys for the Camperdown Mills and for the receiver, we think it was properly chargeable on the fund in the hands of the receiver. The corporation was a necessary party to the action, and as such had a right to employ and did employ these gentlemen as their attorneys, and certainly the assets of the corporation, now represented by the fund in the hands of the receiver, should be applied to the payment of such services as these gentlemen rendered as attorneys of the corporation. The authorities cited in the argument for these respondents fully show that the counsel fees of the *receiver are properly chargeable on the funds in his hands. The receiver has a right to employ counsel to advise him as to the management of the property placed in his hands and as to his duties in the premises; and in this case, judging from the expeditious manner in which this large business has been wound up, apparently to the satisfaction of all parties concerned, the receiver must have been well advised, and his counsel should be well paid for their services. The only question is as to the mode of ascertaining the amount of such compensation.

As is usual and proper in such cases, there was an order of reference to the master to inquire and report what would be a proper fee, but the complaint is that the order was ex parte, obtained at chambers, and the reference was held without notice to appellants and without an opportunity on their part to adduce testimony or to be heard as to the matter referred. There is nothing in the "Case" to show that the order of reference was ex parte, obtained at chambers, or that the reference was held without notice, and but for the fact that it was admitted in the argument here that the reference was ex parte, this omission would have been fatal to the appellants so far as this point is concerned. For, as we have several times had occasion to say, and now repeat, this court cannot accept any fact unless it appears in the "Case" as prepared for argument here, or unless it is admitted upon the hearing in this court. It is true that the fact that this reference was ex parte is stated in the first exception or ground of appeal, but, as we have frequently held, that is not sufficient, for the very obvious reason that the exceptions constitute no part of the "Case," and while any erroneous statements contained in the "Case" may be corrected by amendment, such is not the case with the exceptions, which are entirely under the control of the appellant. Hence we can look alone to the "Case" for the facts, disregarding all statements of any other facts which may be incorporated in the exceptions or in the argument, unless such additional facts are admitted by the other side on the argument here. This matter is only alluded to for the purpose of calling the attention of the bar to the importance of observing the rule in this respect, for, as we have said, it was admitted on *the argument here that the reference was ex parte, and the question, therefore, is whether such a reference was proper.

Upon general principles, fully recognized by all courts in the administration of justice, it would seem to be clear that no order should be granted whereby the property of one man will be subjected to the payment of an alleged debt to another until the person whose property is so to be charged has had an opportunity to be heard as to the justice and amount of the charge so to be made. The case of Nimmons v. Stewart (13 S. C., 445) is, however, relied upon, in opposition to this view, and to sustain the course pursued in the case now under consideration, and we must admit that that case does seem to support the view for which it is cited. There is, however, this difference between that case and this. There the Circuit Judge had before him the whole case, and had, therefore, the means of knowing not only the nature of the case, but also of forming his own opinion of the value of the professional services there in question, and as this court then said, "he might also have fixed the amount of the fee without reference," but simply for his own satisfaction he desired to hear the opinion of a referee, which he could either adopt or not as he might see fit, and "this," it is said, "was not one of those references of which the parties had a right to notice." In this case, however, the judge who ordered the reference, and who confirmed the master's report, had, so far as the record shows, no means of knowing anything about the nature of the case, or the amount or value of the services rendered, and was therefore dependent wholly upon the judgment of the master.

But while this may be sufficient to distinguish this case from Nimmops v. Stewart, we desire to take this occasion to express our dissatisfaction with so much of that case as gives countenance to the idea that a reference to ascertain the amount of a fee to be charged on a fund under the control of the court should ever be ex parte. The parties interested in the fund have a right to be heard both by evidence and argument, if they so desire, before the property or fund to which they are entitled is subjected to a charge of any kind, and hence notice of such a reference is always necessary. The case of Nimmops v. Stewart was very imperfectly presented to the court, and therefore the point as to the character of the reference may not have received as full and mature consideration as would otherwise have been given to it. We think, therefore, that while the Messrs. Donaldson are entitled to a reasonable and proper fee out of the funds in the hands of the receiver, that there was error in the mode pursued to ascertain the amount of such fee, and that the reference for that purpose should be upon notice to the parties interested or their counsel.

The judgment of this court is, that the orders of the Circuit Court appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

Before Pressley, J., Berkeley, June, 1885.
The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. J. Whaley, for appellant.

*Messrs. Mitchell & Smith, contra.

September 23, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff being the owner of a considerable body of land on John's Island had cut up a portion of it into small lots for the convenience of purchasers; and after selling a good many of these lots, the defendant applied to him to buy a lot at a certain designated place on that portion of the land not then divided into lots. Plaintiff agreed verbally to sell to defendant thirty acres, at the place indicated, at five dollars per acre, and ten dollars for papers and plat, making in all the sum of one hundred and sixty dollars. On January 23, 1874, in pursuance of said agreement, defendant paid to plaintiff ninety dollars and took from him a receipt in the following words: "Charleston, January 23rd, 1874. Received of James Brisbane $90 on account of the purchase of thirty acres of land, the balance of $70 is due January 1st, 1875, when I will make good titles. J. M. Humbert."

In a few days after this receipt was given, the lot, designated as No. 37 on the plat used on the trial of this case, was surveyed and laid off for defendant, and he was placed in possession by the plaintiff, and has ever since continued in possession, except of about ten acres of which he was dispossessed by the plaintiff in 1883, as will be herein-after more fully stated, and has made improvements of no inconsiderable value, considered in reference to the value of the lot. On the day of the survey defendant inquired of the plaintiff how many acres were in lot No. 37, and was informed that this could not be precisely ascertained until the surveyor had made his calculations, though it was supposed the lot contained something less than thirty acres, whereupon defendant said this was not enough and that he wanted more land, and plaintiff told him he could have more off the adjoining lot, No. 34, which had previously been laid off.

At this point there is direct conflict in the testimony as to what further occurred between the parties, the plaintiff claiming that the defendant agreed to take the whole of lot No. 34, containing about thirty-nine acres, thus making the whole amount something *over sixty acres, while the defendant claims that he never agreed to buy lot No. 34, but that he bespoke it for his brother. Subsequently it was ascertained that lot No. 37 contained only 23 9-10 acres, and one of the material questions in the case is whether the contract was for the purchase of both lots, or for one only. While there is no dispute about the fact that defendant took and retained possession of lot No. 37, as before stated, there is no little conflict of testimony as to whether he ever went into possession of any part of lot No. 34. In the meantime defendant made further payments, to wit: twenty dollars on the day of the survey, twelve dollars on January 1, 1877, and thirty-seven dollars and twenty cents about January 1, 1880, which defendant claims overpaid the amount due for the 23 9-10 acres contained in lot No. 37. Plaintiff, on the other hand, insisting that the defendant had bought both of the lots, claimed that there was a very considerable balance due him, and in 1883, believing that defendant, by his failure to pay the purchase money, had forfeited his rights to the land, sold to John Waight a portion of lot No. 34, with ten acres off of lot No. 37, dispossessing defendant of said ten acres, and putting Waight in possession, who cultivated the ten acres for two years before this action was brought.

But, upon consultation with his counsel, plaintiff was advised that his rights were those of a mortgagee and not those of an absolute owner, and, therefore, this action was commenced to foreclose the equitable mortgage for the balance of the purchase money, in which judgment was demanded for the sale of both lots, in default of payment by the defendant of the balance due on the purchase money of the sixty odd acres embraced in the two lots. Defendant answered claiming that the contract was for the purchase of lot No. 37 only, and that he had paid and overpaid the purchase money for that lot, containing as it did only 23 9-10 acres instead of thirty acres, and he demanded specific performance of that contract. He also set up a counter-claim for damages in evicting him from ten acres of that lot. The issues were referred to the master, who made his report, in which he adopted the view of the contract contended for by defendant, and that this contract, though not in writing, was relieved from the operation of the statute of frauds by part performance and was, therefore, *valid. He also ascertained by a calculation based upon data for which we find no warrant in the testimony, that the precise balance due for the purchase money of lot No. 37 had been paid, and he therefore recommended that the plaintiff be required to execute to the defendant good and sufficient titles, with warranty, for lot No. 37 as represented on the plat of O. P. Law, used on the trial of the cause.

To this report both parties excepted on the several grounds set out in the "Case," which need not be repeated here in detail. Upon this report and exceptions the case came before Judge Pressley, who held that the master's findings of fact were not supported by the testimony. On the contrary, he said: "My conclusion from that testimony is that in January, 1874, the parties made a written contract for thirty acres of land at $160, on which $90 was then paid and the remainder, $70, was to be paid on January 1, 1875. When the surveyor laid off the said land he gave defendant only twenty-three acres, with which he was not satisfied. Not getting the thirty acres he had bought, he agreed by parol to take an additional lot, making in all sixty-three acres, but I find no satisfactory proof that he ever took possession in his own right of more than the thirty acres. His brother took possession of a portion of the additional lot, and plaintiff was to be responsible that said brother would take and pay for it, but that promise was by parol. After various payments on account by defendant and failure to pay in full, plaintiff, claiming a forfeiture, took possession of all of said land except 30 9-10 acres, and sold it to John Waight, who now holds the same. The thirty acres called for by the contract has never been properly laid off to defendant. I hold that a written contract for sale of land cannot be changed by parol, and that there is no sufficient proof of possession under that change to validate it. I further hold that if said change were valid, it was rescinded by plaintiff when he sold part of said land to John Waight. My judgment is that both parties must stand by the written contract. On that, after calculation of interest from January 1, 1875, to January 1, 1886, the balance due the plaintiff will then be twenty-four dollars and fifty cents." He therefore rendered judgment that the defendant pay to the plaintiff, by a day appointed, that sum and the costs *of this case, and that plaintiff do, thereupon, make to defendant good and sufficient titles "to thirty acres of said land, excluding that which was sold to John Waight," and that in default of such payment the thirty acres of land be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said debt and cost, and the balance be paid to defendant.

From this judgment defendant appeals upon numerous grounds which need not be set out here, as we propose to consider only such material questions as are presented by the record.

We cannot concur in the view that there was any such written contract between these parties as would satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds. The only writing that we hear of which was signed by either of the parties is the receipt of January 23, 1874, of which a copy is given above, and in that there is no such description or designation of the land proposed to be sold as would enable a court to render a decree for its conveyance. There is nothing but a bare statement of the number of acres, but where it is located or what are its boundaries is left wholly uncertain. It seems to us that the authorities clearly show that such a writing is wholly insufficient. Church of Advent v. Farrow, 7 Rich. Eq., 378; Hyde v. Cooper, 13 Id., 250; Mims v. Chandler, 21 S. C., 480.

But as it is well settled that even a parol contract for the sale of land may be enforced when there has been such part performance as, under the cases, will take it out of the operation of the statute, it is necessary for us to inquire whether there has been any such part performance in this case. Mere payment of a part or the whole of the purchase money, without more, is not sufficient; but when such payment is accompanied with possession, acquired under the contract, and the purchaser has made improvements, it is sufficient. Mims v. Chandler, supra, and the authorities there cited. Assuming for the purpose of this inquiry, though the testimony leaves it in no little doubt, that after the original agreement for the purchase of thirty acres, the defendant also made a parol agreement to buy the other lot—No. 34—at the same price, let us inquire whether there was any such part performance of such additional contract as would take it out of the statute of frauds. We do not find any satisfactory proof that the defendant ever took possession of any part of lot No. 34. The testimony of some of the witnesses, contradicted as it is, that defendant cut and hauled wood from lot No. 34, can scarcely be regarded as sufficient proof of such possession as would constitute part performance. There is no evidence that any improvements were made on that lot by the defendant, and none that he ever made any payments on account of the purchase money, his payments, as he testifies, having been made on the other lot. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge that the contract, as set up by plaintiff, embracing the purchase of both lots, has not been established.

Next, as to the contract set up by defendant and of which he claims specific performance. There can be no doubt from the terms of the receipt that the original agreement was that defendant was to have thirty acres, but when this agreement came to be carried into effect by the surveying and platting the lot which he was to get, he only received twenty-three and nine-tenths acres. Now, whether the failure to give defendant the whole amount he contracted for would have warranted him in refusing to comply with the terms of the agreement, is a question which need not now be considered. The fact is, that he did accept the lot No. 37, although it contained a less number of acres than he contracted for, was put into possession of it by the plaintiff, in pursuance of the original contract, has ever since remained in possession, claiming it as his own, making improvements, and paying the purchase money. It seems to us that the legitimate inference is that the parties, by their acts, have modified the original agreement so that the defendant was to get lot No. 37, containing only 23 9-10 acres instead of thirty acres. That was the area of the land which the plaintiff, in pursuance of the original agreement had surveyed and laid off for defendant and put him in possession, and that was what the defendant accepted.

It is true that, at the time, the defendant expressed a desire to have more land, and the plaintiff expressed a willingness to let him have more, but this desire and this intention never ripened into any act. No more land was laid off for the defendant, and there is no evidence that either party ever expressed any wish or intention, much less ever took any step, to abrogate the contract on account of the deficiency in the number of acres laid off for defendant, and we think, after this lapse of time, the parties must be regarded as having, by their conduct, acquiesced in such a modification of the original agreement as that the defendant could only claim from the plaintiff lot No. 37, and the plaintiff could only claim pay for the number of acres contained in that lot, at the rate of five dollars per acre, to which should be added ten dollars for survey and papers. If, therefore, the evidence shows, as we think it does, that the defendant has paid in full the purchase money for lot No. 37, then he is entitled to a decree for specific performance.

We cannot adopt the statement embraced in the master's report, by which he has undertaken to show that the exact balance due on the purchase money was paid, when defendant made his last payment, for that statement is based upon certain assumptions for which there is no warrant whatever in the testimony. For example, he assumes that the area of lot No. 37 is 23 92-100 acres, instead of 23 9-10 acres as shown by the undisputed testimony, and again he makes a second charge of ten dollars for survey and papers, without a particle of testimony to sustain such a charge. On the contrary, according to our view the account between these parties stands as follows:

To purchase money of lot No. 37, 23 9-10 acres, at $5.00.....	$119 50
To survey and papers.....	10 00
	129 50
By cash paid before due, $90 and $20	110 00
	19 50
To int. on $19.50 fr. Jan'y 1, '75 to Jan'y 1, '77.....	2 72
	22 22
By cash January 1, 1877.....	12 00
	10 22
To int. on $10.22 fr. Jan'y 1, '77, to Jan'y 1, '80.....	2 13
	12 35
By cash January 1, 1880.....	37 20
Amount overpaid January 1, 1880....	$24 85

*For this amount thus overpaid, counsel for appellant, in his argument here, and in one of his exceptions to the master's report as well as in one of his grounds of appeal, claims that the defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiff, but this is a matter which should have been set up by way of counter-claim, and we do not find that it was so set up in the answer. There is no allegation of any overpayment by mistake and no demand for judgment for the amount overpaid. No issue is raised by the pleadings in regard to such a claim, and hence no judgment for such amount can be rendered. Pom. Rem., § 718.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the counter-claim for damages which is set up in the answer. This claim arises ex delicto and not ex contractu, and therefore cannot be set up in an action like this, "arising on contract" (Code, § 171; Copeland v. Young, 21 S. C., 276), unless the cause of action constituting the basis of the counter-claim arises "out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim," or unless it is "connected with the subject of the action." This counter-claim certainly does not arise out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint, for that was a contract for the sale of the land made in 1871, and certainly the alleged trespass in 1883 cannot with any propriety be said to arise out of that contract. Was it connected with the subject of the action? Exactly what is meant by the words, "subject of the action," as used in the code does not seem to be very clearly defined in any judicial decision which has come under our notice. Mr. Pomeroy, who is regarded as a standard authority in the construction of the code, in his valuable work on Remedies, at page 800, section 775, after stating some of the different constructions which have been placed upon these words, uses this language: "It would, as it seems to me, be correct to say in all cases, legal or equitable, that the 'subject of the action' is the plaintiff's main primary right which has been broken, and by means of whose breach a remedial right arises."

If this construction of the words in question be adopted, then it is clear that the counter-claim set up in this case is not connected with the "subject of the action." The plaintiff's main primary right was to have payment of the purchase money of the *land, and certainly the plaintiff's alleged trespass has no connection with that right. But if, on the other hand, the "subject of the action" is to be regarded as the thing sought to be obtained by the action, then it is equally clear that the counter-claim sought has no connection with that, for the thing sought to be obtained by the action is the purchase money of the land, and certainly the subsequent trespass has no connection with it. The land upon which the trespass is alleged to have been committed, cannot in any view be regarded as the "subject of the action," for to it the plaintiff has no primary right, and it is not the thing sought to be obtained by the action. It seems to us clear, therefore, that the counter-claim relied upon by the defendant, cannot be set up in this action. See also Sharp v. Kinsman, 18 S. C., 108; Simkins v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 20 Id., 258.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

CONNOR v. RENNEKER.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Contracts ⇨22.]

Plaintiff, acting as an agent, enquired of defendant whether $20,000 cash would buy his land. Defendant said it would. The agent then said he would return to his principals and confer with them. Held, that this was not a contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 67, 82-92, 104-108; Dec. Dig. ⇨22.]

[2. Vendor and Purchaser ⇨16.]

Afterwards, at the instance of plaintiff, defendant wrote a letter to him, offering to accept $20,000 cash, and allowing six weeks in which to conclude the sale, "provided other parties do not apply for the same in the meantime, in which case I will notify you and hold the offer open for your consideration for five days, in which time you must give me your answer." To this letter there was no reply, and within three weeks defendant sold the land to another party without notice to the plaintiff. Held, that this was a mere offer, and without consideration, and therefore not binding on defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig.  16.]

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, November, 1885.

This was an action by W. D. Connor, as agent, against Eliza^abeth C. Renneker, for damages for breach of a contract made by her through J. H. Renneker, jr., her husband and agent. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Simons & Cappelmann, for appellant, cited 5 Stew. & Port., 264; 2 McCord, 298; 4 Bing., 653; 3 Humph., 19.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for damages for an alleged breach of contract, under the following circumstances. The defendant having a large body of timber lands for sale in the County of Colleton, the plaintiff, as the agent of certain parties, saw the defendant upon the subject of purchase. Renneker asked for the land one dollar per acre, viz., $25,000. During the conversation the plaintiff said, "I suppose $20,000 cash would buy the property; he (Renneker) studied a moment and said, 'It will. I (Connor) said, I am not purchasing for myself. I am only employed to see you. The gentlemen who want this land live North, and I will go back and confer with them.' * * * I returned and reported to these gentlemen what Mr. Renneker said and the offer I had ventured to make. They said, if the land was as represented, they would take it. I was ordered then to go back to Charleston and not to risk it on a mere verbal contract. They wanted a written contract, and said they would not venture to negotiate the sale unless they had some assurance that they would have time to examine the property and titles, and so on." &c. The following letter was then delivered: "Charleston, S. C., Nov. 28, 1882. Mr. W. D. Connor, agent, &c. George's Station. Dear Sir: In answer to your enquiries, I will sell you the land in Colleton County for twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars cash, and will allow you six weeks in which to conclude the sale, provided that other parties do not apply for the same in the meantime, in which case I will notify you, and hold the offer open for your consideration for five days, in which time you must give me your answer. (Signed) J. H. Renneker, jr. Boineest."

*This letter was never answered in any way, and on December 15, 1882, the land was sold, without notice, to another person for $20,500. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action for damages for breach of alleged contract of sale. The cause came on for trial before Judge Cothran, who, upon motion for non-suit, ruled that there was in fact no complete contract of sale, that there was a lack of mutuality and consideration, and dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

"First. Because his honor erred in holding that there was a want of mutuality in the contract sued on, whereas the evidence shows an offer to purchase on the part of the plaintiff, and an acceptance of this offer by the defendant, evidenced by the testimony and the written memorandum signed at the time.

"Second. Because his honor erred in holding that the matter was certainly open when this paper was signed, whereas the evidence shows that a positive offer of purchase had been made by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant, and that the paper signed by the defendant was a memorandum of that offer and acceptance.

"Third. Because his honor erred in holding that he could not see where, at any time, the minds of these parties were 'at one,' whereas the evidence shows that when the defendant agreed to give the written memorandum asked for by the plaintiff, the conditions of the contract were mutually understood and agreed to by and between the plaintiff and the defendant."

The whole appeal is based on the idea that the plaintiff, as agent, made a distinct and positive offer of $20,000 for the lands, which was accepted by the defendant. In our judgment this view is entirely unsupported either by the parol testimony or the written memorandum. We do not think that there ever was a positive unconditional offer by the plaintiff for the lands. It was not such an offer to say by way of enquiry, "I suppose $20,000 cash would buy this property?" and when answered in the affirmative, to say, "I am not purchasing for myself. I am only employed to see you. The gentlemen who want this land live North, and I will go back and confer with them." &c. Up to this time certainly nothing had occurred which could amount to anything like a contract on the part of the plaintiff which the *defendant could have enforced against him in a court of justice. On the contrary, the plaintiff, being a mere agent to make enquiries about the matter, seems to have most carefully avoided entering into any such contract.

Then as to the written memorandum. Its very terms show that there had been no contract of sale, and that the memorandum itself was only an "offer" on the part of the defendant, allowing six weeks in which to conclude the sale, provided that others did not apply in the meantime. This grant of time amounted to nothing, for other parties did apply. But it is insisted that in such case the plaintiff was entitled to have five days' notice in which to give his answer, and that the failure to give him such preference before sale was a breach of the contract, for which the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages. That must depend upon another question, viz., whether the declaration of the defendant that, in case of another offer, he would give such notice and preference, was a legal and binding contract on her part, for the breach of which the plaintiff may recover damages. As we understand it, such declaration when made was purely voluntary and without consideration.

It is certainly elementary that it takes two to make a bargain, and that all contracts not under seal must be supported by proof of sufficient consideration. So far as the question of consideration is concerned, the memorandum in writing was no more than parol. We cannot see that the plaintiff gave any consideration for the promise that, in a certain case, he should receive the notice claimed. It does not appear that he ever answered the letter or accepted the terms offered within the time allowed, or in any way paid money or incurred obligation in consideration of the aforesaid promise to give him notice and preference; and it seems to us that the declaration or promise of the defendant was without consideration, and might be withdrawn by him at any time prior to the acceptance by the plaintiff of the terms of sale offered. "A promise by one with nothing in return is void, as if he undertakes in writing to convey land to another, who neither agrees to buy nor pay anything for the premises; or to remain with and learn a trade of another who does not agree to teach." Bish. Cont., § 429; Chit. Cont., 17. "It is unquestionably true *as a general proposition that a contract cannot bind the party proposing it, and indeed that it is no contract until the acceptance of the offer by the party receiving it is in some way actually or constructively communicated to the party making the offer." Pars. Cont., 483; Burnet v. Bisco, 4 Johns., 235; Tucker v. Woods, 12 Id., 190; Boston & Maine R. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush., 224.

In the last case cited the court say: "The counsel for the defendants is most surely in the right, in saying that the writing when made was without consideration, and did not therefore form a contract. It was then but an offer to contract; and the parties making the offer most undoubtedly might have withdrawn it at any time before acceptance. * * * A different doctrine, however, prevails in France and Scotland and Holland.

It is there held, that whenever an offer is made, granting to a party certain time within which he is to be entitled to decide whether he will accept it or not, the party making such offer is not at liberty to withdraw it before the lapse of the appointed time. There are certainly very strong reasons in support of this doctrine. Highly respectable authors regard it as inconsistent with the plain principles of equity that a person who has been induced to rely on such an engagement should have no remedy in case of dis-appointment. But whether wisely and equitably or not, the common law unyieldingly insists upon a consideration, or a paper with a seal attached. The authorities, both English and American, in support of this view of the subject are very numerous and decisive, but it is not deemed to be needful or expedient to refer particularly to them," &c. See Cooke v. Oxley, 3 T. R., 653, and Dickinson v. Dodds, 13 Eng. Rep. (Moak), 854; 2 Chan. Div., 463.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

25 S. C. *519

*MOSELEY v. HANKINSON.

SAME v. SAME.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Estoppel ⇨22.]

Parties in possession of land under a deed reciting a sale under order of the court, and showing the approval of its officer as required by the order, are bound by these recitals, without proof of the record under which the sale was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. ⇨22.]

[2. Husband and Wife ⇨70.]

Where a married woman (in 1845) executed a deed of conveyance of her land under the express order of the Court of Equity, it was not necessary to a conveyance of her interest therein that she should renounce her inheritance as prescribed by statute in cases where she joined her husband in a conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. ⇨70.]

[3. Husband and Wife ⇨70.]

A married woman's signature to a petition asking the court to authorize her trustee to sell land settled to her separate use, and her signature to the deed conveying such land, is sufficient evidence of her assent to the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. ⇨70.]

4. The decision of the court on the former appeal in this case (22 S. C., 323) stated,

[5. Life Estates ⇨8.]

Purchasers of the interest of a life tenant do not hold adversely to the remaindermen until the life estate terminates.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 507, 38 S. E. 209; Mitchell v. Cleveland, 76 S. C. 449, 57 S. E. 33; Breeden v. Moore, 82 S. C. 539, 540, 64 S. E. 604.

For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 26; Dec. Dig. ⇨8.]

[6. Trusts ⇨203.]

Defendants could not mature title by adverse possession against the remaindermen through the trustee, as he did not hold for the remaindermen, and as he could not maintain action for the recovery of the land during the life-time of the life tenant whose interest the defendants had purchased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. ⇨203.]

Before Pressley, J., Aiken, September, 1885.

These were actions by certain remaindermen to recover two tracts of land sold under order of the Court of Equity in 1845, in a proceeding to which none of the remaindermen were parties, although some of them were then in esse. See 22 S. C., 323.

Mr. G. W. Croft, for appellants.
Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

October 11, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, growing out of the same state of facts substantially and involving the same principles, were heard and will be considered together. This is the second appeal, and for a full statement of the facts reference may *be had to the cases as reported in 22 S. C., 323. The evidence submitted at the last trial was substantially the same as that offered at the first trial, but in addition to this testimony was adduced tending to show "that Milledge Hankinson for more than twenty years after the date of his deed and before the death of Rebecca Moseley, at various times in each year cut wood and cross-ties and hauled them to the railroad; that in this period none of the plaintiffs were in possession of the land, and that the defendants were at the time of the trial still in possession. There was also evidence that Stanley Hankinson (one of the defendants) soon after the trial first took possession of two hundred acres of the land and made some improvements upon the same. He took a deed on the 10th of September, 1885, from Milledge Hankinson for the two hundred acres in his possession."

The jury rendered verdicts for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal upon the following grounds, omitting the first and the seventh, which were abandoned at the argument here:

"2. Because his honor erred in ruling that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to make proof of the judgment under which the trust deed to William Fortune was made.

"3. Because his honor erred in ruling that it was not necessary to make the deed to Fortune good that Rebecca Moseley should have renounced her inheritance thereon.

"4. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that Rebecca Moseley consented to the decree of settlement would be inferred from her having signed the deed.

"5. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the deed from the trustee conveyed only the life estate of Rebecca Moseley, and that at her death her children then living took a good title to the property in 1881.

"6. Because his honor erred in charging the jury that the possession of the defendants is presumed to be in accordance with his title, and that title was for the life estate of Rebecca Moseley;" whereas the title to the defendant was in fee, and he should have been presumed to hold in accordance to his own deed, and not in accordance with the trust deed.

"8. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge the defendants' 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th requests."

*There can be no doubt that the defendant, Milledge Hankinson, acquired title to, and went into possession of, the land in controversy under the deed from the trustee, William Fortune, and, therefore, upon well settled principles neither he, nor the other defendants claiming under him, are in a position to dispute the title of Fortune; and there is as little doubt that this court has already determined that such deed could only convey the interest of Rebecca Moseley, and could not divest the rights of the plaintiffs as remaindermen under the deed of settlement, as it is called, because they were not parties to the proceedings under which the trustee was authorized to make said deed. Now, however, the deed of settlement itself is assailed upon two grounds, as we understand it. 1st. Because there was no proof of the judgment of the court authorizing it. 2d. Because there was no renunciation of inheritance by Rebecca Moseley, a married woman. Even if the defendants were in a position to assail this deed, constituting, as it does, the foundation of the title under which they entered, we do not think that either of the objections raised to it can avail them. The recitals in the deed setting forth the proceedings for the partition of the real estate of Rebecca Moseley's father, giving in hæc verba the language of the decree directing the settlement, and expressly ordering "that the said parties execute deeds to be approved of by the commissioner of this court to proper persons as trustees, for the purpose of effecting the said settlements hereby ordered," followed up by the approval of that officer endorsed upon the deed, certainly superseded the necessity for the introduction of the record of those proceedings, at least so far as the parties and their privies were concerned (Sims v. Meacham, 2 Bail., 101; Polson v. Ingram, 22 S. C., 541), and the defendants claiming under this deed of settlement are bound by its recitals. The second ground of appeal cannot therefore be sustained.

The second objection to the deed of settlement—the want of any renunciation of inheritance—does not impeach its validity in toto, but goes only to its effect. Appellants contend that in the absence of a renunciation of inheritance, the estate conveyed was only for the life of the husband, James Moseley, and that upon his death in 1861, Rebecca Moseley's right to the possession revived, and the defendants having been in possession adverse to such right for more than ten years have acquired a title by adverse possession. It is quite true that, under the law as it then stood, to bar a married woman of her estate of inheritance, a strict compliance with the statutory provisions enabling her to do so was necessary, as is shown by the cases of McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 S. C., 402, and Wingo v. Parker, 19 S. C., 9. But the act of 1795, by its express terms, applies to a case where a married woman "entitled to an estate of inheritance in real estate may be desirous of joining her husband in conveying away the fee simple of the same to any other person," and was never intended to interfere, and, so far as we know, was never supposed to interfere, with the power of a Court of Equity to order the sale of the real estate of married women as well as all others, when a proper case is made for that purpose. Any other view would not only invalidate all titles acquired under deeds settling the property of married women, as in this case, but also titles acquired under sales for partition where married women were interested.

The fact that the deed in this case was signed by the married woman, instead of by the officer of the court, as in case of sales for partition, cannot alter the case; for this was done under the order of the court, which, as we have seen, expressly required "that the said parties execute deeds," &c. It was therefore the act of the court itself, as much so as if the deed had been signed by the commissioner. That the court had the power, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, to direct any person to make a sale or conveyance ordered by it, may be seen from the cases of Meetez v. Padgett, 1 S. C., 127, and Adams v. Kleckley, Ibid., 142. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit Judge that there was no necessity for a renunciation of inheritance.

So, too, we agree with him that the fact that she signed the deed was sufficient evidence of her assent to the settlement. And when to this is added the further fact that she was a party to the petition in which the court was asked to authorize the trustee to sell the land conveyed to the trustee by the deed of settlement, and that she endorsed upon said petition her request in writing for an order authorizing the trustee to sell her interest in the *lands, we do not see what further evidence of her assent to the settlement could have been demanded. Graydon v. Graydon, McMull. Eq., 63.

The fifth ground of appeal cannot be sustained. The Circuit Judge did not charge the jury as is there imputed, but he instructed them that if they came to the conclusion that there were children of Mrs. Moseley in existence at the time the petition for the sale of the land was filed, then the deed from the trustee could only convey the life estate of Mrs. Moseley, and that was precisely in accordance with the former decision of this court in these cases.

We see no foundation for the charge of error imputed to the Circuit Judge in the sixth ground of appeal. If, as we have seen, the deed from the trustee, though purporting to convey the fee, could only in fact convey the life estate of Mrs. Moseley, then it follows necessarily that that was the only title which defendants could take, and having acquired possession under that title they must be presumed to hold possession under that title, and that possession being rightful so long as Mrs. Moseley lived, it, of course, could not become adverse until after her death.

It only remains to consider the eighth ground of appeal which imputes error to the Circuit Judge in refusing certain requests to charge, set out in the "Case" as follows:

"1. That Rebecca Moseley having never renounced her inheritance on the deed to Fortune, such deed only conveyed the land in question to Fortune during the life of James Moseley.

"2. That upon the death of James Moseley, Rebecca Moseley became sui juris, and if the jury find that the defendant, Milledge Hankinson, remained in open, continuous, and adverse possession of the land in dispute for upwards of ten years after the death of James Moseley, and during that period Rebecca Moseley did not bring her action to recover the land, then she and those now claiming under her are barred by the statute of limitations.

"3. That if the jury find that the plaintiffs, or Rebecca Moseley, under whom they claim, have not been seized or possessed of the premises mentioned in the complaint within ten years before the commencement of this action they cannot recover.

"4. That if the jury believe that Milledge

Hankinson, since *the date of the deed from Fortune to him, held the premises described in the complaint for the period of ten years and upwards before the commencement of this action, and that his possession was open, notorious, continuous, and adverse, then the trustee would be barred by the statute of limitations, and so would the beneficiaries under the trust deed, and in that case the verdict should be for the defendants."

The first request contains and is based upon a proposition which has already been rejected, and the second, which is based upon the first, must fall with it.

The third request is disposed of by the provisions of section 101 of the Code, which in express terms declares: "In every action for the recovery of real property, or the possession thereof, the person establishing a legal title to the premises shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law; and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it appears that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for ten years before the commencement of such action." Now, as the plaintiffs have, as we have seen, established their legal title, they must, under the terms of the section just quoted, be presumed to have been in possession within the time required by law, and hence the Circuit Judge properly refused to charge as requested by the third request; for as the plaintiffs' right of action could not arise until the death of Rebecca Moseley in 1881, we do not see how the defendants could set up any possession adverse to such right. Up to that time their possession was lawful and could not be disturbed by any one. Adverse possession necessarily presupposes a trespass upon the rights of the lawful owner, and certainly the defendants could not be regarded as trespassers until after the death of Mrs. Moseley.

So, too, we think the fourth request was properly refused: for, to say nothing of the fact that the trustee was not a trustee to hold for the plaintiffs, but that by the terms of the deed the trust was simply to convey to them upon the termination of the life estate, we do not see how it could be said that the trustee was barred by the statute of limitations. He certainly could have had no right of action against the defendants until the termination of the life estate in 1881, even if then, and since that time the statutory period has not run out. So that we do not see how, in any view of the case, the plea of the statute of limitations could avail the defendants.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in each of the cases above stated, be affirmed.

25 S. C. 525

BRABHAM v. CROSLAND.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Guardian and Ward ¶53.]

The conduct of guardians and others dealing with Confederate currency must be reviewed in the light of the then surrounding circumstances, when such currency was recognized as the only medium of exchange.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 232-241; Dec. Dig. ¶53.]

2. The Circuit Judge sustained in his findings of fact based upon the conflicting testimony of witnesses examined before him.

[3. Executors and Administrators ¶86, 103.]

Testator directed his estate to be kept together until two crops were made, and then divided, the income to be applied meantime to certain purposes. The executor, to avoid a sacrifice of one of these crops, collected an ante bellum note and applied the proceeds to such purposes, and afterwards sold the crop at a considerable advance, and made division at the time appointed. Held, that he was not liable for collecting this note in Confederate currency in advance of the time for division.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 378, 421; Dec. Dig. ¶86, 103.]

[4. Guardian and Ward ¶53.]

A guardian may be liable for calling in good investments when an executor would not be; for it is the duty of the former to keep his funds invested, and of the latter to collect and administer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 232-241; Dec. Dig. ¶53.]

[5. Appeal and Error ¶854.]

If the conclusion of the Circuit Judge be correct, it is not material to consider the reasons which led him to such conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403, 3404, 3408-3424, 3427-3430; Dec. Dig. ¶854.]

[6. Payment ¶12.]

Money decreed in 1862 to be paid presently to minors for equality of partition was payable in Confederate currency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 38, 42-54, 59-61, 128; Dec. Dig. ¶12.]

[7. Guardian and Ward ¶53.]

Where a guardian charged himself with money ordered to be paid by his wife for equality of partition, and invested it in Confederate bonds, the ward by suing on the guardianship bond elected not to follow the lien on the land, and, the investment being sustained, the accountability of the guardian is discharged. The investment in Confederate bonds, if justified, would be payment, and the lien on the land released.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. ¶53.]

[8. Guardian and Ward ¶53.]

Where money is ordered to be paid to an infant presently for equality of partition, the guardian is bound to receive the money, and is not thereby chargeable with calling in an investment secured by a lien on real estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 232-241; Dec. Dig. ¶53.]

[9. Guardian and Ward ¶53.]

*The guardian is not liable for receiving such money in advance of the confirmation of the return in partition—the return having been afterwards confirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 232-241; Dec. Dig. ¶53.]

[10. Wills ¶497.]

The vesting of the ward's share in her grandfather's estate, under the terms of his will, was not postponed until her majority or marriage; and the executor properly paid to himself as guardian and invested her share of said estate. But even if not vested, it would have been his duty as executor to invest the funds eventually coming to her.

Before Fraser, J. Aiken, April, 1885.

This was an action by R. C. Brabham, as administrator of Zilphia E. Brabham, his wife, against James E. Crosland and the sureties on his bond, for an accounting of his administration of the estate of his ward, the said Zilphia. The action was commenced in June, 1884.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

As I understood the argument of the counsel for plaintiff, who closed the case at the hearing, the administration of the guardian is questioned now only in reference to the special matters to be hereinafter considered, and that as to all else the alleged investments in Confederate bonds will not be challenged. I think this is a very proper view of the case, and will take up these special matters seriatim.

1. It is claimed that on December 19, 1863, the guardian invested $12,000 of his ward's money in a tract of land purchased by him from Winchester Graham, and known as the "Stallings' Place": that he took the title in his own name and afterwards allowed the same to be sold by the sheriff as his own and to pay his own debt. If such an investment had been made, the guardian and his sureties would be liable either for the amount paid and interest on it, or for the value of the place and the rents and profits. George H. Bush, one of the witnesses for the plaintiff, says distinctly and positively that Crosland told him that he had put this ward's money into this tract of land. Crosland denies positively that he ever made any such statement, and denies that he ever made any such investment, and says that he bought the property and used it for himself.

There may have been some misapprehension on the part of the *witness as to what was said, but there can be no misapprehension on the part of Crosland as to what he did. If he made such an investment, it is scarcely in the range of probability that he has forgotten it; and if he has not told the truth, there can be little excuse for not doing so. The plaintiff had a right to put his character in issue, and he has not done so. The testimony of Mrs. Amanda M. Bush is too shadowy. She says that she heard Crosland tell his ward when quite a child about this land being for her. She "thinks" it was at his house, but can't tell whether it was "before or after the war." May she not have heard this from some one else? The conversation with J. H. Bush when this land was about to be sold by the sheriff under an execution against Crosland, I think, tends to confirm his statement. When a claim that such an investment was made was suggested as a means of saving the lands from sale by the sheriff, he said that he had money of his own, and of these two estates, and he could not say he put the estate money in the land. Nothing was said about Zilphia, but the question was about his "ward," or his "wards." The language of the witness is this: "I don't think he said 'estate,' but he said he couldn't say whether it was his ward's money or not, and that he had money enough of his own." The testimony shows that about this time the guardian did have money of his own and of his ward's on hand, and of his own ample to make that purchase.

The guardian had no right to make any such investment, and he must have known, even then, that whatever may have been the law as to investment in Confederate bonds, he made purchases of land with his ward's money at his own risk. If he bought this property with his ward's money and told it to her friends, it is not probable that he would have used it openly as his own, as he certainly did do from the time of the purchase. I have therefore come to the conclusion as a matter of fact that the guardian, Crosland, did not use his ward's money, but his own, in the purchase of the Stallings' Place.

2. On January 7, 1863, there was a large sale of personalty of the estate of Isaac Bush and the share of the ward turned over to the guardian by himself and his co-administrator. In December, 1862, and January, 1863, in pursuance of the terms *of the will there were sales of real and personal property belonging to the estate of David Bush, and the share of Zilphia was transferred by the executor, Crosland, to his account as guardian. There were other sales of both estates, but not mentioned here, as I do not understand that any funds arising from any of these sales are now claimed, if they were in fact invested in Confederate bonds, and even that, except as to the "Stallings' Place," seems to be admitted. I am satisfied, from all the testimony before me, that all the moneys which came to the hands of the guardian during the war were invested in Confederate bonds, and if he was guilty of any default, it was not in investing, but in receiving Confederate money for sums secured to his ward by liens on real and personal property, and growing out of the partition of the estates of Isaac Bush and David Bush.

The returns of the commissioners appointed by the Court of Equity to make partition of the estate of Isaac Bush was dated January 22, 1863, and by it the sum of $4,642.62½ was charged in favor of the ward in the share of her mother, Mrs. Amanda M. Bush. She and the ward were the only distributees of the estate, and either in settlement or in cash on the day of partition, or very soon thereafter, Mrs. Amanda M. Bush paid to the guardian the said sum of $4,642.62²³ in Confederate money. The testimony in the case convinces me that all the transactions in reference to both of these estates in the latter part of 1862, and thenceforth until the close of the war, were in reference to Confederate money, the only currency then in use in this State. If the guardian had sold land, or if he had received Confederate money on an ante bellum claim, which was unquestionably due in legal tender, and well secured, then I do not see how, under the rulings of our Supreme Court, the guardian and his sureties could escape liability.

This, however, is a claim which originated during the war, and grew out of a proceeding in court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, and stands on a different footing from any of the cases heretofore decided in this State and in which trustees were held liable for collecting and investing in Confederate securities bonds which were well secured and made before the Confederate war. I do not see that it can affect this *case, that the order confirming the returns to the writ of partition was not made until February 3, 1864, and after the investment was made by the guardian. In Huson v. Wallace (1 Rich. Eq., 1), the marital rights of a husband were held to have attached to the personal property of his wife, who died between the date of the returns and the order of confirmation. In Jackson v. Jennings, this point did not arise, for in that case the death of the slave occurred before the returns were made. 13 Rich. Eq., 172 [94 Am. Dec. 160].

If, however, we assume that the partition was not complete until February 3, 1864, as in case of the commissioner in the State v. Norris (15 S. C., 241), the order of confirmation was sufficient to make good the receipt and investment of money which had already come to the hands of the guardian, even if by some misapprehension of his duty he had received it before the date of the order. It is true, that trustees are not allowed to deal with trust funds in all respects as prudent persons may deal with their own. They hold these funds for investment and collection and reinvestment from time to time in good interest-bearing securities. They can invest in real estate bonds, in well secured personal bonds, and in government securities, and where a particular investment is prescribed by the terms of the trust they must follow the instructions. Where none of these can be obtained, a trustee is required to act as a prudent man would with his own.

The trustee in this case has accepted in payment the note of the government under which he lived and to which he rendered obedience, a government which the State of South Carolina, whose law prescribed *his liability and duty as trustee, then, and always before, and while in existence held to be a rightful government, not only de facto but de jure. It was the only currency and was at that time of unimpaired credit, received by business men and the banks of the State and even by the officers of the court which appointed him guardian, and so received with the consent and in accord with the practice of the court at that time. This, then, being a case of obligations arising during the war and out of proceedings in the Court of Equity, and not of the guardian's own volition, and in which I think the transactions were in reference to Confederate money, I think that the guardian had a right to receive the money. While there is no direct *evidence except that of the guardian himself as to the basis of valuation, yet every article which was sold at that time, belonging to these two estates, where we have any testimony on this point, was valued in reference to the currency, and I cannot with any good reason escape the conclusion that this land was valued in the same way.

3. The commissioners appointed under the will of David Bush and in strict compliance with the terms of his will, on December 15, 1862, assigned to Mrs. Crosland, the wife of the guardian, James E. Crosland, lands, the "Harvey" or "Red Hill tract," and slaves, and charged on them in favor of his ward $2,490.63, and also a large sum in favor of other legatees under the will. This is also an obligation arising during the war, and in the regular course of administration, and not by the mere volition of the guardian who was the executor of the estate. In addition to the other considerations which induce me to conclude that the valuation of the land was in reference to Confederate currency, one of the commissioners testifies that such was the basis of valuation.

I am by no means certain that there has ever been any payment of this sum by Mrs. Crosland. There is no proof of any separate estate and of its appropriation to this purpose by any competent authority. As to all personal property coming to her from the estate of her father, David Bush, or any other source, the marital rights attached as soon as reduced to the possession of her husband. He certainly had no right to discharge this lien by charging himself with the amount. If it had been his own debt, the law would have presumed payment to himself in his new capacity as guardian. It was only a lien on the land, and he could make no bargain with his wife in reference to this or any other matter. If this view be correct, then as to this amount there never has been any receipt of the money, and he never had so much money to invest. If, however, the guardian had a right to discharge this lien by the charge made against himself in his accounts and returns in January, 1863, this matter stands as the above payment made by Mrs. Amanda M. Bush, and in both cases the collections and investment must be sustained.

4. If the notes of Dunbar, MacElhenny, and Wood belonging *to the estate of David Bush, which had been charged by James E. Crosland to himself as executor, had never in fact been paid, it may be that he would still be liable for the amounts under which he charged himself, and also his sureties, as guardian for his ward's share of them. If, however, the notes, or any part of them, were collected afterwards in good money, he is liable for the amount, and would be even if he had paid over the amount of them in Confederate money to another trustee. I think that he ought to account to the estate of his ward for her share of any money received on these or similar notes. The guardian and his sureties are also liable for any sums received as rent of the ward's land since the war. The ward's estate must account for all rents received for the "Red Hill" tract, held under the proposed compromise, and for any amounts she agreed to pay for surveying, and also for all money paid to her since the war.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the defendant, James E. Crosland, and his sureties, do account before W. W. Williams, the master, for all money received by him as rent of the ward's land since the war, and for her share of any money received since the war on the notes of Dunbar, MacElhenny, and Wood, and any other notes of the estate of David Bush, deceased, which were in fact not paid, but charged to James E. Crosland as executor, and that the estate of the ward account for the rents, use, and occupation of so much of the "Red Hill" tract as was held under the proposed compromise, and for all money received by the ward from the guardian since the war; and it is ordered and adjudged that said accounting, when made and confirmed by the court, shall be in full of all demands in favor or against either guardian or ward, arising out of said guardianship. It is ordered that the defendant, James E. Crosland, pay the costs of the minors, and that as to the plaintiff and other defendants each party pay his own costs, and that any costs to accrue hereafter abide the further order of the court.

From this decree plaintiff appealed upon the grounds stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. W. Croft and P. A. Emanuel, for appellant.

Messrs. Henderson Bros. and John J. Maher, contra.

*October 12, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. By this action the plaintiff, as administrator of the deceased ward, demands an account of her estate from her guardian, Crosland, and his co-defendants, sureties on the guardianship bonds. Owing to the fact that one of the defences was in the nature of a plea in bar to the accounting demanded, it became necessary for the Circuit Judge first to determine the issue raised by that defence before any accounting could be ordered, and thus having the case before him he proceeded to determine all the issues involved, without any accounting before the master or a referee. The Circuit Judge, therefore, heard all the testimony in open court, as to the various questions presented, and his conclusions as to the facts were based upon the testimony so heard, and not as reported by the master or a referee. The defence in bar of the accounting having been overruled by the Circuit Judge, to which ruling no exception has been taken, no further notice need be taken of it. We will therefore confine our attention to the several matters presented by the exceptions to the Circuit decree.

The guardian in his answer admits that he received a large amount of money, something over twenty thousand dollars, for his ward, but that it was all in Confederate money and was invested by him in Confederate bonds, except some small amounts which came to his hands after the close of the "war between the States," but as the decree requires him to account for all money received since the war, and there is no appeal from that part of the decree, we may dismiss that from our minds and devote our attention to the transactions of the guardian during the war.

It appears that in January, 1863, the defendant, Crosland, was appointed guardian of plaintiff's intestate and duly qualified as such. The estate of his ward was derived from two sources—the estate of her father, Isaac Bush, and the estate of her grandfather, David Bush. The former died on January 11, 1860, and the defendant, Crosland, with one Edward B. Bush, administered on his estate; the latter died on November 3, 1860, leaving a will, of which the defendant, Crosland, was the sole executor. It is admitted in the "Case" that the personal estate of Isaac Bush was sold by his administrators under an order from the ordinary *of Barnwell County, and that on January 7, 1863, the share of the ward, amounting to upwards of twelve thousand dollars, was received by the guardian, "the only question being as to whether he did invest this amount in Confederate bonds." The ward was also entitled to receive from her mother, Mrs. A. M. Bush, the further sum of something over four thousand dollars, which upon the partition of the real estate of Isaac Bush, Mrs. A. M. Bush was required to pay to the ward for equality of partition; and this sum also the guardian claims to have received on January 7, 1863, but this is denied by the plaintiff, and is one of the points of controversy in the case. As to the estate of David Bush, the defendant, Crosland, claims that he, as executor, settled up that estate, and paid himself, as guardian of Zilphia E., the sum of twenty-three hundred and thirty-five dollars, her share thereof, on January 7, 1863, and that the further sum of twenty-four hundred and ninety dollars, which was directed to be paid to the ward by Mrs. Crosland, the wife of defendant, Crosland, for equality of partition, was also paid to him and by him charged on his account as guardian on January 7, 1863; but this likewise is denied by the plaintiff and constitutes another point of controversy.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, in addition to the points of controversy already mentioned as to the two amounts to which the ward was entitled on the partition of the two estates of Isaac Bush and David Bush respectively, contends that the guardian did not receive in Confederate money large amounts which he claimed to have received in that currency, but, on the contrary, that he received them in good money; that certain other amounts were improperly received by him in Confederate money; that there was no sufficient evidence that any part of the ward's estate was invested in Confederate bonds, and that, on the contrary, a large amount thereof was invested in the purchase of a tract of land, known as the Stallings place, for which the guardian took title in his own name on December 19, 1863.

The Circuit Judge found as a matter of fact that all the money which came into the hands of the guardian during the war was invested in Confederate bonds; that all the transactions of the guardian, in reference to both of the estates above mentioned in *the latter part of 1862, and thenceforth to the close of the war, were in reference to Confederate money, the only currency then in use in the State, and that the guardian had a right to receive the amounts above stated as coming to the ward in that currency; that as to the amount which the wife of the defendant, Crosland, was directed to pay to the ward for equality of partition, he was "by no means certain that there has ever been any payment of this sum by Mrs. Crosland;" but he held that if it had not been paid, it was still a lien upon Mrs. Crosland's land, for which the guardian and his sureties would not be responsible, and if it had been paid, then it was paid and properly paid in Confederate money and the amount invested in Confederate bonds, and therefore the guardian was not now liable for it; and that the testimony satisfied him that the guardian did not use the ward's money in the purchase of the Stallings place.

From so much of the judgment as is stated above the plaintiff appeals upon the following grounds:

"1. Because the evidence shows that the Stallings place was bought by James E. Crosland with the money of his ward, Zilphia E. Bush, and his honor erred in not so deciding.

"2. Because from the evidence it appears that the defendant, James E. Crosland, collected a large part of the money coming to his ward from the estate of David Bush in good money, and it was error in the presiding judge in not so deciding—among other debts and money collected, especially the note of Rothwell.

"3. Because it appears from the evidence that the defendant, James E. Crosland, collected in good money from the sale of the effects of the estate of David Bush and also from the sale of the effects of the estate of Isaac Bush large sums which were in part the estate of his ward, and his honor erred in not so deciding.

"4. Because there was no satisfactory evidence that the defendant, James E. Crosland, invested his ward's money in Confederate bonds, and his honor erred in finding that he had done so.

"5. Because there was no evidence that James E. Crosland and his wife had paid to the defendant, and as guardian, the amount coming to his ward for equality of partition in the real estate of David Bush, and it is further submitted that said amount being well secured by a lien upon real estate, and there being no necessity for the guardian to collect the same, the guardian would not be justified in making such collection, especially as the transaction, if allowed, would be in his own interest and against the interest of his ward's estate, and it is therefore submitted that his honor erred in allowing said guardian credit for said sum as if paid in Confederate money.

"6. Because it is submitted that if the lien upon Crosland and his wife's land was satisfied by payment, Crosland uniting in himself debtor to and guardian of his ward, such lien if satisfied was by presumption of payment, and the law presumes payment only in good money, and it was error in his honor not so deciding.

"7. Because the amount coming to the ward, Zilphia E. Bush, for equality of partition of the estate of Isaac Bush was well secured by a lien upon real estate, and there being no necessity to collect such sum, the defendant, James E. Crosland, was not justified in collecting such debts, and the defendant should therefore have been held liable for the same, and it was error in his honor not so deciding.

"8. Because it appears from the testimony that the defendant, Crosland, did not and could not have had in his hands the funds coming to his ward from equality of partition of the estate of Isaac Bush at the time he alleges that he invested the same in Confederate bonds, and it was error in his honor not so deciding."

It will thus be seen that this is another of those numerous cases which have been presented to the courts since the war, in which the transactions of guardians and other trustees during that period, when everything was in an abnormal condition, have been sought to be impeached. As has been well said in several cases, whenever we are called upon to review such transactions, it is not only important, but absolutely essential, that we should, as far as practicable, transport ourselves back to those troublous times, and look at the conduct of parties in the light of the circumstances by which they were then surrounded. See especially the very just and pertinent remarks of the present Chief Justice in the case of Wilson v. Braddy, 16 S. C., at page 521, and in the case of Hyatt v. McBurney, 18 S. C., at page 213. We must remember that Confederate currency was the only money in use, the only medium of exchange; that it was universally so *recognized and treated not only by the people in their individual transactions, but by the government itself in all its departments. It was received in payment of taxes, it was received in payment of purchases made under the orders of the courts, and investments in the bonds of the government which issued it were authorized by statute and by the orders of the courts. We know that it is very difficult, after this lapse of time, even for those who were personally cognizant of the condition of things in this country during the war, to carry their minds back and look at a transaction then occurring solely in the light of the then surrounding circumstances, uninfluenced by the light of subsequent events. But to avoid injustice to those whose conduct during that period we are called upon to review, we must, as far as practicable, do so. Passing from, but not forgetting, these general considerations, which the nature of the case gives rise to, we propose to consider the several questions raised by the grounds of appeal.

The first, second, third, and fourth grounds present questions of fact only, and under the well settled rule of this court it is only necessary to inquire whether the conclusions of the Circuit Judge assailed in these grounds are without any evidence to sustain them, or are manifestly against the overbearing weight of the testimony. In considering this question it is important to bear in mind that the testimony was taken in open court, thus affording the Circuit Judge a full opportunity of both seeing and hearing the witnesses and observing their manner while under examination. This circumstance, always important, is peculiarly so when, as in this case, there is a conflict of testimony.

As to the issue raised by the first ground, it is quite clear that the testimony is, in one sense, conflicting, though possibly reconcilable with the theory that all of the witnesses intended to tell the truth. Crosland testifies positively that he paid for the Stallings place with his own money, and there is other testimony tending to show that he had at the time means of his own sufficient to enable him to make the purchase. The testimony relied upon to controvert Crosland's positive testimony are certain alleged declarations made by Crosland years ago to several witnesses. Now, when it is remembered how difficult it is for a witness to repeat the language used in a conversation occurring *years before, and how the change of a few words will sometimes alter the whole sense, we cannot say that there was any manifest error on the part of the Circuit Judge in adopting Crosland's version, especially when to do so would involve the necessity of discrediting entirely a witness whose character, so far as the testimony shows, is not open to impeachment.

As to the second ground, it is quite clear that the share of the ward in the estate of David Bush could not be ascertained, and therefore could not have been paid, until the settlement of that estate, which took place in January, 1863, when the only money in use was Confederate money, and therefore her share must necessarily have been paid in that currency. We understand, however, that the real point of this exception is, that Crosland, as executor, was chargeable with the money on hand at the death of his testator, and with all ante bellum notes, notably that of Bothwell, in good money, and that for his ward's share of such assets the guardian is chargeable in good money. Whether the propriety of Crosland's conduct as executor is open to investigation in the present proceeding might possibly admit of question; but waiving that, let us inquire whether he has committed any devastavit, such as is charged, of the estate of David Bush.

The testator, who was a person of large fortune, with a considerable family, died November 3, 1860, leaving a will, a copy of which is set out in the record, though it is too long to be inserted here. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say that the will manifestly contemplated a division and settlement of the estate two years after the death of the testator, or as it is expressed in the will, "after two crops shall have been gathered." In the meantime it provided that the estate should be kept together, "and the income, as far as necessary, applied to the education of my minor children, to the support of the gospel and charitable objects, and the maintenance of my wife and such of my children as shall continue to reside with her (whether such children be of age or not), and the families of such of my children, if any, who may be married and reside with my wife by her consent. My purpose being that my family shall continue, during that time, to live in the same style, enjoy the same privileges, and make the same contributions to the gospel and charitable objects as heretofore."

This plainly involved the expenditure by the executor of a considerable sum of money for each of the two years. To meet these expenditures for the year 1861, the executor used the cash on hand at testator's death, the proceeds of the cotton made in 1860, and the proceeds of certain notes collected by him early in the year 1861, all doubtless good money, and for the year 1862, instead of selling the cotton made in 1861, he collected the note of Bothwell and the notes of two other persons, stating, in the return made for that year, as well as in his testimony in this case, that his reason for so doing was that cotton was then bringing a very low price, only seven cents a pound, which cotton was afterwards sold for eighteen cents in January, 1863. From this condensed statement of the acts of the executor we are unable to see where he has committed any devastavit.

Plaintiff claims that by the terms of the will he could only use the income to defray the expenditures provided for during the two years the estate was to be kept together, and that the devastavit was in collecting the notes of Bothwell and others, and applying the proceeds to such expenditures. But what damage did the estate sustain by reason of the fact that the executor used money derived from one source rather than another to meet expenditures which the will required him to provide for? On the contrary, was not the estate actually benefited to the extent of the difference between eighteen cents and seven cents per pound for the cotton made in 1861? The fact that these notes were ante bellum notes and therefore payable in good money cannot alter the case; for, as we have seen, the will contemplated a division of the estate at the expiration of two years from the death of the testator, and to effect this it would be necessary to collect the assets of the estate, and what possible difference could it make whether these notes were collected in 1862 or 1863, the time when the division of the estate was to be made under the terms of the will and when it was actually made? As we have said, the will manifestly contemplated a division and settlement of the estate at the expiration of two years from the death of the testator, and as he died in November, 1860, the two years would expire in the latter part of 1862, and accordingly we find that the division was made on January 7, 1863, but a very short time after the expiration of the two years. Now, in order to effect this manifest purpose of the will, it was necessary to collect in the assets of the estate as preparatory to the division, and the fact that some of the assets were collected the year before for the purpose of avoiding a sacrifice of the cotton made in 1861, certainly could not be regarded as a devastavit.

It must be remembered that the duty of an executor is different from that of a guardian or other like trustee. The duty of the former requires him to collect in the assets of his testator's estate and administer them in accordance with the directions of the will, while the duty of the latter is to keep the funds of his cestui que trust securely invested. Hence, while it might be a breach of trust for a guardian or other like trustee to call in unnecessarily funds already well invested, and he might be made responsible for any loss occasioned thereby, the same rule would not apply to an executor, for the reason that the nature of their duties is altogether different. Any person interested in the estate of David Bush could, at any time after the expiration of two years from his death, have compelled the executor to divide the estate in accordance with the terms of the will; and to do this, he would have had to collect in the assets, which he could only do in Confederate treasury notes, that being the only currency in existence here at that time; and surely if he did voluntarily what he could have been compelled to do, he should not be charged with any default or breach of duty. We do not see, therefore, that there is any ground for the second exception in any view of the case.

As to the third exception or ground of appeal, which charges that the defendant, Crosland, collected large sums, in good money, from the sales both of the estates of Isaac Bush and of David Bush, we do not see how it can be sustained. In the face of the admission in the record at page 50, folios 195-6, we do not understand how such a claim can be made as to the estate of Isaac Bush, for there it is expressly admitted that the share of the ward in the proceeds of the sale of that estate was received by the guardian on January 7, 1863, and, therefore, certainly in Confederate money, and that the only question in reference to that matter was whether the money so received was invested in Confederate bonds. As to the estate of David Bush, it is equally clear that there is no foundation for that exception. The sales of that estate, under the terms of the will, were made in December, 1862, and January, 1863, when Confederate money was the only currency in use.

The fourth exception raises a simple question of fact, and certainly there is no ground upon which we can be expected to reverse the conclusion reached by the Circuit Judge. There was positive and direct testimony that the ward's money was invested in Confederate bonds, and there was no positive and direct testimony to the contrary. All that is relied upon by the appellant to overthrow this conclusion of the Circuit Judge, seems to be certain alleged declarations of Crosland, tending to show that a part at least of the ward's money was invested in the Stallings place, together with all the circumstances of the case. The most that can be said is that the testimony and circumstances relied upon may raise a doubt as to the investment, but that is not sufficient to warrant us in reversing the conclusion of the Circuit Judge, especially in a case where there is a conflict of testimony.

The fifth and sixth exceptions are taken under a misconception of the decree of the Circuit Judge. We do not understand that he held either that the amount which Mrs. Crosland was directed to pay to the ward for equality of partition of the estate of David Bush, was actually paid by either Crosland or his wife, or that it was paid by operation of law by reason of Crosland uniting in himself the character of both debtor and creditor. On the contrary, the Circuit Judge rested his conclusion as to this matter upon an alternative view of the subject, without designating which alternative he adopted. As we understand his decree, his view was that this money was either paid, or it was not paid. If it was paid, then it was to be regarded as paid in Confederate money, just as he had previously held in reference to a similar debt due by Mrs. Amanda M. Bush, and the collection and investment should be sustained. But if it has not been paid, then it still remains a claim on Mrs. Crosland, secured by a lien upon her land, and the guardian is not chargeable therewith.

It is not important for us to determine whether the considerations which influenced the mind of the Circuit Judge in reaching his conclusion are correct, but the vital point is whether such conclusion is correct. We think it is. This claim originated during the war, and grew out of the settlement of an estate made during that period. The Circuit Judge has found as matter of fact, "that all the transactions in reference to both of these estates, in the latter part of 1862, and thenceforth until the close of the war, were in reference to Confederate money, the only currency then in use in this State;" and such, we have no doubt, was the understanding of all the parties concerned. The commissioners appointed under the will of David Bush to make partition of his lands and slaves, made their return on December 15, 1862, and in it they recommended a sale of a portion of both the land and slaves for cash, which, of course, could only have been in Confederate money, and that the proceeds of such sales should be divided amongst the minor children. It is scarcely possible to suppose that they intended that these minors should receive their shares in Confederate money, and that those to whom sums of money were awarded for equality of partition should be entitled to claim payment in gold. It is to be observed, also, that these sums were not directed to be paid at a future time—no credit given—as might have been done if such had been the intention; but they were payable presently, that is, in cash, and therefore necessarily in Confederate money, as none other was then in use. We conclude, therefore, that this debt due to the ward by Mrs. Crosland for equality of partition was an obligation arising during the war; that it grew out of the settlement of an estate made during that period in reference to Confederate money; that being payable presently, it could be paid in Confederate money.

Was it paid? There is no evidence going to show that it was paid by Mrs. Crosland; but that is immaterial, if it appears that it was actually paid by any one. The fact that Crosland charged himself in his account as guardian, while it would not extinguish the lien on Mrs. Crosland's estate by which it was secured, might make him and his sureties chargeable with the amount. So, too, if the debt be regarded as Crosland's own debt and not that of his wife, the fact that he united in himself the character of both debtor and creditor would not operate as such payment as would *extinguish the lien on the land, though, possibly, it might make Crosland and his sureties liable to account for the amount. But in either event, the ward or her representative could have the election either to pursue the guardian and his sureties, or to claim the benefit of the lien. By this action the plaintiff has elected to pursue his remedy on the guardianship bond, and his claim must be based either upon the fact that the guardian received the money and has not accounted for it, or upon the fact that the debt has been lost by reason of the inexcusable negligence of the guardian in collecting it. If the former be regarded as the basis of the claim, then, as we have seen, the money has been accounted for by its investment in Confederate bonds. If, however, the latter be regarded as the basis of the claim, then there is no evidence that the debt has been lost. So that in neither view has the plaintiff established this claim against the defendants.

In addition to this, it seems to us that the testimony shows actual payment of this debt, and not payment by operation of law merely. According to the testimony of Crosland, the whole amount of his ward's estate, with which he has charged himself in his returns, including this identical amount now under consideration, was invested in Confederate bonds, and the Circuit Judge finds this to be the fact. Now, if this be so, unquestionably this amount must have been paid before it could have been invested in Confederate bonds. Suppose Crosland, with a view to relieve his wife's land from this statutory lien, had invested the amount in an unquestionably good bond, secured by a mortgage of real estate, and when called upon to account as guardian had produced such bond and mortgage as a part of the assets of his ward's estate, would not this have been regarded as payment of the amount which his wife was ordered to pay to the ward for equality of partition, and would not the lien upon his wife's land have been extinguished thereby? This is practically what has been done, for instead of accounting for the amount in a personal bond secured by a mortgage of real estate, he accounts for it by an investment in Confederate bonds, which, if justified, as we have seen that it should be, is the same thing in principle, and should have the same effect.

What has been already said applies with increased force to the *question raised by the seventh ground of appeal, for there it cannot well be disputed that the amount which Mrs. Amanda M. Bush was ordered to pay to the ward for equality of partition of the estate of Isaac Bush was actually paid to the guardian in January, 1863, and of course paid in Confederate money. Such is the testimony of Crosland, which is fortified by the receipt of Mrs. Bush to the administrators for her distributive share of the estate, bearing date the same day as the return of the commissioners in partition. It is a mistake to regard this as an investment of the ward's funds secured by a lien on real estate, which it was improper for the guardian to call in, unless there was a necessity for it, which is not pretended to have been the case. This claim due the ward arose out of the partition of her father's estate, made under proceedings in the Court of Equity in 1863, the very object of which was to enable the heirs to enjoy in severalty their respective shares of the estate. This Mrs. Bush could not do until she had paid the amount decreed to be paid by her to the ward for equality of partition, for, until such payment, her title to the property allotted to her would not vest in her (Burris v. Gooch, 5 Rich., 1); and thus one of the main objects of the partition would have been defeated. It was a debt originating during the war, and payable presently; not on a credit, which might have been provided for if such had been the intention. All the transactions in reference to this estate, as found by the Circuit Judge, were in reference to Confederate money, and, therefore, the guardian had a right to receive payment of this debt in that currency.

The point of the eighth exception, as we understand it, is that, as the order for the confirmation of the return of the commissioners appointed to make partition of the estate of Isaac Bush was not signed until February 3, 1864, it was impossible that the guardian could, prior to that time, when he claims to have invested this amount in Confederate bonds, have had in his hands the amount which, by that return, Mrs. Bush was directed to pay to the ward for equality of partition, and, therefore, he could not have so invested this amount. We agree with the Circuit Judge that there is nothing in this point. It may have been somewhat irregular for the guardian to have received the amount before the *return was confirmed: but as there were but two parties interested in the partition—Mrs. Bush and her daughter, the ward—the person paying and the person receiving the money, there could hardly have been much risk in anticipating the confirmation of the return. But however that may have been, the fact is that the return was confirmed, and that ended the matter.

Another question has been raised in the argument here, growing out of certain provisions in the will of David Bush, for which we find no proper basis in the exceptions or grounds of appeal. It is contended in the argument here, that under the sixth and seventh clauses of that will the ward was not entitled to anything from that estate until she attained the age of twenty-one years or married, and that her interest was wholly contingent upon the happening of one of those two events, and that as neither of them occurred until long after the war—she having been married in 1876, and having attained the age of twenty-one years in 1880—her estate could not possibly have come to the guardian in Confederate money. So far as we can discover, this point does not seem to have been brought to the attention of the Circuit Judge, for he certainly has passed no judgment upon it, and there is, therefore, nothing before us to review. It is true that the counsel for the appellant state in the argument here that they brought this point to the attention of the Circuit Judge, "and he frankly declared his doubts as to the correctness of his judgment;" but upon turning to those folios of the judge's decree indicated in the argument of counsel, we find that Judge Fraser is there speaking of another matter altogether, viz., as to the fact of payment of the amount decreed to be paid by Mrs. Crosland for equality of partition, and whether such payment could arise by operation of law; but we nowhere find any allusion even to the question as to whether the interest of the ward under the will of David Bush was contingent or absolute; and we cannot suppose that so careful and conscientious a judge, in what is manifestly a well considered decree, would have either overlooked or ignored such a point. We must think, therefore, that counsel are mistaken in supposing that this point was brought to the attention of the Circuit Judge.

But as we may be in error in this, we will not decline to consider the point, even though not distinctly made in any of the *exceptions. By the fifth clause of his will, David Bush devises and bequeaths all the rest and residue of his estate "to my children and my grandchild, Zilphia E., the issue of any of them who may die before two crops shall be gathered, and who may be their distributees to represent their parents as in case of intestacy," &c.—going on to provide that certain advancements shall be accounted for. Then follow the sixth and seventh clauses, relied on by appellant, which read as follows:

"6th. I desire that my children, or those who take as their substitutes, shall take an absolute estate under any and all the provisions of this will in their behalf, when and not till they arrive at twenty-one years of age or marry; and in case any of them shall die under age and unmarried, his or her property shall be divided between my then surviving children, the issue of children hereafter dying, who may be their distributees, to take their parents' share, as in cases of intestacy, the shares thus accruing to any one under age and unmarried to be subject to the same limitations over as the original shares.

"7th. If my grandchild, Zilphia E., shall die leaving no issue alive at her death, I desire that her devises and legacies be divided between my then surviving children. Such issue of deceased children, as may be their distributees, to take their parents' share, as in cases of intestacy; but in case she shall so die after she becomes of age, or marries, then the original property and natural increase only (excluding the cash income) is to be accounted for to the limitees over."

There does not seem to be anything in either of these clauses to postpone the vesting of Zilphia E.'s interest until she marries or becomes of age, which is the basis of appellant's whole argument upon this point. That idea is drawn from the terms used in the sixth clause, which, by its express terms, applies alone to the children of the testator, or their substitutes; and as Zilphia E. was neither a child nor the substitute of a child of the testator, that clause does not apply to her. This is conclusively shown not only by the use of the terms in that clause, "my children or those who take as their substitutes," but by the further fact that after the testator had, in the sixth clause, made provision for what was to become of the shares of his children in certain contingencies, he goes on, in the seventh clause, and, in very different language, makes provision for the disposition of Zilphia's share in the contingencies therein named; for while he provides, in the sixth clause, that his children are to take absolute estates "when and not till they arrive at twenty-one years of age or marry," there is no such language as that just quoted in the seventh clause, which deals with Zilphia's share alone. Why the testator should have made such a distinction, it does not concern us to inquire, though a reason might possibly be found in the fact of the extreme youth of Zilphia at the time —about one year of age—and the testator might have thought it unwise to postpone the vesting of her estate for such a length of time as must necessarily elapse before she would either attain the age of twenty-one years or marry.

But be that as it may, our sole province is to determine the intentions of the testator, by an examination of the words which he has used, and not to find reasons for the disposition which he has seen fit to make of his property. Here we find that the testator, after having previously provided that his whole estate shall be kept together until after two crops have been gathered, in the fifth clause of his will, gives the residue of his estate to his children and his grandchild, Zilphia, providing that if "any of them," that is, either of his children or his grandchild, shall die before the two crops are gathered, then the issue of the one so dying shall represent their parent—take as their substitutes. Then, in the sixth clause he makes certain provisions as to the shares of his children, or those who take as their substitutes; and in the seventh clause he makes certain other and different provisions as to the share of his grandchild. It is true, that in the seventh clause the share of Zilphia E. is limited over upon a certain contingency, which has never happened and cannot now occur, but this certainly could not have the effect of postponing the vesting of her estate. It seems to us, therefore, that the position contended for by the appellant cannot be sustained.

But even if we are in error in this, then Crosland as executor would have been compelled to hold the share of Zilphia E. as a sort of quasi trustee until the event occurred which would vest it in her; and if, as we have seen, all the transactions of this estate *were in Confederate money, then the investment of the fund so held in Confederate bonds would be sanctioned, as it was in the case of West v. Cauthen, 9 S. C., 45.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CANADAY v. BOLIVER.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Mortgages ⇨481.]

A creditor, holding a joint and several bond secured by a mortgage of each of the obligors upon their lands respectively, instituted his action of foreclosure, in which each of the defendants claimed to be a mere surety. Held, that the court properly determined first the relation of the defendants towards each other, but such relation having been determined, the Circuit Judge erred in recommitting the cause to the master for an adjustment of accounts between these defendants without decreeing a foreclosure.

B having borrowed money from A for the use of C, to whom B paid it, both B and C giving their bond secured by a mortgage of their lands respectively, the lands of B should be first sold under a decree of foreclosure; but upon such sale, B would be entitled as equitable assignee to be reimbursed out of the lands mortgaged by C.

Before Cothran, J., Orangeburg, September, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. James F. Izlar and A. B. Sawyer, for plaintiff.

Mr. Samuel Dibble, for Boliver.

Mr. Abial Lathrop, for Livingston.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., for Mrs. Kitching.

October 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On May 30, 1876, George Boliver and John H. Livingston gave a joint and several bond to E. S. Canaday for $7,500, money borrowed—$6,000 at the time the bond was executed, and $1,500, which Boliver had previously *borrowed and given his note for—with interest from May 30, 1876, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. In order to secure the bond, Boliver mortgaged certain lands and lots in Orangeburg County, viz., "four lots with the buildings thereon in the town of Orangeburg," and six tracts of land in said county, imperfectly described in the "Brief" as follows: "Containing, respectively, about 1,800 acres (less 3 acres, more or less), 301¾ acres, 236¾, 263¾, 385 acres, 378 acres (less 15 acres), and 130 acres." And the said Livingston mortgaged a tract of land containing 4,114 acres, less 500 acres previously sold to C. A. Keel, and 100 acres previously bargained to George Corley.

The mortgagee, Canaday, in consideration of $2,000 paid on the bond by Boliver, and with the consent of Livingston, released Boliver's mortgage on 1,314 acres of the 1,800 acre tract, and also on the tracts of 301¾ acres, 236¾, 385 acres, and 130 acres. On November 14, 1881, and April 21, 1884, Livingston, without the consent of Boliver, for value received, conveyed portions of the Aiken land covered by his mortgage, but without accurate description, to Harriet C. Kitching; and it does not clearly appear how much, if any, of the land mortgaged is still in the possession of the mortgagor, Livingston. The bond and mortgages were assigned to Annie I. Canaday, in trust for the use of her daughter, Annie E. S. Canaday, who intermarried with A. B. Sawyer and died intestate, leaving as her heirs at law her said husband and an infant son, Arthur, who is also now dead, leaving his father, the said A. B. Sawyer, the sole heir of the cestui que trust, Annie E. S. Canaday.

From time to time payments were made on the bond, but a large balance still remaining due, the trustee, Annie I. Canaday, as plaintiff, instituted this proceeding, an ordinary action of foreclosure of both mortgages, making parties defendant not only the mortgagors, but Harriet C. Kitching, the said purchaser of portions of the Aiken lands sold and conveyed to her by Livingston. The obligors of the bond answered, each claiming that he was only surety, and that the other was the principal debtor to Canaday, and therefore his lands should be first sold for the payment of the debt; and Mrs. Kitching concurred with Livingston that he was really only surety on the bond, and insisted that she had *good title to the lands conveyed to her by him. Besides, it was contended that there was a complicated settlement of accounts between Boliver and Livingston, and the foreclosure of the plaintiff's mortgages should be delayed until it could be ascertained how that account stood.

It was referred to the master, A. C. Dibble, Esq., to hear and determine the issues in the case. He ascertained that the balance due on the debt September 15, 1885, when he made his report, was $5,743.44. As to the relative liability of Boliver and Livingston, there was much testimony, which is very well condensed in the Circuit decree, as follows: "On June 8, 1875, the county commissioners of Orangeburg County awarded the contract for building a new court house at Orangeburg to the defendant, J. H. Livingston, for the sum of $28,900. The defendant, Boliver, was a bidder for the contract, but failed to get it. After the same was awarded to Livingston, Boliver proposed to go in with him, and was accepted as a partner. Boliver undertook to procure a suitable place for making brick, to be used in the construction of the building, and purchased some of the Treadwell lands near by for that purpose. A brickyard was established thereon, and about 100,000 bricks made. These were rejected by the architect, whereupon Livingston, who seems to have had charge of the active operations of the business, and Boliver of the financial, declared his purpose of attempting another kiln; to this Boliver objected, as he said they had already sunk $1,000, and upon Livingston persisting, Boliver withdrew from the copartnership.

"They had both occupied, and were, perhaps, then occupying, offices in the court house, one as sheriff and the other as auditor or treasurer; and upon Boliver's withdrawal from the copartnership, Livingston sought pecuniary aid from him to carry on his contract with the county commissioners, the annual levies which were provided by the legislature for raising the money being too slow to meet the exigency of the speedy completion of the building. For a certain consideration Boliver agreed to do this. He had already secured a loan (the $1,500 note) from S. B. Canaday, for which he had given his bond and mortgage of land. But $6,000 more was required, and Boliver undertook to obtain that sum from the same source. Canaday agreed to give up to Boliver the bond and mortgage for $1,500, and to take a new bond, including that sum and interest, adding thereto an amount in cash sufficient to make up the $7,500; but he demanded security in thrice the amount of the new loan. Up to this time the money borrowed seems to have been secured and obtained by Boliver alone, but he then said to Livingston, "that old codger (meaning Canaday) required a mortgage of his lands also." Livingston yielded his assent to join Boliver in putting up the additional security, and did mortgage his Aiken lands. As a premium to Boliver for this brokerage arrangement, Livingston agreed to construct for him, and did construct, a three-story brick building in the town of Orangeburg, and agreed, besides, to refund to Boliver the whole amount of money thus procured for him out of the first payments by the county commissioners on account of the building of the new court house," &c.

Upon this state of facts the master held: "That as between the defendants, Livingston and Boliver, the defendant, Livingston, must be regarded as the principal and the defendant, Boliver, as the surety, upon said bond for the principal sum thereof, with the interest that may be due thereon from November 20, 1877, when Livingston had collected sufficient funds from the court house contract to pay said bond, such interest to be computed in accordance with the terms of said bond. That the defendant, Boliver, must be regarded as the principal, and Livingston as the surety, for the interest that may be due on said bond from May 15, 1876, to November 20, 1877, in accordance with its terms."

To this report there were exceptions, and upon the hearing before Judge Cothran he reversed the ruling of the referee as to the relative liability of Boliver and Livingston; and thereupon, without making any decree of foreclosure, recommitted the report to the master, to make another report holding Boliver to be the principal and Livingston the surety. From this decree all the parties appeal the plaintiff on the ground that there was error in not adjudging the mortgaged premises to be sold and the proceeds applied towards the payment of the amount reported to be due to the plaintiff on the bond; there being no question as to such amount, or as to the plaintiff's right to recover.

The defendant, Boliver, filed numerous exceptions, which are *in the "Brief." In substance, they complain that it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to hold that Boliver was the principal and Livingston the surety on the bond secured by their respective mortgages; and that, on the contrary, "he should have held that all the land mortgaged by Livingston was primarily liable for the mortgage debt, and, after paying that, then for the excess of Boliver's payments over and above his liability for interest on the plaintiff's bond, and that for these liabilities of Livingston the premises mortgaged by him should be first subject to foreclosure and sale; and that the lands mortgaged by Boliver should only be held subject to sale in case the land mortgaged by Livingston should be insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt."

None of the many questions made and argued, except those which are here on appeal from the decree of the Circuit Judge, are really before us. The judge ruled nothing as to the correctness or incorrectness of the account stated between the defendants, but he held that, according to the circumstances of the case, Boliver was the principal and Livingston only surety on the bond to Canaday, and, as the report of the master had been made up on a different view of this fundamental fact, he thought it premature to decree a foreclosure, and recommitted the whole matter with instructions to make a report on the view held and expressed by him.

The plaintiff complains of error rather of omission than of commission—that the judge should have made a decree of foreclosure at least against one, if not both, of the mortgagors. It seems there was no objection to the report of the master as to the amount due on the bond, but that the only difficulty was as to how the amount should be paid, whether by first foreclosing the mortgage of Boliver or of Livingston. The amount due being satisfactorily ascertained, and the property mortgaged ample to secure it, the ordinary course would have been to give judgment for the amount due, and to proceed immediately to enforce its payment by decree of foreclosure. The terms of the bond are joint and several in the usual form, and, so far as the creditor was concerned, both the obligors and mortgagors were alike his debtors and bound to pay him. But, without denying the debt or their liability to pay it, they claim that as between themselves the bond does not *express their true relations, that, in fact, they are not equally bound, but, on the contrary, one is principal and the other only surety, with all the rights and liabilities respectively incident to that state of facts. Brandt Sur., §§ 17, 18.

We agree that the consideration of the question as to the real relation of the parties naturally preceded foreclosure, as upon its decision depended the order in which the securities were liable. The judge below did consider and decide the question, reversing the master upon the point, and holding that Boliver was principal and Livingston surety. He did not, however, follow up that finding by a decree of foreclosure in conformity with it, but recommitted the whole case, with instructions upon that point alone. It is true that the matter of recommitting a report, being somewhat administrative in its character, is ordinarily left to the discretion of the Circuit Judge; but it seems to us that in this case the plaintiff should not have been delayed only because of the number of her securities, but that she was entitled to have a judgment for the amount of her debt and a decree of foreclosure in conformity to the ruling of the judge, that Boliver was the principal, and, as a consequence, that the property covered by his mortgage was primarily liable and should be first sold.

But was it error on the part of the judge to hold that Boliver was the principal and Livingston only surety? It strikes us that it is a very peculiar case, and not by any means free from difficulty. If both the obligors had originally negotiated the loan, each giving the separate security of a mortgage for the same money, which was delivered by the creditor to one of them, there can be little doubt that the one receiving the money, and for that very reason, would have been considered and treated as the principal and the other as surety. See Brandt Sur., § 25. But we think the rights of these parties, as between themselves, should not be determined alone by the fact that Livingston got the cash then raised, but that such fact must be considered in connection with the other circumstances, and the contract and intention of the parties.

It does not appear that this loan was negotiated by both parties. So far as we know, Canaday, the creditor, was not acquainted with Livingston. He did, however, know Boliver, and *had before lent him money (the $1,500) upon the security of a mortgage of real estate. Boliver, for a consideration, undertook to obtain the money and "advance" it to Livingston, who, it seems, had nothing to do with the negotiations until there was a hitch on account of the creditor requiring additional security, when Boliver communicated to Livingston that Canaday "required a mortgage of his lands also," which was given. Livingston contracted to pay back the money thus raised, not to Canaday, but to Boliver, who attached his name first to the note. Under these circumstances, we are constrained to hold that, as between themselves, Boliver was to borrow the money and "advance" it to Livingston; that Livingston got the money, not directly from the creditor, but indirectly through Boliver, to whom chiefly the credit was given; and, therefore, as to Canaday, the mortgage of Livingston was merely cumulative, and the lands mortgaged by Boliver are primarily liable and must be first sold in discharge of the debt to Canaday.

We do not, however, think that the contract of the parties had the effect of making Livingston nothing more than a mere surety for the whole debt, in the sense that its payment by Boliver, considered as the principal, must operate to discharge Livingston entirely. While Livingston was merely surety to the extent of the $1,500, which Boliver had previously borrowed from Canaday and which was included in the bond, the whole transaction, considered together, made him something more than a mere surety as to the $6,000, which he then received as the fruit of the arrangement. A Court of Equity will look at all the circumstances of a case, to determine whether or not a party is a surety and entitled to be treated as such. Assuming that the mortgage of Livingston was, as to Canaday, only cumulative, is it not manifest that it was intended as one of the securities for the money then received by him? "The general criterion is the continued existence of the debt." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1195.

If Boliver was the debtor of Canaday, Livingston was certainly the debtor of Boliver for the same money; and upon its being paid by Boliver, or out of his property, he will be entitled as equitable assignee to set up the mortgage of Livingston as to the lands, upon which it now has a lien, to secure any balance of the $6,000 *advanced" on that occasion by Boliver to him. "Where there are two or more sureties for the same principal debtor and for the same debt or obligation, whether on the same or different instruments, and one of them has actually paid or satisfied more than his proportionate share of the debt or obligation, he is entitled to a contribution from each and all of his co-sureties, in order to reimburse him for the excess paid over his share, and thus to equalize their common burdens. The same doctrine applies, and the same remedy is given, between all those who are jointly, and jointly and severally, liable on contract or obligation in the nature of contract. The right, however, may be controlled or modified by express agreement among the co-sureties or debtors." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 1418.

In order to carry out the view taken, there should be, first, a decree of foreclosure of so much of the lands covered by the mortgage of Boliver as may be necessary to satisfy the balance of the mortgage debt, and if that is not sufficient, then the lands covered by the mortgage of Livingston should be sold; and, second, there should be an accounting ordered between Boliver and Livingston, in which Livingston should be charged with the $6,000 which he received as then "advanced" to him by Boliver, but he should at the same time receive credit for all payments made by him and credited by the direction of Boliver and to his relief on the bond to Canaday. This to be an original accounting, entirely unaffected by the former findings of the master, under a different view of the facts; and especially as to who made the payments of $1,410.75, November 15, 1877, and of $100, May 3, 1878, credited on the bond to Canaday.

The judgment of this court is, that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the conclusions herein announced.

*EASON v. MILLER & KELLY.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Mortgages ⚡131.]

In 1866 plaintiff made a mortgage of his foundry "including the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on the said premises." In 1879 this mortgage was foreclosed and the property sold, the complaint and decree, the advertisement and deed describing the property in the very language of the mortgage as above. Held, that the purchaser was entitled to all tools on the premises at the date of the sale, including such as were put there after the mortgage was given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 255; Dec. Dig. ⚡131.]

[2. Estoppel ⚡94.]

The mortgagor having been present at the sale and not having objected, he is estopped from saying that property ordered to be sold and advertised for sale was not embraced in the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 281; Dec. Dig. ⚡94.]

[3. Mortgages ⚡110.]

The Circuit Judge properly submitted to the jury the issue whether patterns were a part of the tools and implements of a foundry.

Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

Before Cothran, J., Charleston, November, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Lord & Hyde, for appellant.

Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. James M. Eason, appellant, and his brother, Thomas D. Eason (since dead), doing business as copartners, on April 2, 1866, executed a mortgage to one Hannah Enston of certain property known as "Eason's Foundry," situate in Charleston, including the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected. The language used in the mortgage with reference to the implements, &c., being: "All that lot * * * with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on said premises." This mortgage was foreclosed by regular proceedings in 1879. The decree of foreclosure, which was made March 4, 1879, ordered the mortgaged property described in the pleadings as thereafter set forth to be sold upon certain terms. In this decree the property ordered to be sold was described in the following terms, to wit: "All that lot of land, with all the buildings thereon, including machine and workshops and foundry, with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on the premises, situate and being on the north side of Columbus street, * * * Charleston * * *."

In accordance with this decree the property, after due advertisement, was sold by the master on April 24, 1879, defendants, respondents, being the purchasers, to whom a deed was executed on April 24, 1879, by which the property was conveyed to said defendants in the following language: "All that lot, * * * workshops and foundry, with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on said premises," &c. Shortly after this sale the respondents took possession of the lot and machinery, including certain patterns, the subject of this controversy, whereupon the action below was instituted to recover the value of said "patterns," the plaintiff alleging that the patterns in question having been constructed and placed on the premises after the execution of the mortgage in 1866, were not embraced in the mortgage and constituted no part of the mortgaged property, and therefore could not have been the subject of the decree of sale in the foreclosure proceedings.

On the part of the defendants it was urged that the terms, "implements, machinery, and tools" embraced "patterns," and the order of sale having directed that all implements, &c., "now on the premises," be sold, and the deed of the master following the order, having conveyed all implements, &c., now on the premises, and these patterns being on the premises at the time of the order and of the sale and at the time of the execution of said deed, said patterns passed to the defendants as part of the implements, and especially so because of the fact that the defendants in that action were parties to the foreclosure proceedings, and were also present at the sale and bidders for the property, having at no time interposed objection to any of said proceedings.

The jury rendered a verdict for the defendants. The appeal assigns error to the refusal of the Circuit Judge to charge certain requests of the plaintiff, and to his charge on certain requests of the defendants.

It will be seen from an examination of the replies made by his honor, the Circuit Judge, to the various requests to charge that he laid down the following propositions: First, that nothing passed to Miller & Kelly, the defendants, by the master's deed, except the property embraced in the mortgage. Second, that all the "tools" and "implements" connected with the plant on the premises at the time of the execution of the mortgage, at the time it was foreclosed, at the time the decree was made, and at the sale, passed under the decree of sale, and went to the purchaser. Third, he declined to charge at the request of the plaintiff, "that such 'patterns' as were placed on the premises since August, 1866, when the mortgage was executed, remained the property of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the sale and conveyance."

The leading legal principles by which the Circuit Judge intended the jury to be governed were: that all tools and implements connected with the foundry, on the premises at the decree of foreclosure and sale, should be regarded as embraced in the mortgage, and consequently as having passed to the purchaser; and whether the patterns in question thus passed, depended upon the further question whether these patterns were tools and implements, which he ruled was a question of fact for the jury; and after defining what was meant by the terms "tools and implements," he submitted this question, as a question of fact, to the jury.

The main questions raised in the numerous exceptions are, first, that his honor erred in holding that all the tools and implements on the premises at the decree of foreclosure and sale passed under said sale; and, secondly, that even if this was true, yet that in no event could patterns be regarded as tools and implements, and that his honor erred in not so instructing the jury as matter of law, instead of submitting that question to the jury as a question of fact.

We think the ruling below was correct on both of these questions. Passing by the question, whether the Circuit Judge was entirely correct in ruling that, under all circumstances, such additions as may be made to the original stock of property embraced in a mortgage of the kind before the court, would become embraced in the mortgage and pass at its foreclosure, we think that his honor was fully warranted in the general charge which he made, as applicable to the facts of this case. Here a decree of sale had been obtained in a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage in question, in which decree it was expressly stated that all working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected and then on the premises, were to be sold. Under this decree, after due advertisement, the property was sold, and a deed in pursuance thereof executed to the defendants, describing the property conveyed as all that lot of land * * including machine and workshop and foundry, with all working implements, machinery, tools therewith connected, and (then) now on the premises. To this proceeding the plaintiff had been made a party, and, as it appears, he was present or was represented at the sale, at no time interposing objection or raising a question as to the sale of such tools and implements as were on the premises at the date of this decree and sale. Under these circumstances we do not see how the Circuit Judge could have reached any other conclusion than that the tools and implements then on the premises were the tools and implements embraced in the mortgage.

The appellant complains that the Circuit Judge failed to construe the decree of foreclosure. We think he did construe it, and that his construction was in accordance with its terms, and that the conduct of the plaintiff estops him from denying that construction. He held that this decree ordered all the tools and implements on the premises at its date to be sold, and, as we have already said, this seems to us to have been the proper interpretation of the decree. He then left it to the jury to determine as matter of fact whether the patterns in contest, admitted to have been on the premises at the date of the decree, were tools and implements, &c. The jury found that they were, and consequently rendered a verdict for the defendants. Certainly, this last question which his honor submitted to the jury was a question of fact, pure and simple, one which his honor had no right to decide, and one which he could not have decided upon any principle of law. He defined the meaning of the term tools and implements, but whether patterns fell under this meaning depended upon evidence as to their character, nature, and use, the force and effect of which the jury alone had the right to determine.

*We think it will be found upon examination that all of the numerous exceptions are met in the discussion of the questions hereinabove, and therefore it is useless to take them up in detail.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur. Without going into the inquiry whether the mortgage itself of the foundry, "with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on the premises," &c., did not really mean the foundry in working condition as a whole, with all its incidents and appurtenances, including such working implements as might be procured in place of those worn out or abandoned in running the establishment as a foundry, it seems to me that the purchaser at the sale ordered by the court has the right to stand on the very terms of the decree and advertisement under which he purchased, as constituting his contract, without going back of that to inquire whether the decree of sale was not expressed inaccurately, or at least in terms wanting in precision. The terms of the decree were, "all that lot of land and all the buildings thereon, including machine and workshops and foundry, with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on the premises," &c. The plaintiff was a party to the proceeding in which this decree was rendered and did not appeal. The sale was advertised accordingly, and it seems to me that it is now too late for him to claim that the words, "now on the premises," inserted in the decree, really meant, by a process of reasoning, the date of the mortgage, and not that of the decree in which the expression occurs. A purchaser at a judicial sale cannot be affected by mere irregularities in the proceedings.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. As I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by a majority of the court, I will proceed to state, briefly, the reasons which forbid my concurrence. While I agree with the Circuit Judge that one of the material questions in the case was, whether "patterns" were embraced in the terms, "all the working implements and machinery and tools" used in the mortgage under which defendants claim, and that this question was properly submitted to the jury as a question of fact, after instructions as to the meaning of those terms, it seems to me that there was another material question, to wit: assuming "patterns" to be embraced within those terms, whether all of the patterns which were on the premises at the date of the sale passed to the purchasers, or only those which were there at the date of the mortgage, upon which the jury were not properly instructed.

Assuming, as I shall do, throughout this discussion, that patterns are embraced within the terms of the mortgage, it seems to me quite clear that only those which were on the premises at the time of the execution of the mortgage were covered by it, and only those could be sold under it. Such was the conclusion of Judge Pressley at a former stage of this controversy, and such seems to have been the opinion of this court. For in 15 S. C. Reports, at page 203, the following language is found in the opinion of the majority of the court: "The Circuit Judge decided at once the legal question, and held, no doubt correctly, that such portion of the patterns as were on the premises at the date of the execution of the mortgage belonged to the defendants, and such portion as was placed there after the execution of the mortgage belonged to the plaintiff."

If this be so, then I think the Circuit Judge erred in refusing to charge as requested by the plaintiff: "That such patterns as were placed there since April, 1866, when the mortgage was executed, remained the property of Mr. Eason, notwithstanding said sale and conveyance." The proposition of law upon which his honor based his refusal of this part of plaintiff's request, to wit: "That when a mortgage is taken on a railroad, machine shops, and property of that kind, having, at the time the mortgage was taken, certain chattels connected with the business, such as the cars and engines of a railroad, and such as the tools and working implements of a foundry, that as the times change, as the necessities for other tools exist, as the exigency arises for supplying the place of worn out tools, and for bringing into the plant other tools to meet the improvements in mechanics, such additions to the original stock pass under the original mortgage, and in a sale under foreclosure such articles would go to the purchaser," cannot be maintained as a general proposition. It only applies where the mortgage contains such language as may be construed as evidencing an intention to embrace such after-acquired property, and it certainly cannot be applied in a case like this where the mortgage is in express terms limited to the property on the premises at the time of its execution.

The rule, as I understand it, established by the authorities cited by appellant's counsel is, that where an indivisible, entire thing, as a railway locomotive for example, is mortgaged, and subsequent to the execution of the mortgage new parts are added to it or substituted for others for the purpose of improvement or repairs, such additions constituting, as they do, essential parts of the thing mortgaged, will pass under the mortgage. So, too, where real estate is mortgaged, anything subsequently attached to it so as to acquire the character of a fixture, and becoming thus a part of the thing mortgaged, will be covered by the mortgage. But where, as in this case, the mortgage is on "all that lot of land, with all the buildings thereon, including machine and workshops and foundry, with all the working implements, machinery, and tools therewith connected, now on the said premises, situate," &c., I do not see how it can be so construed as to cover any such articles as were not on the premises at the date of the mortgage. For it will be observed that in designating the implements and tools which it was intended to mortgage they are described not only as those connected with the foundry, but also as those now on the premises. So that unless they fulfilled both of these conditions, viz., that they were not only connected with the foundry, but also that they were on the premises at the time the mortgage was given, they could not be regarded as part of the property intended to be mortgaged.

It is contended, however, by the counsel for respondents that the mortgage is not before us, first, because it was not introduced in evidence, and, second, because it has been merged in the judgment of foreclosure, and therefore the court is not at liberty to inquire into the proper construction of the mortgage. As to the first objection, I do not see where there was any necessity for offering the mortgage in evidence, in view of the fact that it is distinctly alleged in the second paragraph of the complaint that the property mortgaged was the foundry, "with all the working *implements and machinery and tools therewith connected, which were on the said premises at the time the said mortgage was executed to one Hannah Euston," which allegation was expressly admitted in the answers of both of the defendants. As to the second objection, it is quite sufficient to say that it is permissible and sometimes necessary in construing a judgment to look into the pleadings under which such judgment was rendered. Here the whole record in the action for foreclosure was introduced in evidence, and in it we find that the complaint sets out in hæc verba so much of the mortgage as describes the property intended to be mortgaged, from which it clearly appears that the mortgage covered only the implements and tools on the premises at the date of the mortgage.

This brings us to the inquiry as to the proper construction of the judgment of foreclosure. Inasmuch as it is quite clear that property not embraced in a mortgage cannot properly be ordered to be sold under a proceeding to foreclose such mortgage, it seems to me that nothing but the clearest and most explicit language could justify the conclusion that the judgment in this case required or authorized the sale of any property not embraced in the mortgage. Instead of finding any such language either in the judgment or the pleadings upon which it was based, it appears to me that the language as used clearly evinces an intention to order the sale of nothing more than what could be properly sold, to wit: the property on the premises at the time of the execution of the mortgage. In the complaint for foreclosure the allegation is that, on the day named, the mortgagors "executed to plaintiff their deed and thereby conveyed to plaintiff, by way of mortgage, the following described real estate and other property, situate in the city of Charleston, County and State aforesaid, to wit:" and then follows the description of the property, placed within quotation marks, in which the tools and implements intended to be mortgaged are designated as those "now on the premises." The manifest meaning of this is that the description of the property is copied from the mortgage, and hence that the word "now" in the phrase "now on the premises," must be read as referring to the date of the mortgage, and not to the date of the complaint.

*So in the notice of pendency of action, the description of the property covered by the mortgage, though not placed within quotation marks, is in terms declared to be the same as that given in the mortgage, and hence there was no necessity for the use of quotation marks: for the language used in the notice of the pendency of action in reference to the description of the mortgaged premises is: "And are described in said mortgage as follows, to wit: all that lot of land, with all the buildings thereon, including machine and work shops and foundry, with all the working implements and tools and machinery therewith connected, now on the said premises," &c., showing plainly that the property referred to was the property covered by the mortgage, and for its description reference was had to the terms in which it was described in the mortgage.

Coming then to the judgment of foreclosure, we find that the following language is used: "That the mortgaged property described in the pleadings as hereinafter set forth be sold," &c., and when we come to that part of the judgment setting forth the description of the property, the following language is employed: "The following is the description of the property to be sold as hereinbefore directed," and then follows the description as copied from the complaint and placed within quotation marks. It seems to me, therefore, that the judgment cannot be construed as requiring or authorizing the sale of any property except that described in the mortgage, and that as it is clear that the description therein contained did not embrace any tools or implements except those on the premises at the time of the execution of the mortgage, there was no authority whatever for the sale of any such articles as were placed on the premises after the date of the mortgage. Under this view it is unimportant to inquire into the construction of the advertisement of the sale and the deed from the master, for unless there was authority for the sale of such patterns as were placed upon the premises after the execution of the mortgage, they could not pass under such deed, no matter what might be the terms used. It would not, however, be dillicult to show, if it was necessary, that the advertisement and deed from the master, properly construed, cannot be regarded as embracing any property except such as is described in the mortgage.

*It is contended by respondent that the plaintiff, by bidding at the sale and otherwise, is estopped from setting up any claim to such of the patterns as were placed upon the premises after the date of the mortgage. I do not see any ground for an estoppel. The fact that the defendants had authorized their agent to bid more than the amount for which the property was knocked down to them, shows very clearly that the conduct of the plaintiff at the sale did not induce them to do anything which they otherwise would not have done. But in addition to this, it is manifest from all the testimony, that the plaintiff, by bidding at the sale, did not intend to convey, and did not in fact convey, the impression that he was thereby assenting to the sale of such patterns as were placed on the premises after the mortgage. On the contrary, he had contended from the first that none of the patterns were covered by the mortgage, because, as he insisted, they were not embraced in the terms used in the mortgage. But even assuming, as we have done, that the terms used in the mortgage did embrace patterns, and assuming further that the plaintiff was bound to know this, his bidding at the sale cannot be regarded as an acquiescence in the sale of any other property than that which was ordered to be sold, and as the order of sale did not embrace any other property except that which was covered by the mortgage, and as the patterns placed on the premises after the execution of the mortgage were not embraced therein, the fact of his bidding at the sale cannot be regarded as an acquiescence in the sale of such patterns, and he is not estopped from setting up a claim to them.

It seems to me, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed and the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

25 S. C. 564

HAIL v. SOUTH CAROLINA RAILWAY CO.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Carriers ⇐381.]

In action by a passenger against a railway company for ejecting him from its train after tender of the sum at which tickets were sold, and while on his way to a point beyond the State limits, the *report of the railroad company fixing rates was admissible in evidence, there being testimony that those rates had been accepted and acted upon by the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1476; Dec. Dig. ⇐381.]

[2. Commerce ⇐58, 61.]

The Railroad Commission of this State cannot regulate passenger fare to a point in another

State, but a regulation as to the hours for opening the ticket office is not a matter of inter-State commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 82; Dec. Dig. ⇐58, 61.]

[3. Carriers ⇐357.]

There being some evidence upon all the points necessary to plaintiff's case, the Circuit Judge erred in granting a non-suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1433; Dec. Dig. ⇐357.]

[4. Carriers ⇐381.]

[A railroad report containing a regulation as to the hours of opening the ticket office was competent evidence, aside from the question of interstate commerce.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1476; Dec. Dig. ⇐381.]

Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

Before Fraser, J., Aiken, April, 1885.

This was an appeal from an order of non-suit. In granting the order the Circuit Judge made the following remarks:

From the little time I have had to consider the authorities relied on by the plaintiff, I do not see that I am bound by these decisions out of the State. It seems to me that the decisions relied on are not founded upon a correct view of the relations of these employees to the railroad company and each other; although the decisions quoted are from eminent sources. What may be the rule ultimately adopted, I am not able to say; but if that rule is adopted which is contended for, it would amount to a virtual repeal of all the rules of the railroad company requiring passengers to buy tickets at places where tickets are sold. Take, for instance, a train with fifty or a hundred passengers, none of them having tickets and ignoring the regulations of the railroad company. The conductor would be called upon, at his peril or that of the company, either to pass them over the road or to put them out, and in that case the regulations would be of no avail, as there would be no practicable way of recovering the ten cents (as in this case) back again.

I do not think that the rule cited in those cases ought to be the rule in this State. The application for the ticket ought to have been made within office hours, and if the railroad company advertises its office hours from six until ten, as in this case, I think that the application for the ticket ought then to have been made. I think that if the train passed out of office hours, the ticket should have been purchased previously.

Again, this was a ticket for a ride from Aiken to Augusta. It is true that Augusta is just across the Savannah river, but the *principle is just the same whether it was outside of the State a half mile or a hundred and fifty miles, and whether it was to Augusta or to Atlanta, neither the State nor the railroad commission had a right to regulate inter-State travel any more than they have a right to regulate inter-State commerce. This purchase of a ticket, which I think is established to be one of the rules of the company, was merely one of the incidents of the trip from here to Augusta, and the commission had no more right to regulate the ticket than the fare itself.

I think the case might as well be reviewed by the appellate tribunal at this point as at any other, and I will grant the non-suit.

Mr. G. W. Croft, for appellant.
Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, being a passenger on the South Carolina Railway, travelling from Aiken, in this State, to Augusta, Ga., was ejected from the train by the conductor of defendant company; for this the action below was brought, demanding $2,000 damages. In the course of the trial he offered in testimony the 5th annual report of the railroad commission, to show the rates allowed to charge passengers, and also to show the regulations requiring railway companies to have their depot open a reasonable time before the departure of the trains. This testimony was ruled incompetent, and therefore was excluded. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved a non-suit, which was granted. The appeal raises but two questions: 1st. Was the testimony referred to above, to wit, the report of the railroad commission, properly and legally excluded? 2d. Was it error to grant the non-suit?

The complaint alleged, in substance, that the price of a ticket from Aiken to Augusta was fifty-five cents; that he was unable to procure a ticket at Aiken, where he boarded the car, on account of the negligence of the ticket agent in not having the office *opened in time; that when the conductor called for his fare he tendered fifty-five cents, the ticket price, informing the conductor that, the office not being open, he could not get a ticket before leaving Aiken. The conductor refused the tender and demanded sixty-five cents, which the plaintiff refusing to pay, he was ejected.

His honor, Judge Fraser presiding, held the report of the commission incompetent testimony—we suppose upon the ground that the commission having no right to regulate inter-State commerce, and the plaintiff being on his way from a point in this State to a point in Georgia, its regulations could have no application here, as this was a case governed by the doctrine of inter-State commerce. Doubtless, this is a case involving inter-State commerce in some of its aspects, as that doctrine applies as well to the transportation of passengers as of goods, and the railroad commission had no authority to fix rates for passenger fare from Aiken to Augusta. See [Railroad Commissioners v. Railroad Co.] 22 S. C., 236. But even an unconstitutional act, when adopted and acted upon by a party with reference to whom it has been enacted, may be binding upon such party. See Hand v. S. & C. R. R. Co., 21 S. C., 179.

Now, the allegation of the complaint was that the ticket price between these points was fifty-five cents, and the object of the testimony offered was to show that this price was established by the railroad commission as a matter of fact, which seems to have been followed up by evidence from the ticket agent that that was the price adopted by the company. This agent said: "I sold tickets to Augusta for fifty-five cents, sir. That was after the rates had been inaugurated and fixed by the railroad commission, I believe." So whether the action of the commission was legal and binding on the company or not, yet if the company adopted the regulation made, and held it out to the community as the rate charged, until changed parties would have the right to demand a compliance therewith. In this point of view, we think this testimony should have been admitted as a statement of a fact, having more or less bearing upon the merits of the case, as the judge in his judgment might determine in the further progress of the case, and which he could explain in his charge.

But if we are wrong here, that portion of this report which referred to regulations in reference to having the depot open a *reasonable time before the departure of trains, we think was competent, under the principle of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S., 135 [24 L. Ed. 77], the case of the grain elevator erected in Chicago; also The State Tax Case, 15 Wall., 233 [21 L. Ed. 164], where it was said: "That it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it within the meaning of the constitution. The warehouses of these plaintiffs in error are situated, and their business carried on exclusively within the limits of the State of Illinois. They are used as instruments by those engaged in State as well as those engaged in inter-State commerce, but they are no more necessarily a part of commerce itself than the dray or cart by which, &c. * * * Incidentally they may become connected with inter-State commerce, but not necessarily so. This regulation is certainly a thing of domestic concern * * *."

And in the Railroad Commissioners v. Railroad Company, 22 S. C., 236, this court said: "It may, as we think, also be taken as settled that, as a general rule, each State may control, as a matter of domestic concern, all railroads and other things, proper subjects of public control, which are located entirely within the borders of the State, although such regulating control may affect incidentally general inter-State commerce, with which the subject may connect"—citing Munn v. Illinois, supra. Now, here the depot at Aiken was entirely within this State, its regulation was of domestic concern, and as far as we can see now, the regulations were not illegal; at least, this does not seem to us to have been so certain as to exclude the testimony offered. It should have been admitted subject to the charge of his honor.

But independent of these questions, did not the plaintiff have enough testimony to prevent a non-suit? The issues were: 1st. The price of a ticket between the points mentioned. 2d. That plaintiff was prevented from obtaining a ticket by the negligence of the company. And, 3d. That he was ejected after offering the ticket price and explaining to the conductor why he failed to procure a ticket. These were the material issues, and necessary to plaintiff's action. Was there a total absence of evidence as to any one of these points? If not, then the case should have gone to the jury. As to the first point, it makes no difference how the company come to establish a ticket price at fifty-five *cents; whether under the direction of the railroad commission or not. If it was established, and the community so informed by the company, whether this was upon its own judgment or by the illegal direction of the commission, passengers had the right to act upon it until changed. So that the only question as to this was, had a ticket price been established, as alleged, at fifty-five cents? Certainly there was some evidence on this point. We think, too, there was evidence as to the allegation that plaintiff was not furnished an opportunity to procure a ticket on account of negligence—weak it may be, but still some evidence which had to be weighed, the province of the jury. And there was evidence also that plaintiff was ejected, after full information of all the facts connected with the failure of the plaintiff to get a ticket, and after a tender of the ticket price. Under these circumstances we think the case was a proper one for the jury.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur. Common carriers, from the nature of their vocation, are bound to transport all persons who pay or offer to pay the established fare. For their own convenience they sometimes require a ticket to be purchased in advance, and to insure compliance with the requirement they charge a higher rate of fare if the ticket is not so procured. I assume that such regulation is allowable, on condition, however, that the company, from which alone tickets can be secured, affords an opportunity to purchase a ticket in advance.

If no such opportunity is afforded, and a ticket cannot be purchased in advance, it seems to me that the company could not resort to the extreme course of ejecting a passenger, only for the reason that he had not complied with a rule which they had made it impossible for him to do. Whether such opportunity was afforded the plaintiff was a question of fact. There was some evidence upon the subject, and the question is whether it was "pertinent, competent, and relevant to the fact in dispute." It seems to me that there was some such proof, and therefore the case should have been *submitted to the jury. Davis v. C. & G. R. R. Co., 21 S. C., 93; Couch v. R. R. Co., 22 Id., 561.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. It seems to me quite clear, under the case of Railroad Commissioners v. Railroad Company, 22 S. C., 220, that the railroad commissioners had no right to establish the rate of fare which should be charged for transporting a passenger from the town of Aiken, in South Carolina, to the city of Augusta, in the State of Georgia, and therefore that the report of the railroad commissioners was incompetent evidence for any purpose in this case and was properly ruled out. While it may be true that the railroad commissioners may be invested with power to regulate the hours for opening the ticket office of a railroad company, so as to afford passengers a reasonable time for the purchase of tickets, so far as travel within the State is concerned, I do not see how such a regulation can be allowed to affect inter-State travel, and hence the report of the commissioners was certainly irrelevant even for the purpose of showing the depot regulations, in a case like this, where the rights of an inter-State passenger are in question. It seems to me, therefore, that there was no error in excluding the report of the railroad commissioners.

The next inquiry is, whether the non-suit was properly refused. The defendant undoubtedly had a right to eject the plaintiff from the train if he refused to pay a reasonable compensation for his passage when demanded. The plaintiff certainly did refuse to pay the compensation demanded of him—sixty-five cents—but, as he alleges in his complaint, he tendered "the sum of fifty-five cents, which was a reasonable and just fare or toll for said passenger, and which was the fare as fixed under the law," which the defendant's agent refused to accept. Now, as we have seen that the amount of the fare could not be fixed by the railroad commission, and as it is not shown that the amount of such fare is fixed by defendant's charter, it is quite clear that the amount tendered could not be "the fare as fixed under the law;" and the only question is, whether there was any evidence that the amount tendered was "a reasonable and just fare" for the transportation of plaintiff by that train from Aiken to Augusta. I am unable *to find any evidence upon that point. Certainly no witness has undertaken to say what would be a reasonable and just fare.

It is argued, however, that the testimony of the agent, Wigfall, that at that time the regular passenger fare from Aiken to Augusta was fifty-five cents, and that he sold tickets at that rate, together with the fact testified to by the plaintiff, that about ten days afterwards he was charged only fifty-five cents on the same train, was evidence tending to show that such was a reasonable and just fare, and therefore the question should have been left to the jury. I cannot so regard it, for it will be seen that the witness, Wigfall, was testifying to "the regular passenger fare," and not to what was a reasonable compensation for transporting a passenger from Aiken to Augusta, and that his testimony was that he sold tickets at fifty-five cents after the rates had been fixed by the railroad commission, which pretty clearly indicated that this amount was charged, not because it was a reasonable and just fare, but merely in compliance with a regulation which, though unauthorized, the company did not care to contest.

It will further be observed that the train from which the plaintiff was ejected was not advertised as a passenger train, and so far as appears from the evidence, no tickets were ever sold for that train at Aiken, as it passed that point at a very early hour, before the agent was required to open the office. Hence the fact that tickets by the regular passenger train were sold for fifty-five cents, does not, in my judgment, even tend to show that sixty-five cents was an unreasonable charge for passage by the train in question, for it not unfrequently happens that railroad companies are induced by a variety of reasons to charge less than reasonable rates on their regular passenger trains.

It seems to be assumed that the plaintiff was charged sixty-five cents because he had no ticket, but I am unable to find anything in the testimony to warrant such an assumption. The plaintiff certainly does not say that the conductor assigned any such reason for making the charge. On the contrary, the testimony of the plaintiff is this: "Soon after leaving the depot the conductor came round and asked for my fare. I offered him the money and said that fifty-five cents was the regular price. He said, No, it is sixty-five cents, and I said I wouldn't pay it." Not a word then said about tickets. The conductor did not ask the plaintiff for his ticket, but for his fare, indicating clearly that tickets were not sold for that train.

Even after the plaintiff had told the conductor that he had been unable to procure a ticket as the office was not open, nothing was then said to indicate that the sixty-five cents was demanded because plaintiff had no ticket. In fact, according to the plaintiff's own testimony, all that the conductor ever said about tickets was that "he had nothing to do with the tickets, that was none of his business," and he all the time insisted that the charge he made was required by his instructions contained in a little book, which he offered to show plaintiff, but which he declined to look at. Indeed, I am unable to find anything in the testimony showing that the railway company had ever established a regulation whereby an extra charge was to be exacted from passengers failing to procure tickets, and it seems to me to be an entire mistake to look at the case in that aspect. Certainly the fact that the plaintiff on a single occasion, some ten days afterwards, was only charged fifty-five cents on the train in question, affords no evidence that the charge of sixty-five cents on the occasion in question was an unreasonable charge.

In the absence of any law fixing the rate of compensation which the defendant had a right to demand for the service required by the plaintiff, he could only justify his refusal to pay the amount demanded by showing that such amount was unreasonable, and of this I think there was no evidence. It seems to me, therefore, that there was no error in granting the non-suit.

New trial granted.

CAROLINA NATIONAL BANK v. SENN.

KOEGAN v. SAME.

BATEMAN v. SAME.

(April Term, 1886.)

[1. Appeal and Error ¶169.]

On exceptions to homestead, the Circuit Judge declined to consider any questions other than that of the homestead allowed, and therefore only that question can be considered on appeal. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1634; Dec. Dig. ¶169.]

[2. Homestead ¶152.]

A person can claim homestead only against a debt of his own or of one *whose family he is a member of. Children of a deceased debtor cannot claim, each for himself, as the head of a family, a separate homestead out of the lands of the deceased debtor against his debt; but, collectively, they are entitled to one homestead, whether they be infants or adults.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 293; Dec. Dig. ¶152.]

[3. Homestead ¶150.]

Upon refusal to sustain the three homesteads set apart in this case, the Circuit Judge did not err in omitting to order a reassignment of a single homestead to the claimants as a family.

4. Costs [§58.]

Where a petition for a homestead is refused, costs cannot be taxed against the petitioner.

5. Costs [§3.]

[The right to costs is dependent on statutory provisions, there being no right thereto at common law.]

Before Cothran, J., Orangeburg, October, 1885.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

It has already appeared from the nature of the proceedings, as well as from the statement of facts agreed upon, that the main question involved is that of homestead, pure and simple, and to that I propose to confine myself. It may be premised that the manifest construction by our Supreme Court of section 32, article 11., of the Constitution, is that it is broad enough in its terms to admit of more legislation than was contemplated by the act of September 9, 1868 (16 Stat., 19), which provides homestead only for debtors in execution. Besides these, two other classes of persons are now provided for, to wit, widows of husbands who would have been entitled, and all others being heads of families, against whom not even final process has been obtained. These provisions are about as ample as anything short of a total denial of all the rights of creditor in this behalf, or the boldest spirit of communism could demand.

Under which of these do the parties claim? Clearly not under the first or second. Then, are they entitled as standing in the third class? It will be borne in mind that the testator directed his debts to be paid, if possible, without the sale of property. Doubtless this inspired the removal of the widow and children from Columbia to the plantation in Orangeburg, and the dedication of the surplus income of the plantation and the proceeds of the sale of the Columbia property to the payment of debts. The sale, which seems to have been made at an unfortunate time, fell short of the purpose, and for which the executor had some receipts from the Orangeburg property. In the meantime the widow died. *At the death of her husband she had a constitutional right, as widow, to homestead, but there were no means then provided for the assertion of such right.

It appears, however, very clearly from the reasoning in Norton v. Bradham (21 S. C., 375), that she was within the purview of the terms of the organic law. She was "the person entitled thereto." Could this personal right of hers have remained in abeyance from the death of her husband, to be brought into active exercise and fruition by subsequent legislation, as was had? I think so; and if so, did the right descend to her children? At the death of James Claffy, this was the only right of homestead in his lands. It was a constitutional right, but incapable of assertion for want of legislative provision to that end, and it inured to the widow. She died in 1875 without asserting it. It is needless to attempt to trace it further. But the parties here are not claiming the right to their mother's homestead. They set up their claims to three several homesteads! By what system of devolution (or evolution, either, as to that matter) can such result obtain?

Suppose James Claffy, at the time of his death, had owned four plantations worth $1,000 each, and owed $1,000 for money borrowed upon the faith of having $3,000 more than the homestead exemption. Again, suppose that he left four sons as devisees of the four plantations, respectively, each son being the head of a family, and the sons had been let into their devises by the executor upon the understanding that they should, from the use of the lands, pay off the $1,000, and afterwards some payments should be made upon the debt, the creditor indulging them, could it be seriously contended that after ceasing to pay, or to make further effort, that the creditor could be met successfully and his debt lost by the interposition of claims of homesteads to the whole estate? I cannot think so.

It is, however, insisted by the learned counsel for the claimants that this is a case of actual partition among the children, and that they are in exclusive possession, severally, of the parcels of land claimed as homesteads. I have already adverted to the fact that in the agreed statement of counsel this does not appear. It has been attempted, however, to maintain this by affidavits—always an unsatisfactory means of determining disputed facts.

*The practice in this State, from the time of D'Urphy v. Nelson, as far back as 1st Bravard, down to Huggings v. Oliver, 21 S. C., 117, with numerous cases intervening, has been formulated into a rule by Justice McIver, in the last named case, as follows: "That while, as a general proposition, it is true that lands of an intestate may be sold upon a judgment recovered against the administrator upon a debt of the intestate, yet, if the lands have passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs before judgment has been recovered, and before any lien has been fixed upon them, they can no longer be sold under such judgments," &c.

It will be observed, however, that this was a case of intestacy, as were, also, the cases of Martin v. Latta, Bird v. Houze, Jones v. Wightman, &c. The case under consideration is one of testacy, with directions to the executor to hold the estate in hand until the debts are paid. It may be that the matter of partition and exclusive possession by the devisees, the claimants here, may avail them, if made out, as a means of holding the several parcels of land now in their possession, but it will be in a different right to that of homestead. Whenever the time comes for such assertion of right on their part, the court will move to its conclusion upon firmer ground than that which can be furnished by affidavit.

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the plaintiffs' exceptions to the assignments of homestead in the said several cases be sustained, and that said assignments be, and the same are hereby, set aside. It is further ordered, that the plaintiffs have judgments, severally, against the claimants for their costs and disbursements.

Messrs. Izlar & Glaze, for appellants.

Messrs. T. M. Raysor and A. B. Sawyer, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The points of this case will be sufficiently explained by the facts admitted on the record:

"That on November 6, 1873, James Claffy made and published his last will and testament, as follows: 1. Debts to be paid out *of income of crops, and, as far as possible, without selling property. 2. After payment of debts, all his property, real and personal, to go, one third to his wife, Eliza, her heirs and assigns forever; the remaining two-thirds to be equally divided among his four children, Michael Robert, James Henry, Anna Maria, and Francis Peter, share and share alike, to them and their heirs and assigns forever. 3. Rufus D. Senn named as executor. James Claffy, at the time of making his will and at the time of his death, resided in the city of Columbia. Said will was admitted to probate, in the County of Richland, December 22, 1873. Rufus D. Senn qualified as executor on same day, and is now such executor. The wife and children named in the will survived testator.

"At the time of his death, the testator was possessed of considerable personal property, which went into the hands of the said Rufus D. Senn, as executor, and was seized of certain valuable real estate in Richland and Orangeburg Counties. Judgments in the above entitled actions were obtained in Richland County against Senn, as executor, in the year 1878. The causes of action on which said judgments were obtained arose subsequent to the constitution of 1868, and were simple contracts not under seal. Executions were issued in the cases of Koegan and Bateman, and valuable property in the city of Columbia was levied upon February 8, 1878, as the property of James Claffy, deceased, to satisfy the same. Transcripts of said judgments were docketed in Orangeburg County August 18, 1884. Leave to renew executions was granted December 3, 1884. Renewal executions were issued December 3, 1884, and lodged with the sheriff of Orangeburg January 28, 1885. The sheriff of Orangeburg, under these executions, levied on all that tract of land, containing 362 acres, situate in Orangeburg County, as before stated, as lands belonging to the estate of James Claffy, deceased, on February 23, 1885.

"The lands so levied are the same now in the possession and occupancy of the claimants, Robert M. Claffy, James H. Claffy, and Anna M. Darby, and of Francis P. Claffy, and which were in their possession before and at the time of said levy. The said Robert M. and James H. Claffy are now, and were at the time of said levy, heads of families: and the said Anna M. Darby is now, *and was at the time of said levy, a married woman, whose husband has not sufficient property of his own to constitute a homestead. That the said Robert M. and James H. Claffy, and Anna M. Darby, with their respective families, resided on different portions of said lands at the time of such levy, and now reside thereon. Robert M. and James H. Claffy and Anna M. Darby each claimed a homestead in the portion of land whereon they resided with their families. On February 23, 1885, a homestead in said lands was duly set off and assigned by metes and bounds to Robert M. and James H. Claffy and Anna M. Darby, respectively, by appraisers duly appointed and sworn for that purpose. That the homestead so assigned to each of the said parties consisted of the dwelling house and out-buildings of said parties, respectively, and one hundred and ten acres of the lands appurtenant thereto."

To these homestead assignments the plaintiffs filed the following exceptions: "First. Because the heirs of James Claffy, deceased, are not entitled each to a separate and distinct homestead out of the estate of their father, against judgments obtained against his executor before the estate was settled. Second. Because the claim of separate parcels of land by the children of James Claffy, deceased, does not entitle each to a separate homestead out of their father's estate against judgment debts of their father. Third. Because the widow of James Claffy being now dead, in no point of view could the children have homestead in their father's estate, except that on which their mother resided previous to her death, being the family homestead of their father. Fourth. Because the children are not entitled to their distributive share, over and above the exemption allowed by law to the head of the family (being a family homestead), until the judgment debts against their father have first been satisfied."

These exceptions came on to be heard by Judge Cottrah, when other evidence was offered in addition to the "agreed statement" of facts, principally, however, in reference to the time when the family left Columbia and went upon the Orangeburg land, and as to an alleged parcel partition of the same among the children after their mother's death (in 1875); that the children paid the taxes on the land, but always returned it as belonging to the estate of their father, &c. But the Circuit Judge, holding that the issue *made by the pleadings and the agreed statement of facts was that "of homestead pure and simple," confined himself to that question, and, sustaining the exceptions to the three homesteads as set off, set the same aside; and he further ordered that the plaintiffs have judgments severally against the claimants for their costs and disbursements.

From this judgment the three claimants appeal to this court, alleging error on the part of the judge in sustaining the exceptions hereinbefore stated, and also upon additional grounds, as follows:

"I. Because his honor erred in holding that the several claimants were not entitled, under the constitution and laws of this State, to a homestead in the lands actually held, possessed, and occupied by them respectively, the same consisting of their dwelling houses and lands appurtenant thereto; and the said Robert M. Claffy and James H. Claffy being heads of families, and the said Anna M. Darby being a married woman, whose husband has not sufficient property of his own to constitute a homestead.

"II. Because his honor erred in not allowing a homestead to the claimants, they being entitled to a homestead as the children of James Claffy deceased, if not otherwise; and to have the family homestead exempted in like manner, as if their father were living, and to have the same appraised and set off to them.

"III. Because his honor erred in holding that although the widow of James Claffy was only entitled to the constitutional right of homestead at the time of his death, that this right 'was incapable of operation for want of proper provision of law to that end.'

"IV. Because his honor erred in not ordering a reappraisement of homestead to the claimants in the above stated cases."

There was argument at the bar to the point, that the judgments against Rufus D. Senn, as executor of the deceased debtor, James Claffy, could not levy and sell the land in Orangeburg, for the reason that it had, as alleged, been transferred by the executor to the exclusive possession of the children as devisees under the will, and therefore it was not liable to levy and sale according to the doctrine of Huggins v. Oliver, 21 S. C., 147, and the line of authorities therein reviewed.

It was also argued, that, as the debts were simple contracts of 1873, upon which judgments were *only rendered in Richland in 1878, and not lodged in Orangeburg until 1884, the claimants were protected in the possession of the lands by lapse of time and the statute of limitations. While, on the other side, it was suggested that there was really no absolute devise of the land to the children, but only "after payment of the debts," which was, in effect, to charge the land with their payment; that the executor, Senn, never gave unqualified assent to the devises but, being responsible for the payment of the debts, still kept control of the land for that purpose; and, therefore, the possession of the children was merely permissive, and neither adverse nor exclusive. See 2 Story Eq. Jur., § 1246; Lupton v. Lupton, 2 Johns. Ch. 614. But as the case was before the Circuit Judge simply on exceptions to the allowance of three homesteads, he declined to consider any other question except that of homestead as allowed; and, of course, there can be no other question before us on appeal from his judgment. Some of the matters indicated in argument may be important—too important, at all events, to be considered incidentally upon a mere question of homestead—but they are not before this court, and in order to prevent possible injustice, we take occasion to state that whatever is said here is intended to be entirely without prejudice, except as to the very points ruled.

Then as to the allowance of three homesteads in the Orangeburg lands, one to each of the applicants, children of the deceased debtor. Many new and difficult points have arisen under the constitution and laws giving the right of homestead; and it strikes us that the one made here is not only novel in its character, but ingenious. As we understand it, the proposition is, that, as against a debt of the ancestor, his children in possession of lands of his estate are each entitled to a homestead therein, provided such child happens to have a family of his own, and, therefore, may be said to be, in general terms "the head of a family"; thus multiplying homesteads in the lands of a deceased debtor, according to the number of his children who may happen to be on the lands and to have families of their own. Surely, such could not have been the intention either of the provision in the constitution or of the laws passed to carry it into effect.

The deceased contracted the debts upon which the judgments *were rendered in April and August, 1873, and soon after, in December of the same year, died. Although the judgments were only rendered in 1878, and not transcribed to Orangeburg until 1884, it is quite clear that the question of homestead in lands of the deceased must be determined by the law as it stood in 1873. See Norton

v. Bradham, 21 S. C., 381. At that time the original constitution (1868), without amendment, was of force, which (section 32 of article II.) declared as follows: "The family homestead of the head of each family residing in this State, such homestead consisting of the dwelling house, out-buildings, and land appurtenant, not to exceed, &c., shall be exempt from attachment levy, and sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court," &c. It is true that the terms of this provision are very general—"the head of each family residing in this State," and "any process from any court," &c.—but can there be a reasonable doubt that, as against the same debts, only one homestead was intended, and that for the protection of the debtor himself or, in the case of death, of his family? Who but the debtor himself, against whom there is process, can need "exemption from process," either for himself or, in certain circumstances, his family? It seems to us that any other interpretation would run counter to the whole spirit and object of the homestead provision.

But if there could have been any doubt arising from the very general terms of the provision in the constitution, we think they were entirely removed by the act of February 22, 1873 (15 Stat., 371), which was passed for the express purpose of carrying that provision into effect. In the first section of that act it abundantly appears that the homestead was intended, at least in the first instance, to exempt the property of the debtor. In providing for the appointment of appraisers to set off the homestead, it directs the sheriff to cause the appointment of three appraisers, "one to be appointed by the creditor, one by the debtor, and one by himself, provided, should the creditor or debtor refuse," &c. It also declares that when thirty days shall have elapsed after filing the return setting off homestead to the debtor, &c., and no good cause has been shown, &c., such debtor may have such return recorded," &c. It thus appears that the exemption was given, at least primarily, to the debtor against whom there is process. We cannot conceive of such a thing as an "independent homestead," simply on the ground that the party is on the land levied, and happens to be "the head of a family." Something more is necessary. Surely, a stranger, without privity with the debtor, could not set up the right; but to be entitled against "any process," the applicant must make the claim either as the debtor himself, or, after his decease, as a member of his family.

It is true that in the case of Norton v. Bradham, supra, it was held that "the legislature had full power to enact the act of 1874 (15 Stat., 589), which extends to a wife living with her husband, who owns no property, the protection of a homestead exemption as against her own debts." But in delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Melver carefully stated the view thus: "Looking at the constitutional provision now under consideration in this light, it would seem to be a matter of small importance whether the head of a family, or any other member of the family, was the legal owner of the family homestead. That is the thing exempted, and if the sale of it would deprive the family of its home, the mischief, which it was designed to prevent, would ensue, whether it was sold for the debt of the head of the family, or for the debt of some other member of the family, to whom such family homestead legally belonged," &c. Here none of the claimants are the debtors. Although they are claiming exemption in their father's land and as against his debts, they yet claim "independently," each for himself. This, in our judgment, they cannot do. If they are entitled to homestead, it is as their father's family, to whom his right was transmitted, and not as the independent heads of their own families respectively.

Under certain circumstances, "the children" may claim exemption as against debts of the ancestor, but in such case they can only claim as a family. The words, "each family," clearly mean the family collectively as a unit; if the widow be living, "the widow and children," or, if she be dead, "the children" as a class and not severally; and that, too, without the slightest regard to the fact whether such children are still minors in the family homestead or grown up, emancipated, and having families of their own. This is conclusively shown by the fourth section of the act of 1873, which is the only provision of law under which the appellants as "children" could claim homestead, the father and mother both being dead. That section is as follows: "If the husband be dead, the widow and children, if the father and mother be dead, the children living on the homestead, whether any or all such children be minors or not, shall be entitled to have the family homestead exempted in like manner as if the husband or parents were living; and the homestead so exempted shall be subject to partition among all the children of the head of the family in like manner as if no debts existed; provided that no partition or sale in that case shall be made until the youngest child becomes of age, unless, upon proof satisfactory to the court hearing the case, such sale is deemed best for the interest of such minor or minors." This would seem to be demonstrative that the grant of the exemption to "children," as such, was intended to be a single homestead, to them as a class and not severally. The family homestead is to be exempted to them "in like manner as if the husband or parents were living"; and, besides, such homestead is subject to partition.

But if we clearly understand it, the appellants do not claim their separate homesteads as "children" of the debtor, but independently, in their own right. We confess we cannot so understand it. The debts against which they claim are undoubtedly the debts of their father, and he was also the owner of the land in which the exemption is claimed; and it seems to us that the application itself for homestead as against the debts of the father, is tantamount to an admission that so much of the lands as may not be carved out by the homesteads claimed, will still belong to his estate; and is, therefore, not quite consistent with their claim of absolute title in the lands. It cannot be said that the appellants are claiming "their own individual homestead rights," when there is no debt or process against them individually as the separate heads of families, and their applications are for homesteads against their father's debts, necessarily implying that the lands are also of his estate. If the lands belonged absolutely to the claimants, there would be neither need nor propriety in claiming homesteads as against any debts but their own.

Taking it as shown, that the claims could not be for "independent homestead rights," as against debts of the claimants themselves, but for rights derived from the debtor as the head of the family—their deceased father—the applications might have been made under section 8 of the act of 1873 (now substantially re-enacted as section 2002 of the General Statutes), which provides, that "whenever the head of any family, married woman, widow, or children shall be entitled to any estate or right of homestead as hereinbefore provided, and no process has been lodged with any officer against such homestead, the party or parties entitled to such homestead may apply at any time by petition to the master of said county, or if there be no master therein, then and in that event to the clerk of the court for said county, to have the same appraised and set off," &c. We cannot say that it was error on the part of the Circuit Judge to sustain the exceptions to the assignment of homestead in the three several cases stated, and to set aside the same.

But, assuming this view to be correct, further exception is taken, that, having reached that conclusion, the Circuit Judge should have ordered a new assignment of one homestead, the family homestead, to the children as a class. We do not think that the judge erred in omitting so to do. He could only decide the question which was before him, the right of each of the three parties to the homesteads as assigned. That as to one homestead had not been made or considered in the tribunal where the proceeding was commenced. After deciding the question made, the judge had no right in his court, and of his own head, to originate a proceeding for the assignment of one in the place of the three claimed. When such application is made in the manner and in the tribunal appointed by law, and it comes up regularly, then will be the proper time to consider whether, in this case, the children as a class are entitled to the family homestead in the Orangeburg lands of the testator, which he disposed of by his will. "The right of homestead is a statutory right, or rather a constitutional right, to be enforced by statutory proceedings under the statutes upon the subject of homestead. The Circuit Court is without original jurisdiction." Myers v. Ham, 20 S. C., 527.

One of the exceptions complains that it was error to adjudge costs to the plaintiffs against the claimants. It has been held in this State that there is no authority conferred by the code to tax as costs, in special proceedings, the allowances as costs in an action. Columbia Water Power Company v. Columbia, 4 S. C., 402. The code defines an action to be "an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offence;" and declares all other remedies to be "special proceedings." We are not aware that it has ever been decided that an application for homestead under our constitution and laws is not an action, but a "special proceeding," in the sense of the code. It has been held in New York, under a provision in her code identical with ours, that a proceeding for the admeasurement of dower is an action (see Wait's Ann. Code, page 19, and authorities), and it would seem that an application for the admeasurement of homestead is not essentially different from that of dower.

But it is not necessary in this case to decide whether it is an action or a special proceeding; for the homestead law does expressly allow certain specified costs in such proceedings. See section 2004, General Statutes. It is true, there is a direction that the costs indicated must be paid "out of the property of the debtor, or in case the homestead is set off to the widow or minor children, out of the estate of the deceased." But it is manifest that this provision contemplated only the case in which the claimant was legally entitled to the homestead, and it was actually set off. But by whom should those costs be paid, when the application turns out to be unfounded and the petition is dismissed? We think the costs ought to be paid by some one. But inasmuch as costs are purely statutory, and the special act upon the subject of homestead makes no provision for costs in the case which has occurred, we know of no law that allows the costs to be taxed against the petitioners. We suppose that the master has received his costs, $5, in each case under the last clause of the section 2004 of the General Statutes, which provides: "Whenever a homestead is laid off as provided, the master or clerk, as the case may be, shall receive as compensation $5 for all services, including the record of the proceedings, but excluding the advertising, which shall not exceed five dollars, and which fees and costs shall be paid in advance by the party claiming the homestead," &c.

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as herein explained, be affirmed, except as to the costs, which is reversed.

4. Finding of fact by referee and Circuit Judge confirmed.

5. Petition for rehearing refused.

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, February, 1886.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

The plaintiffs were bound to prove the alleged corrupt combination of the sale and chilling of the bidding by a clear preponderance of evidence. Fraud when alleged must be proven satisfactorily. The evidence, in my judgment, does not justify the referee in finding that there was a contract with Grambling not to bid at the sale—in fact the great weight is against the conclusion; it is not even sufficiently strong to satisfy me that these defendants or any authorized agent ever agreed to let him have twenty-five or thirty acres of land in case they became the purchasers. But even if this were true, it would not vitiate the sale if there was no agreement by the defendants with Grambling not to bid, and if the purpose of the agreement was not to chill the bidding. I really think the plaintiffs have failed on this essential allegation of this complaint.

As to the announcement of Mr. Cleveland, attorney for defendants, at the sale, it was made in the best of faith, and he was in duty bound to make it, as otherwise his clients might have been *seriously prejudiced in the suit then pending between these plaintiffs and defendants about this same land.

Now, after this sale and purchase the present defendants under arbitration secured the renunciation of Mrs. Reagan's dower in her husband's estate in this land. This gave, as defendants claim, a perfect title to them in the whole land. And after this the appeal pending in the Common Pleas, involving the question of title to this land between these same litigants was marked on the calendar settled. A serious question might be raised whether that might not have been pleaded in bar to the present controversy. No such question is raised, and I do not say the plea would have been good.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the plaintiffs' exceptions to the referee's finding of fact that an illegal agreement was made with Grambling by the defendants be reversed, and that his judgment be sustained, as well on the ground on which it is based as upon the grounds upon which it should further have been based. It is further ordered that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

From this decree plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

Messrs. Bomar & Simpson and G. W. Nichols, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to set aside a sheriff's deed of a tract of land containing 250 acres, and for the recovery of the same. It was referred to Charles P. Wofford, Esq., as special referee, to hear and determine the issues, when the following facts appeared:

In 1860 the land in dispute was sold by the commissioner in equity. At that time Mark Reagan and his three sisters, Martha, Ailsy, and Harriet, were living on the land, which, as we suppose, had been the property of their father, and it was bid off by the brother, Mark Reagan, for $960, payable in two equal annual instalments. The bond for the purchase money was signed by *Mark and the three sisters, who were all older than he was. It seems from the credits on the bond, that most of the payments were made by the sisters in Confederate bills, and by receipting for their shares of the purchase money, who had means of their own derived from the sale of homespun cloth and teaching school; but they were entered as made "for Mark Reagan," and the deed was made to him individually. The brother and sisters continued to live together on the place as one family, until one after another the parties all married except Harriet. Martha married E. L. Pope, and Ailsy one Bishop. Mark also married in 1863 or '4, and died intestate in 1877, leaving a widow, Lavinia, and three infant children, James, Hattie, and Emma, the plaintiffs. The widow administered upon the estate of her deceased husband, and a judgment was recovered against her as administratrix, upon a debt of her intestate.

After the death of their brother Mark, the three sisters commenced suit in the Probate Court for partition of the land, claiming that they and their brother had paid equally for it, and each was entitled to one-fourth interest, although for convenience the deed had been made to the brother Mark alone. The probate judge ruled against the sisters, but they appealed to the Court of Common Pleas; and, pending that appeal, the judgment which had been recovered against Lavinia as administratrix, was levied upon the whole land, which was sold as the property of Mark Reagan, deceased. At the sale Mr. Cleveland attorney for the sisters in the probate suit announced that only one-fourth interest would go to the purchaser, and any one buying and attempting to hold the whole of it, would buy a law suit. Mrs. Bishop bid off the land for $185, and the sheriff's deed was made to the three sisters. They obtained from Lavinia, the widow, the relinquishment of her dower for $150, and she, with her children, left the place, and the probate appeal was marked "settled."

Afterwards Lavinia, the mother, died, and the children of Mark Reagan brought this action for the land, alleging that the whole legal title was in their father, Mark, and descended to them; and charging that the sheriff's sale should be set aside as void, upon the ground that the sisters fraudulently and illegally combined to chill the biddings, both by causing notice to be *given of their claims in the pending probate proceedings and by making an alleged agreement with one Grambling to sell him a small part of the land—some thirty acres—as an inducement for him not to bid at the sale, which enabled them to get the land at a sacrifice. The defendants positively denied the alleged agreement with Grambling.

After much testimony, the referee found that there was "an understanding among the sisters that one should buy for herself and the others, and that Grambling should have the benefit of the purchase to the extent of twenty-five or thirty acres; but that it was not shown that the low price of the land could be attributed to that arrangement; that under the circumstances the land brought as much as a prudent man would be willing to pay," &c. To this report the plaintiffs filed exceptions, and the defendants also gave notice that if the report of the referee could not be maintained on the grounds on which it was placed, they would ask that it should be sustained on the following grounds: first, that the proof showed no such agreement as that set out in the complaint; and, second, if made, it was not such as to avoid the sale, and the referee erred in finding that it was sufficient.

The cause came on to be heard by Judge Hudson, who held that "the announcement of Mr. Cleveland, attorney for the defendants, at the sale, was made in the best of faith, and he was in duty bound to make it, as otherwise his clients might have been seriously prejudiced in the probate suit then pending about the same land; and that the evidence did not justify the referee in finding that there was a contract with Grambling not to bid at the sale—in fact, the great weight is against such conclusion." And so holding, he sustained the referee's report, both on the grounds upon which it was based, as well as others, and dismissed the complaint.

To this decree the plaintiffs filed numerous exceptions, which are in the "Brief" and need not be restated here. The questions made are substantially these: I. Was the announcement made at the sale by the attorney of defendants sufficient to avoid their purchase, and the sheriff's deed to them? II. Was there any agreement between defendants and any other person as to not bidding at the sale? And if so, did it have the effect of making *the land sell for an under value? III. Was the decree based on any testimony which was improperly admitted?

Is this an action at law or a case in chancery? Considered simply as an action to recover the land, it is clearly the former—nothing more nor less than trespass to try titles. In this view, the Circuit Judge having found as matter of fact, that the defendants did not make a contract with Grambling not to bid at the sale, nor combine in such a manner as to prevent fair and full competition, this court would have no right to review the evidence, as in that case our jurisdiction would be confined solely to the correction of errors of law, assuming the facts to be as found. But looking to the matters charged as the grounds of recovery, we find the prayer is, that the sheriff's deed to the defendants may be set aside as void, the defendants, as alleged, having purchased the land for less than its value, caused by a fraudulent combination on their part to chill the biddings, both by having it announced at the sale that each of the sisters claimed a fourth interest in the land, and also by making an agreement with one Grambling not to bid at the sale. These are matters cognizable only on the equity side of the court, and would seem to characterize it as a case in chancery. So considering, this court, sitting as an appellate tribunal, has the right to review the whole evidence and to determine all the questions in the case, whether of fact or of law.

First, as to the announcement at the sale. As we understand it, the defendants had nothing to do with levying and selling the land under execution. They were prosecuting their appeal from the Probate Court to establish their claim that they paid part of the purchase money of the land, and were entitled to equitable rights therein, when it was advertised to be sold under execution as the property of their deceased brother Mark. What could they do but give notice of their claim or abandon it, as an innocent purchaser without notice of their alleged equities would have been entitled to hold it against them? As the sale under execution could carry nothing more than the interest of Mark, whatever that might be, we can have no doubt that the notice given, tending to limit that interest, did reduce the price at which the land was sold. But we cannot see that for that reason it was illegal and sufficient to avoid the sale. Mr. Cleveland made no false statement. What he said as to the pending appeal from the Probate Court was in fact true, and everything else he said about buying a law suit, &c., was, of course, mere matter of opinion, as to which all persons were at liberty to form their own judgments.

Such notices at sheriff's sales are not at all uncommon. In this case, of course, the court could not hear and determine the appeal from the Probate Court. It is not known, and probably never will be, whether the opinion of Mr. Cleveland was well founded or not, and therefore we are not authorized to assume that the sisters had no interest in the land, and that the notice was pretentious merely to chill the biddings. On the contrary, without regard to whether that opinion was or was not sound, we concur with the Circuit Judge that "the announcement of Mr. Cleveland was made in the best of faith, and he was in duty bound to make it, as otherwise his clients may have been seriously prejudiced in the suit then pending between the plaintiffs and defendants about this same land," &c.

Second. As to the alleged combination to prevent free and full competition. It has been settled in this State, "that the principle which governs all sales at auction, and especially judicial sales, is, that there should be full and fair competition. Any agreement or combination, therefore, the object and effect of which is to chill the sale and stifle competition is illegal, and no party to the agreement or combination can derive benefit from the sale," &c. See Hamilton v. Hamilton, 2 Rich. Eq., 355 [46 Am. Dec. 58]; Bar- rett v. Bath Paper Company, 13 S. C., 156, and authorities cited. We do not understand that every agreement of parties to buy together will avoid a sale. Several persons may unite in making a purchase, one bidding for all, provided there is no intention thereby to prevent free competition. As was said in Hamilton v. Hamilton, supra, "It is shown in that, as in other cases, that persons may properly unite for the purpose of making a bid among themselves, where no one of the associates was able to purchase or desired to own the entire property exposed to sale, the effect of such an agreement is to advance the object which the policy of the law favors, a fair price to the parties interested in the article sold," &c.

*It was not shown that the sisters agreed beforehand for one to bid for herself and the others. As it turned out, however, Mrs. Bishop did bid for all. But if there had been a previous understanding to that effect, we do not think it would have been sufficient to avoid the sale. There is no principle or rule of law, which requires every one at a sale to become a bidder or even all of those who may desire a part of the property sold. The sisters were claiming in the same right as tenants in common—each wanted a part, but neither wanted the whole of the land, and we cannot see that the fact that one of them bid for the land and had it set down to all of them was any violation of the salutary principle adopted for the purpose of securing full and fair competition at auction sales. See Carson v. Law, 2 Rich. Eq., 307.

But it is urged that the defendants combined with Grambling, a stranger, and induced him not to bid at the sale, by agreeing to sell him 25 or 30 acres of the land at the price which it might bring at the sale, and that they reaped advantage from this agreement in the reduced price at which they purchased the land. This was a question of fact, as to which the referee, after full and careful consideration, found that there was some agreement with Grambling about selling him a part of the land, but that it was not shown that such agreement had any effect in reducing the price at which the land sold; while the Circuit Judge went further and found that "the evidence did not justify the referee in finding that there was a contract with Grambling not to bid at the sale; in fact, the great weight is against this conclusion. It is not even sufficiently strong to satisfy me that the defendants or any authorized agent ever agreed to let him have twenty-five or thirty acres of the land, in case they became the purchasers," &c.

The rule of this court, when the Circuit Judge concurs with the referee upon a question of fact, is well known. We have read the testimony carefully, and we cannot say that the finding of the Circuit Judge is without evidence to support it. The allegation was that the illegal agreement was made by Grambling with Elijah Pope, the husband of one of the three sisters, in going to the court house on the morning of the sale, and was afterwards ratified by the sisters (Harriet was not at the court house that day), in the office of Mr. Cleveland. No one but Grambling himself says that the sisters made any contract about his not bidding at the sale. Mr. Cleveland says there was some agreement in his office, but he did not know with whom it was made, and he does not think there was any understanding that Grambling was not to bid at the sale—thought the sale was fair. All the other parties positively deny that there was any such agreement or understanding. Besides, if the notice given by Mr. Cleveland at the sale touching the claim of the sisters, was taken as showing a serious cloud upon the title except as to one-fourth, as the referee found, the land was not sold at a sacrifice.

As the appeal from the probate judge, involving the merits of the sisters' claim, was not before the Circuit Judge for adjudication, the testimony of Eliza Bolling and Mrs. Bishop upon that subject was irrelevant to the issues in the case, and not having been considered, we do not think it necessary to go into the subject of its admissibility. In the view taken it did not in the least affect the decree rendered.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

The plaintiffs filed a petition for rehearing, claiming that they were entitled certainly to three-fourths interest, and asking "that an issue be allowed between plaintiffs and defendants as to what interests or what equities, if any, the defendants had in said land at the time of sale." Upon this petition,

January 19, 1887. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition. The judgment of this court did not undertake to rule that the interest sold was only one-fourth, but that the sale carried the interest of Mark, whatever that might be. As it does not appear that any material fact or principle involved was overlooked in the decision, there is no ground for a rehearing, and the petition is refused.

*COOKE v. POOL.

(April Term, 1886.)

1. Finding of fact by the Circuit Judge from testimony reported by the master, approved.

[2. Champerty and Maintenance ¶5.]

An innocent assignee of a judgment is not affected by a champertous purchase of the judgment by his immediate assignor, but is entitled to enforce his judgment against the judgment debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Champerty and Maintenance, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. ¶5.]

Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, November, 1885.

The opinion sufficiently states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

After an attentive consideration of the testimony reported in this case, and the argument of counsel, I am satisfied with the master's report. It is alleged that the plaintiff cannot bring this action, because he is not the legal holder and owner of the Crotwell judgment against Seth Pool, and no other creditor of Seth Pool has joined in the action. The grounds of this allegation are, that Thompson H. Cooke, plaintiff's attorney, bought the Crotwell judgment for the purpose of bringing this action; that he is an attorney at law of this court; and that such a transaction between a creditor (and) an attorney of this court is void under section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of 1882. That section provides, in substance, that any attorney of this court who shall buy any demand for the purpose of putting it in suit, when the owner would not sue the same, shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars, and be incapable of practising in any court until restored by the Supreme Court.

It is insisted that as the statute provides a punishment for such conduct, the transaction is void; that the assignment transfers no right of action, even in the hands of innocent holders. I think the Crotwell judgment was purchased by Thompson H. Cooke for the purpose of bringing an action to set aside the deed attacked in this action, and that such an action would not have been brought by Crotwell, and if Thompson H. Cooke had brought the action, it would have been dismissed under section 2165 supra. But the action was not brought by Thompson H. Cooke, but by Henry P. Cooke, the assignee of Thompson H. Cooke, and there is no evidence to show that he was aware or had notice of any unlawful purpose upon the part of his assignor. Whatever may be the actual truth of the facts, Henry P. Cooke stands before the court as the bona fide holder of this Crotwell judgment, and is not to be turned out of court for a transaction for which he is not responsible under the statute.

It is ordered and adjudged, that the report of the master herein be confirmed and made the judgment of this court.

Mr. Geo. Westmoreland, for appellant.
Mr. T. H. Cooke, contra.

November 22, 1886. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. One J. M. Crotwell held a judgment on Seth P. Pool for the sum of $164.50, which he assigned to Thompson H. Cooke, attorney at law. Cooke assigned the same to his brother, Henry P. Cooke, the plaintiff in this action. Henry P. Cooke instituted the action below to set aside a certain deed of the said S. P. Pool to certain of the defendants as fraudulent and void, it having been executed, as alleged, to defraud creditors. The defence set up in the answer of defendants denied the fraud in the deed, also the assignment of the judgment from Crotwell to T. H. Cooke, and claimed that the deed from Seth P. Pool to S. H. Pool was bona fide and for a valuable consideration.

The case having been referred to the master, he reported the following facts: That on April 6, 1878, J. M. Crotwell obtained a judgment by default against Seth P. Pool for $164.50, with $23.05 costs. This judgment was assigned by said Crotwell to T. H. Cooke, attorney, on July 3, 1882, and by said Cooke to H. Powell Cooke, the plaintiff in this action, on August 8, 1882. As to the illegality of the transaction between Crotwell and Cooke he reported: "That Crotwell mentioned having a judgment on Pool, but did not tell him that he wanted him to try and make the money. After this Cooke went to see Crotwell, and asked him to assign said judgment to him, which was done, with the *understanding on the part of Crotwell that he would have nothing more to do with it, and that he was not responsible for costs. * * * At the time of the assignment nothing was said about what Cooke was to pay for the judgment, but some time afterwards, a month or two, Cooke agreed to pay $100 for the judgment, and gave his note for that amount, with the understanding that he was not to pay until the case was settled. Cooke admits that he bought the judgment expecting to make something out of it, and he expected to make it by bringing a suit like this, if he did not make it otherwise. He assigned the judgment to his brother, the plaintiff, on account of a debt he owed him. Crotwell told Cooke before and after he assigned the judgment to him that he did not intend to have any more litigation about it." After the master's report was filed, T. H. Cooke's note to Crotwell was found, which by consent was admitted in evidence. It was dated July 3, 1882, the day of the assignment of the judgment to him.

His honor, Judge Wallace, who heard the report of the master upon exceptions, confirmed said report, and made it the judgment of the court, holding that notwithstanding T. H. Cooke could not have brought the action himself, in view of the fact that the evidence showed that he purchased the judgment for the purpose of bringing an action to set aside the deed attacked, which Crotwell, the assignor, would not have done, and which, under section 2165, General Statutes, an attorney at law could not do; that section providing in substance, that an attorney of the court who shall buy any demand for the purpose of putting it in suit when the owner would not sue the same, shall pay a fine of one hundred dollars, and be incapable of practising in any court until restored by the Supreme Court—yet, that the plaintiff, "standing before the court as a bona fide holder of the judgment, could not be turned out of the court for a transaction for which he was not responsible under the statute." He therefore, as stated above, confirmed the report and made it the judgment of the court.

The defendants' exceptions on appeal raise three questions. 1st. That the assignment from Crotwell to Cooke was void. 2d. Being void, T. H. Cooke had no right to assign to his brother, the plaintiff. And, 3d. That his honor erred in holding that the *plaintiff, H. P. Cooke, was a bona fide holder of the judgment without notice of the unlawful purposes and acts of his assignor.

As to this last point. This was a question of fact, depending upon the force and effect of the testimony. Upon examination of the evidence directed to this point we find no ground, under the law applicable to such questions, to disturb the finding of the judge. This exception is therefore overruled.

The plaintiff, then, being as a matter of fact a bona fide holder of the judgment without notice, if his honor was right in ruling that, notwithstanding the transaction between T. H. Cooke and Crotwell may have been illegal, yet that this fact would not turn the plaintiff out of court, standing as such bona fide holder, then the appeal must be dismissed. The important, and in fact the only legal, question therefore involved in the appeal is, was his honor right in such ruling? If he was, it could make no difference, so far as the rights of the plaintiff are concerned, whether or not the assignment of the judgment in question from Crotwell to T. H. Cooke was champertous at common law, or was in violation of section 2165 of the General Statutes, he being a bona fide holder without notice.

Having reached the conclusion that his honor was correct in his ruling, we have deemed it unnecessary to follow the argument of the appellants as to the effect of section 2165, General Statutes, supra, or of the common law, upon a transaction like that between Crotwell and T. H. Cooke, by which it is alleged that the judgment in question was assigned by Crotwell to the said Cooke, and we have therefore confined ourselves in this opinion to the support of his honor's ruling as to the rights of the plaintiff. It is admitted that the assigned judgment is a valid judgment, unpaid and indefensible. There is no inherent defect therein, like a gaming note, void wherever (Mordecai v. Dawkins, 9 Rich., 262), or like an usurious contract, still usurious in whatever hands found (Martin v. Petit, 11 Rich. Eq., 416), and there is really no defence to the judgment.

But it is claimed that the plaintiff is not a legal holder thereof, because his assignor, T. H. Cooke, received no title from Crotwell, the transaction between them as to the said Cooke being, as alleged, in violation of section 2165, General Statutes, *and champertous at common law, and this is the only defence. If the contest below was between T. H. Cooke and Crotwell as to the ownership of the judgment, or as to the enforcement of the agreement to assign, then the questions raised would be pertinent. But the judgment, it is admitted, was transferred from Crotwell to T. H. Cooke, and from the latter to the plaintiff, and Crotwell and Cooke are quiescent. Crotwell no longer claims the judgment, nor does T. H. Cooke. The plaintiff, however, claims it, and is in possession without protest or objection on the part of any one, and as a bona fide holder under what purports to be a regular and valid assignment, down from the original owner, and without notice of any taint in his title.

Now, can the judgment debtor, having no defense thereto, nor questioning in any way the validity thereof, or his heirs or representatives, under the facts of this case, resist the enforcement of said judgment, on the ground that the plaintiff has no title? If Crotwell was suing the plaintiff for this judgment, would not the title be adjudged against him on the doctrine of estoppel? However illegal it may have been for him to transfer said judgment to T. H. Cooke, yet, having done so, and having remained quiet until Cooke had transferred it to an innocent and bona fide holder, would the court allow him even to offer testimony impeaching his transfer? Would not the doctrine of estoppel close the door upon any investigation preceding the act of transfer to the plaintiff, and make the plaintiff's title complete? We think so. And if the plaintiff would thus be protected against Crotwell or T. H. Cooke, equally so must he be protected as against these defendants. They have no defence to the judgment, and it can make no difference to them by whom it may be enforced, so that when enforced, it shall be done by one whose act will end and extinguish it. The Circuit Judge was right in holding that the plaintiff could not be turned out of court on the defences set up.

As this determines the case, we express no opinion as to the questions whether the purchase by T. H. Cooke of this judgment was in violation of section 2165, General Statutes; nor, if so, whether that fact would render said purchase absolutely void; nor whether said purchase was champertous at common law. *These questions are not really involved in the appeal, and it would not be proper for this court to prejudice them, when the parties most interested therein are not before the court.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. I concur. I do not understand that the Circuit Judge refused to dismiss the plaintiff's action for the reason that he was a purchaser for value, in the sense of the equitable plea upon that subject, to sustain which it is necessary to show that the consideration was actually paid in money. Such plea is interposed by way of defence, as a shield against all claims except the legal title. As I understand, his view is that the plaintiff, having purchased the judgment bona fide, under an unbroken chain of assignments, regular upon their face, has the right to enforce it against the defendant in execution, notwithstanding the peculiar hidden vice alleged to exist in one of the intermediate assignments, with which the defendant in execution had no connection, and of which the plaintiff, when he took his assignment, had no notice. Section 2165, of the General Statutes, does not expressly declare void the "speculative practices" therein referred to, but imposes penalties upon an attorney who shall enter into them.

But assuming that the court would not enforce such a contract between the parties in pari delicto, it seems to me that until the hidden vice which affects the contract is made to appear, it may carry title to an innocent purchaser; or, at least, that such alleged vice may not be shown collaterally by one in no way privy to it, so as either to indict the penalties imposed, or avoid the contract as against a third person, who in the meantime has purchased bona fide and without notice of any defect. As was said in the case of Verdier v. Simons, 2 McCord Eq., 388: "As to champerty, contracts of this kind, if fairly made, have not been considered in modern times to be champerty. At any rate, it is for the party aggrieved and not for strangers to take advantage of these objections." The question in McConnell v. Kitchens [47 Am. Rep. 845] was between the parties to the contract assailed. See Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill., 477, where it is said in a case somewhat similar *to this: "But even conceding the agreement to be champertous, we do not think appellees can avail themselves of it as a defence to this suit. While the cases are not all in accord on this question, we think the decided weight of authority sustains the position that champerty cannot be made available as a defence in a collateral proceeding, as is sought to be done here. Fetrow v. Merriwether, 53 Ill., 275; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet., 219 [9 L. Ed. 388]; Hilton v. Woods, L. R. 4 Eq., 432; Knight v. Bawyer, 2 DeG. & J., 444; Coleman v. Billings, 89 Ill., 187. This question cannot properly arise except in a controversy between the parties to the alleged champertous agreement or their privies," &c.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. I dissent. One of the issues in the action was whether plaintiff was the owner of the judgment originally recovered by John M. Crotwell against Seth P. Pool. To maintain his allegation of ownership the plaintiff must trace his title through the assignment from Crotwell to T. H. Cooke. It therefore becomes a material inquiry whether such assignment was a valid or void transfer. It seems to me that it is illegal and void under section 2165, of the General Statutes (McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 S. C., 430 [47 Am. Rep. 845]), and that T. H. Cooke could not by an act expressly forbidden by statute acquire a legal title to the judgment, and could not, therefore, transfer any such title to the plaintiff, who consequently stands before the court claiming under a judgment in favor of a third person, to which he has shown no title whatever. He cannot claim as the innocent holder of a negotiable security, for the judgment is not such a security; nor can he invoke the protection afforded to a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, for he has neither acquired the legal title (Bush v. Bush, 3 Strob. Eq., 131 [51 Am. Dec. 675]), nor has he paid any purchase money, the sole consideration of his purchase being an antecedent indebtedness, which is not sufficient. Williams v. Hollingsworth, 1 Strob. Eq., 103 [47 Am. Dec. 527]; Zorn v. Railroad Company, 5 S. C., 90; Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C., 159.

I think, therefore, that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed.

*No. 1892. COVAR v. SALLAT. April Term, 1886. This was a consent order settling matters of controversy involved in the appeal. Filed June 2, 1886.

No. 1917. WOOD v. WOOD. April Term, 1886.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1009.]

While this court is not absolutely bound by the findings of fact by the Circuit Judge, sustaining the referee, in an equity cause, "yet the rule is, as we have often stated, that there must be in every such case some very strong and potent reason appearing otherwise, or this court will feel itself bound by such findings. The findings must either be without testimony, or its manifest weight must be to the contrary, or the facts as found below will stand. And especially does this rule apply in a case like that before the court, where the Circuit Judge fully and unequivocally sustains and adopts the findings of the referee."

[2. Witnesses ⇨139.]

In a contest between two claimants under the obligee in a bond for titles, section 400 of the Code does not prevent the obligor from testifying to communications between himself and the deceased obligee, as such witness, though a party to the cause, has no interest in the action.

[Executors and Administrators ⇨470.]

An administrator having paid all the debts of his intestate this brother, except a large one of his own, not then barred, retaining only a small sum of money and a watch, in action brought years afterwards by the administrator de bonis non of the first intestate against the representative of the first

No. 1937. ROLLINS v. CLEMENT. April Term, 1886.

[1. Rewards ⇨15.]

Plaintiff sued to recover a reward offered for information sufficient to convict the persons who burned defendant's mill. It was competent to prove by a witness the fact that he had previously given to defendant information received from another as to the guilty parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rewards, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. ⇨15.]

[2. Rewards ⇨15.]

A witness could testify as to a message carried by him from defendant to plaintiff, upon which the plaintiff acted.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, September 23, 1886.

No. 1937. HAILE v. MORGAN & CO. April Term, 1886.

[For subsequent opinion, see Harle v. Morgan & Co., 29 S. C. 258, 7 S. E. 487.]

Defendants agreed to sell guano for Rasin & Co. on commission, taking cotton option notes payable November 1, which were to be sent to Rasin & Co. by May 15 of the same year, 1881, guaranteeing said notes to the extent of their commissions. The agreement contained this further stipulation, as written by Rasin & Co. to the defendants: "If for any cause or reason full and complete settlement, in accordance with the stipulations hereinbefore contained, should not be made by you to us or to our order before the 1st day of June, 1881, then or after that, provided only that we should request it, but not otherwise, you must promptly, upon such request from us so to do, give to us or to our order your own note, properly made out upon our regular *form of cotton option note, for such amount or balance as may be unsettled at the time that we make such request."

On June 7, 1881, defendants gave to Rasin & Co. their cotton option note for $1,636.80, payable November 1, "with interest from maturity, if not paid at maturity, also ten per cent. counsel fees and other expenses of collecting, if sued." In the summer of 1881, this note was transferred to one L. who afterwards transferred it to plaintiff. The action was on this note.

The Circuit Judge (Wallace) admitted in evidence letters from Rasin & Co. to defendants, written in October and December, 1881, in which they claimed the notes taken by defendants for guano sold. Under the charge of the Circuit Judge, the jury found for plaintiff only to the extent of defendants' commissions, $113.44. Held,—

[1. Contracts ⇨54.]

That the letters written by Rasin & Co. after their transfer of the note sued on was not competent evidence against plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 234; Dec. Dig. ⇨54.]

[2. Bills and Notes ⇨28.]

That the paper sued on lacked "at least one of the essential features of" a note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. ⇨28.]

[3. Bills and Notes ⇨92.]

That the instrument of June 7, 1881, had a sufficient consideration in the stipulations of the original agreement, under the express terms of which it was given; and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount called for by the instrument of June 7, together with the counsel fees therein provided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 166-173, 175-205, 208-212; Dec. Dig. ⇨92.]

Judgment reversed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, November 29, 1886. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.
